"I knew it!" Sandy bounced up and down on the seat, squealing happily. "Now you can move in with me!"

I gave her a double-take, and she nodded quickly. "The minute I saw you standing in line, I figured you'd be a good choice."

This time I watched the road before replying. "You mean you came down to the Unemployment Office to shop for a room-mate?"

"Not a room, man. A great big groovy spread. And you can pay your share of the rent when your compensation checks come through—just like the others."

"Others?"

Sandy nodded. “Don’t worry, you won’t be crowded. You’ll see.” She gave me a reassuring smile. “Like I’m not pressuring you. Just think about it.”

I thought about is as I drove.

Drove along Sunset Strip, passing all the familiar landmarks. Here were the shops and the signs—Mr. Gladys, the hair stylist—Mother Naked’s Southern Fried Chicken—Toilet A-Go-Go—the interior decorator place where they restored antique furniture like new—and the other interior decorator place where they aged new furniture to make it look antique. We sped by the Now Generation Clinic, specializing in youthful diseases like hippytitis, and passed the Topless Restaurant where I had once been thrown out for not wearing a necktie.

Dusk was falling, and the hippies were rising; the under-achievers, members of the uptrodden masses, hiding from the world behind dark glasses and beards.

This was the scene—boots and bare feet, buttons and bushy hair and beads, the mod and the odd intermingled. I’d never been with it; among these Flower Children I was just an elderly weed. But now, under the circumstances, perhaps I’d better blossom forth.

I glanced at Sandy. There were worse fates than sharing a pad with her. At least it might be a temporary solution, until my agent came up with another job.

“Okay, it’s a deal,” I told her “I’ll sneak my things out of the apartment and move in tomorrow.”

“Crazy,” she said. “Turn right at the next corner—that’s Basic Drive.”

I turned right at the next corner and started the climb up a dark and deserted hillside street.

And that’s where the crunch came.

The crunch, and the squeal as I applied my brakes—just a moment too late to avoid impact. Apparently the street hadn’t been entirely deserted after all, because there was a crumpled figure lying on the pavement before my car.

Sandy and I opened our doors simultaneously, and a moment later we stood staring down at the yellow-suited, gray-booted little form sprawled in the street “Hippy outfit,” Sandy murmured. “But he’s just a kid—”

I nodded, then stooped and turned him over gently. His eyes were dosed and I couldn’t distinguish his features here in the deepening darkness. But his chest rose and fell regularly, and that’s what mattered the most to me at the moment.

“He’s alive.”

I gestured to Sandy. “Hold the door open while I get him in.” Lifting him carefully, I placed him in the front seat of the car, right in the middle, so that when Sandy climbed in on her side he was propped up between us. “Hang onto him now,” I told her. Sandy nodded obediently. Then she gasped.

“What’s the matter?”

“His face—he’s turning green!”

“Shock.”

I glanced over. My diagnosis was correct, but I had the wrong patient It was Sandy who was in shock. She sat there, gaping and pointing, trying to speak.

“His hands are green, too—” I shook my head grimly. “Hold tight. We may break a few speed records, but I’ve got to get him to a hospital.”

It was then that I felt the stirring beside me. It was then that I turned to see the yellow eyes pop open and the wide mouth part in a grin. The head twisted towards me and I heard the words.

“Not hospital.”

A hand rose up in a restraining gesture. A hand that was perhaps a paw—with a thumb and only three fingers.

“Not hospital,” the voice repeated firmly. And the next words fell like a knell of doom. “Take me to your leader.”

III

Now the Strip is filled with undersized specimens who wear far-out outfits. Some of them even cover their hands and faces with psychedelic designs in paint. Down there I’d probably never have given this one a second glance, but here in the lonely darkness of the hillside it was different. Everything about him was different—his costume, his complexion, his size and his eyes. The face was froglike and that three-fingered paw was neither batrachian nor human.

“Crazy!” Sandy whispered.

And it was.

Sandy seemed relieved now that the creatine had spoken, but I didn’t share her reaction.

“Don’t you understand?” I muttered. “He’s an alien.”

“So what? I’ve got nothing against foreigners.”

“But he’s not an ordinary foreigner—he’s extra-terrestrial.”

“Nobody’s perfect,” she told me “The important thing is he’s not hurt.” She turned to the creature. “Isn’t that right, man?”

“Not man. Drool.”

“Drool? Is that your name?”

“Yes. In your speech. Mine is different. Like you say, something else.”

“You’re something else!” Sandy shook her head. “Are you really an alien, like Joe says?”

The creature nodded. “I tell it like it is, man.”

Sandy stared at him. “Where did you learn how to speak such perfect English?”

“In the ship.”

I got into the act. “You came in a ship? From where?”

“Up.” The green hand gestured. “Another planet?”

Drool nodded. “But the ship was yours. Krool found it. What you call spacecraft. Hardware. One of yours—empty.”

I shook my head, but not in doubt. It was all too possible in these days of Top Security. We might have sent out an advanced-design spacecraft on a secret test flight. If something went wrong and its crew was lost, the ship would go on, drifting through space until it fell into the paws of creatures like these. Creatures like—"Krool," Sandy murmured. "Who is he?"

"Boss. Big Daddy. Father of us all. Like me, only twenty times more. He looks like—"

Drool went on to describe his father's appearance, and I didn't like what I heard at all. According to him, his sire was a cross between a sabre-toothed tiger and a giant multi-colored leopard. And he had no paternal affection for his son, because Drool was the runt of the litter.

"My brothers and sisters are normal, all four million of them. But I don't grow. Maybe not the right chromosomes, maybe no blue genes. Krool is very up-tight about it. So when he found the ship, he took me off with him. A long journey, but the charts told him how to go, and the handling was simple. You are still quite primitive, right?"

"Let me get this straight," I said. "Your father brought you here in a ship. But if the crew was missing, how did you learn our language?"

"The crew left much literature to read and study. What you call comic books."

That explained his speech pattern. I wondered what else this alien had learned of our contemporary culture. But there were more important concerns right now. "Where is this ship?"

"Krool took it back."

"After he landed you here?"

"Not landed. Dropped. Bad trip, man."

It was beginning to sound like one to me. "He dropped you out of the ship into space?"

"Only a few feet. Nobody saw us because of the air. Like it's a gas, man?"

"Smog," I told him. And visualized the hovering space-craft, the gigantic creature at the controls, dropping this little creature down to land before the car in the street with no one the wiser. It could happen that way. Anything could happen twenty feet above our heads and we'd never know it because of the prevailing pollution. It transmogrified everything it touched.

"How cruddy!" Sandy exclaimed. "Cutting out on you like that—leaving you all alone in a strange place, not caring if you live or die—"

"He cares," Drool assured her. "I am not left to die. It is just that I am so weak and small. I can't come on like my brothers and sisters when they are sent to the big, important worlds. So Krool brings me to this earth because it will not be a problem for me." He nodded. "Krool says even a child Gan do it here."

"Do what?"

"My thing."

"Which is?"

"The same as my brothers and sisters do when they go to the better-class planets. They conquer."

I turned to him. "Let's have that line again. You're really here to conquer earth. That's your plan?"

"That's my bag. So take me to your leader."

"Sure." I nodded. "And then what?"

Drool smiled happily. "Then I merely blast him with my superdisintegratosonic—opps!"

He sat there, suddenly silent as his green face slowly paled to chartreuse.

Sandy eyed him anxiously. "What's the matter?"

"Krool gave me one. I knew I had it when he lifted me out. I must have dropped it—"

"Your weapon?"

Drool nodded, frowning. "It's probably still floating around somewhere in the smog—almost weightless, you know—" He broke off and peered at me anxiously. "But if I lost it, how do I—"

"You don't," I told him. "And that's final." I tromped on the gas-pedal. "Let's go."

"Where are you taking him?" Sandy's voice was apprehensive.

It was a good question, but at the moment I didn't have any good answers. Police? The Orphan's Home? Lost And Found Department?

The answer came with clarion clarity. For as I started the motor, the car was suddenly filled with soaring sound.

"Ooh!" Sandy squealed. "The Galloping Cruds!"

And indeed it was. With ear-splitting precision, that popular hard-rock group belted out their latest hit. As the guitars twanged and the drums echoed the beat, the voices proclaimed a moving message.

"I'd like to turn you on, baby. But I can't find the switch—"

Sandy cupped her hands and shouted, "Groovy! But turn it down a little."

"Sorry," I yelled. "I don't have a radio in the car."

Sandy stared at me.

I stared at her.

Then we both just stared at Drool.

His wide mouth was wide open. And from it poured the sound of electric guitars, the thud of drums, the cacaphonic blending of five male voices.

"Impossible!" I breathed and clapped my hand across Drool's mouth.

The sound blurred instantly.

I removed my hand quickly and Drool looked up. "What's with you, man?" he inquired.

Sandy was still staring at him. "Was that really you singing?"

"Yeah. Don't you dig it?"

Sandy nodded. "But how on earth—?"

"Not on earth." Drool grinned, "In the ship. There was an instrument—stereo tape machine—I listened while I read the comic books."

"Wait a minute." I stopped the car again and faced him. "Are you trying to tell us you can imitate anything you hear recorded?" Drool shrugged. "Why not?"

"You mean you can do all those voices at once, plus the guitars and drums?"

"The sounds are very simple."

"Your vocal cords must be tied in Boy Scout knots."

Sandy raised her hand. "Wait a minute." Drool glanced at her and she continued. "Can you do the Zappers?"

Drool opened his mouth, and the answer came. The Zappers—two male minstrels, two female minstrels, and one interlocuter-type—began to wail their Golden Record classic, Doobie-Do Or Doobie-Don't You? With full orchestral background.

Then Drool did a pop ballad by Eddie Breech and the Clouts. After that, a small filet of soul music, followed by a children's recording of East Indian raga, featuring the soft tones of a baby sitar.

"Wild!" Sandy shook her head. "I don't believe it!"

"Hearing is believing," I told her. "What you've been listening to is the sound of fifty million dollars—pouring right into our laps."

I put my hand on Drool's shoulder. "Still want to conquer earth?" I asked.

He nodded eagerly, then frowned. "But how—?"

"Leave everything to us," I assured him. "I think it can be arranged."

IV

As Jack the Ripper used to say, hour's that for openers?

Between the time Drool finished his concert and the time we parked in Sandy's driveway I had it all figured.

Sandy started to follow my reasoning and ended up way ahead of me. "It's a big deal. We're going to have to use the others."

“What others?”

Sandy gestured up at the imposing mansion which loomed against the hilltop horizon. “I told you I didn’t live here alone,” she said. “Come along—you’ll see.”

We left the car and moved up the walk. I put my hand on Drool’s shoulder.

“Remember your instructions. Speak only when you’re spoken to and let us do the talking. Play it cool.”

He nodded, and we entered.

Then it was my turn to remember instructions. But I found it very difficult to keep my cool in the overheated atmosphere of Sandy’s pad.

Somehow I hadn’t expected her to live in a twenty-room mansion, complete with marble floors, a fireplace in every bedroom, and an indoor swimming pool.

“Don’t you recognize where you are?” she murmured. “It’s the old Riga Mortice place.”

Something clicked, and I nodded. I remembered Riga Mortice very well indeed. She had been a popular entertainer during my childhood, until illness forced her retirement No longer a bouncy, bubbling ingenue, she became a victim of alcohol, narcotics and diet-pills. But her fans never deserted her, and when she emerged to make a comeback on a singing tour, her popularity boomed again. Her first appearance, weak and wan and forty pounds lighter, had sparked something in the souls of a hundred million middle-aged female fans, who identified with her because of their own hypochondria. Since they themselves were on a daily diet of sleeping pills, pep pills, water pills, reducing pills, tranquilizers and laxatives, Riga Mortice became their heroine. They flocked to her concerts, not to hear her voice but merely to see if she’d manage to last out the performance. Whenever she cancelled an engagement or took an overdose of liquor, popular enthusiasm increased; some of the adoring lady fans even kept scrapbooks filled with clippings on her suicide attempts. Her appearance on crutches brought applause; her tour in a wheelchair was a smash hit, and when she finally began to sing to her public from a microphone built into an iron lung, she was Number One Box Office.

"Riga Mortice," I murmured.

"Of course! Whatever happened to her?"

"Something terrible," Sandy sighed. "She got healthy."

I shook my head. "Sad, isn't it? Here was a gal who had everything—neurasthenia, self-destructive tendencies, a manic-depressive psychosis—what a shame to lose all that talent!"

"She lost this house, too," Sandy explained. "That's when we moved in."

"We?"

"I and the others." Sandy was leading Drool and me along an imposing corridor panelled in solid mahogany from floor to thirty-foot ceiling.

"But how can you afford it?"

"Because we're all on unemployment compensation. There's six of us here—that is, until we lost one of our tenants yesterday. He got a job and moved into a one-room furnished apartment Now he can't afford to stay here."

"But isn't he making more money—?"

"Look. His job only pays him a hundred and fifty a week. We each get seventy-five dollars in compensation."

"I don't understand."

"Our seventy-five is net, tax free. But after this poor guy pays commission to his agent, and deductions are taken from his check for income tax, surtax, social security, state disability insurance and all the rest, he winds up with less bread than we have."

I was beginning to get the picture. Six times seventy-five is four hundred and fifty dollars a week—more than enough to pay the rent on. even such a palatial pad as this one. And that's why Sandy had scouted the Unemployment Office; she needed to replace the sixth tenant with a new resident, such as me.

Sandy smiled at me. “How about that?” she inquired, gesturing at the sweep and thrust of the three-story staircase which rose at the end of the hall. “Where else could you find such a glad pad for seventy-five per, including food, liquor and gas for your wheels?”

I glanced around. “Something’s missing, though. I don’t see any chairs and tables.”

“Oh, that!” She made a gesture of dismissal. “We don’t have any yet. But we’re planning to buy some period furniture—on monthly payments, of course. Meanwhile, we just make do.” She steered Drool and me toward an ornate double door. “But come on and meet the others.”

The others were gathered the cocktail hour at the drained indoor swimming pool. Seated inside it, with their bottoms touching bottom, they gave us glasses and greetings.

Seldom have I seen such a collection of disparate types, but as Sandy made the introductions I began to sense that they were desperate types as well. All of them had one thing in common—they were born losers.

Sandy led me to a spade-bearded, scholarly-looking gentleman whose name was Mr. Barf. Regarding me mournfully, he started to rise and I waved him back. “Please don’t get up on my account,” I told him.

Barf broke into a sudden smile. “Thank you. I prefer it here at the bottom of the pool.”

“Mr. Barf is our philosopher,” Sandy explained. “He once tried to drown himself in Walden Pond.”

“Unsuccessfully, I fear,” Barf sighed. “Next time I hope to be more Thoreau about it.”

The wan little man beside him scowled at me. “What did you mean by that ‘on my account’ crack?” he demanded suspiciously.

“Don’t mind Mr. Emia,” Sandy whispered. “He’s very sensitive about such things. He used to be the cashier in a blood-bank, but they fired him for embezzlement.” Luke Emia glowered at me but accepted my hand in greeting Sandy moved with me to a mopheaded young man whose psychedelic jacket was covered with buttons, although he still looked as if he didn’t have all of his own. “Mr. Grafitti,” she announced. “He writes a column for one of the underground newspapers.”

“—,” said Grafitti, pleasantly. Warmed by his greeting, I moved on to the next tenant. This young man, introduced to me simply as Swinger, was so ragged, filthy and unkempt that I automatically pegged him as a musician. Such proved to be the case. He had once been part of a recording group, he told me, until he suffered a nasty shock—when his electronic harmonica had short-circuited on a high note and blown all the caps off his teeth. Since that time, apparently, he’d nursed a grudge against all performers including singers, and carried on an active crusade against them.

“I just got busted,” he concluded mournfully.

“Not again?” Sandy sighed. “What happened?”

“Well, I read where Tony Bennett was opening at a dub here in town, and you know what that means. Last night I went down there, and when he came on and started singing I Lost My Heart In San Francisco, I walked up on the stage and handed him one. It was only a beef-heart, of course, but the fuzz hauled me in anyway.” Shaking her head in commiseration, Sandy led me to the last member of the gathering, a dapper balding man who greeted me with a firm handdasp.

“Kotic’s the name,” he told me. “But you can call me Cy.”

I blinked in sudden recognition. “Not the Drive-In Psychiatrist? The one Who used to set up his couch in the parking lot over in Beverly Hills?”

“Five couches,” he announced proudly. “A regular open-air clinic.” His smile faded. “But I got out of the racket. It is a racket, you know. Head-shrinkers don’t do you any good—the thing to do is get your head Sanforized. I retired to work out my new theories.”

During this exchange, Drool had been standing patiently and silently at my side. Now Mr. Kotic eyed him speculatively.

"Who's your sickie friend?" he inquired.

"He's not sick," Sandy declared. "Well, he's too short to be the Jolly Green Giant," Kotic muttered. "And you must admit he is green around the gills. In fact, during my entire professional career I've never seen anyone look greener. Ergo, he must be ill. Note the hyperthyroid bulge of his eyes, the reddish pupils, the nasal malformation and the labial deformity. I've been a psychiatrist too long not to recognize a real ding-a-ling when I see one."

I gave Sandy a quick glance and she picked up her cue. "That's no way to talk about my cousin," she retorted.

"Cousin?" Barf's eyebrows rose.

"That's right. He's a hippy from San Francisco," he murmured. "Haight-Ashbury."

Luke Emia rose and approached him curiously. "What's your name, man?"

Drool had learned his answers well. "Sneed Hearn," he said.

"————!" sneered Grafitti.

"You can say that again," muttered the Swinger. "Like, I mean all us old W.C. Fields fans know that 'Sneed Hearn' is a name he made up and used in The Old Fashioned Way."

I paled. Stupid of me not to remember that today's In Group were old film buffs.

"All right," Swinger persisted. "Lay it on us, man. Who is this creep?"

Cy Kotic moved closer to the hapless Drool, who shrank from his professional scrutiny. "I can't identify the syndrome yet," the psychiatrist muttered. "But I am getting a definite gut reaction from him. That is to say, he's making me sick at my stomach."

"————?" Grafitti inquired.

"A good question." Barf joined the group clustered around Drool and nodded philosophically.

Sandy gave me a helpless look, land I stepped forward.

“All right,” I said. “Guess there’s no sense trying to conceal the truth from you. It would have to come out sooner or later.”

“Joe!” Sandy’s voice sounded an alarm.

“I know what I’m doing,” I assured her. “Come on, everybody drink up and I’ll plug you in.”

And that, of course, was exactly the procedure. They passed the drinks, and I passed the word.

Half an hour later they were falling out of their trees as Drool’s open mouth emitted a stereophonic version of the latest protest-song recorded by that group of militant young rebels known as Tarzan and All the Apes.

By the time he closed his mouth, theirs were hanging open.

“Well?” I murmured. “How did that grab you? Think he can conquer the world now?”

“————!” said Grafitti.

Which just about summed it up.

V

Sandy sent out for some Chinese food from Pu King’s, and we huddled over the meal discussing the deal.

Grafitti’s reaction was shared by most of the others. Only Barf seemed to have reservations.

“I don’t know,” he mused. “This may not be the most propitious time for such a project. After all, Mars is in conjunction with Uranus—”

“Watch your language,” Sandy cautioned him. Then to me: “Mr. Barf is not only a philosopher, he’s an astrologer.”

“That’s his problem,” I told her, “My horoscope tells me not to put any faith in astrology.”

“I don’t know anything about astrology,” declared Swinger, his words filtering through a mouthful of fried rice. “But with that voice, we can’t miss. And the way he does all of that instrumental accompaniment too—man, it’s something else!”

Drool blushed a deeper shade viridan at the compliment and lowered his head modestly over the sweet-and-sour pork.

I waved a forkful of chow-mein at the gathering.

“The way I see it, we’ve got a winning team. As Swinger says, Drool has a voice that doesn’t quit He can sing anything, in any style, imitating any group and any orchestration or accompaniment. But he’s got something else that’s equally important.”

“And what’s that?” Luke Emia inquired. “What else has he got?”

“The uglies.” I jabbed my fork in Drool’s direction. “Look at him—did you ever see a more repulsive, disgusting specimen in your life?”

Drool popped his eyes at me, and I quickly shook my head. “I’m not putting you down,” I said, hastily. “This is your most important asset.”

“I don’t get it,” Sandy said.

“You will, if you stop and think. What makes one hard rock group more popular than another today? It can’t be the difference in musical arrangements, because they all use the same beat or off-beat revved up to Total Sound, or Total Sound Effects. It can’t be variations in singing style, because they all have the same delivery—nobody understands the words. Even the soloist soul-singers and the protest groups sound basically alike, snarling about love or crooning about hate. So what’s that extra ingredient which makes a star?”

“Appearance?” Swinger ventured.

I swallowed my chow-mein and nodded. “Exactly! Years ago it was enough for a nice-looking kid to come out on the stage and make anguished faces while he sang. Then it became necessary for him to contort his body in spastic spasms in order to make a pleasing impression on the audience—since he sounded as if he was having a fit, he might as well look like he was, too.

“But as audiences grew more sophisticated, that wasn’t enough any more. Singers started to dress in weirdo outfits. Wild colors and sequins at one extreme, rags and blue-jeans at the other—it didn't matter which, as long as the pants were tight enough.

"Then came the real revolution. Not just the change in clothe, but the change in bodies. First we had sideburns, then long hair, then the bushy mop. The beards and mustaches followed—mostly amongst the males. Now we have dark glasses, granny glasses, tattooing, psychedelic makeup, the works. The ugliest-looking singers, making the ugliest sounds and using the ugliest words, make the most beautiful dollars."

Cy Kotic nodded in emphatic agreement. "He tells it like it is," he declared. "Today's singing star must give the audience the whole sado-masochistic mystique, and no mistake. Oral aggression in the words, revolt against the Establishment in the clothing—that takes care of the latent hostility. And for the self-pitying component, that finds its expression in the downbeat, beat-up look.

"I see great possibilities here. Because our little friend is probably the weirdest-looking freak-out yet. Consider his assets! He's noseless, almost bald, built like a one-man disaster area, and best of all, he's green!" Cy Kotic smiled at Drool admiringly. "I don't want you to get a big head over this, but as a practicing psychiatrist it is my professional opinion that you're the most miserable-looking yutz I've ever encountered."

It was my turn to rise and step forward. "You see? With Drool's natural gifts of voice and appearance he can't miss. All he needs is the proper management team behind him. And that's where we ah come in."

"We do?" Luke Emia muttered.

"Of course. Every star must have an entourage, and we're it Sandy, here, will handle the secretarial duties. Mr. Emia, with his banking experience, is a natural for treasurer. Swinger, we'll need yon for music and arrangements."

Grafitti cleared his throat "————?" he ventured.

"Songs are no good without lyrics," I reminded him. "And with your background in the underground press, you know all the right wrong words. Consider yourself a lyricist."

"————" said Grafitti, gratefully.

I turned my attention to Cy Kotic. "You, of course, will be invaluable as our psychological consultant in public relations. Handle our ads, our presentation format And I, naturally, am going to function as agent and business manager. And that's the wrap-up, kiddies."

Mr. Barf cleared his throat timidly. "What about me?"

"Well," I hedged. "Maybe we can use some astrological predictions along the way. Advice from the stars to a star, that sort of thing."

"I've got another suggestion." Surprisingly enough, it was Sandy who spoke. "Mr. Barf here knows a great deal about the world and its ways. After all, he's a philosopher."

Barf nodded. "That's why I tried to kill myself," he agreed. Sandy moved to Drool and placed her hand on his shoulder. "You say all you know about earth is what you learned from listening to the radio and reading comic books."

"Right," Drool conceded.

"Then there you have it," Sandy told me. "Mr. Barf can be Drool's teacher. Let him educate Drool, broaden his knowledge, expand his horizons—"

"Okay," I said. "Just as long as he doesn't teach him so much that he'll want to drown himself."

"Have no fear," Barf said. "The swimming pool is empty."

And it was, because we all climbed up and crowded our way into the hall, glasses held high. Sandy refilled them quickly.

"A toast, then," I proposed. "A toast to that new singing sensation of the nation—that multi-voiced marvel, star of radio, television, motion pictures, recording artiste and just plain little old multi-millionaire—Sneed Hearn!"

We gulped our drinks. "That does it," I declared. "And now, beddy-bye for everybody. Got a big day scheduled for tomorrow." Drool glanced at me. “Where are we going?”

“To launch your career,” I answered. “Bright and early, we’re off to Groovyland.”

VI

It was early when we started, but not bright.

As the car rolled down the ramp and inched itself into the morning traffic on the freeway, I switched on the fog-lights. It was the only way to go, here in the yellowish, billowing murk that shrouded our bumper-to-bumper crawl.

Drool sat beside me. I glanced past him at Sandy. She sat utterly still, eyes closed in concentration.

“Something wrong?”

Sandy shook her head. “Just doing my yoga. The stop-breathing exercises. It’s the only way to cope with the smog.”

Drool took a deep breath. “I like this air,” he announced. “It reminds me of home. The—what do you call it?—smog is very nourishing.”

“That reminds me of something,” I said. “You didn’t touch your food last night.”

“I don’t have to eat,” Drool announced. “All I need is this.” And he took another deep breath.

“Well, I do.” Sandy glanced at the torturous tangle of the interchange. “When we get out of this mess, let’s have some breakfast.”

We were well past Pomona before the traffic thinned and we pulled off onto the highway leading to our destination.

“Breakfast it is,” I said. “Let’s try this place.”

The El Ulcero was a typical roadside restaurant, very spic and Spanish. As Sandy concluded ordering, I whispered to the waiter. “Where’s the Juan?”

Drool accompanied me, although he had no need to. I eyed him curiously. He didn't eat and last night he hadn't slept—just sat beside me as I curled up in the sleeping-bag Sandy gave me. Apparently his physiological needs were different from ours. But at the moment it was the difference in his appearance that worried me. The waiter had stared at him suspiciously, and I began to wish that I'd told Drool to stay in the car.

But I couldn't hide him away forever, and we rejoined Sandy at the table.

Immediately the waiter was at our side. "The leetle boy," he murmured. "He ees not eating."

"Not hungry," I said, curtly. "Mus' be seeck," the waiter observed. "Behold of the face. Ees very green, no?"

"Yes," I challenged. "What's the matter, haven't you ever seen a green face before?"

"Only after eating here," the waiter shrugged.

He stepped up to Drool.

"Observe of the hands. They also are green."

"Of course," I told him. "The kid's a natural-born gardener. Haven't you heard of a green thumb?"

Nudging Sandy, I whispered, "Let's get out of here."

We rose, paid the check and fled. The waiter stared after us, muttering to himself.

"Got to watch it," I told my companions as we climbed back into the car. "Remember, when we get to Groovyland, I do all the talking."

"What is this Groovyland?" Drool demanded.

"You'll see."

We moved through the tourist traffic and approached the glittering gates at a brisk crawl while I pondered his question.

Once upon a time we were a nation of happy voyeurs. Visually-oriented by the theatre, motion pictures and television, we were content to move through life as spectators, even at sporting events. We went to zoos, museums, aquariums.

But the more we saw, the more jaded we became, and the more we resented the barriers. The footlights barred us from the stage, movies and television separated us from events by a screen, the bars kept us from the zoo animals, the museum exhibits and the fish in the aquariums were under glass, and the sporting events took place in stadia a half-mile away from our reserved seats.

Everyone wants a seat on the fifty-yard line. At a parade, the biggest thrill is to be up close.

As we got up tighter in our daily lives, the need to get up closer in our entertainment-escapes increased.

Came colonial Williamsburg, where you can actually walk down the reconstructed street of a preRevolutionary village. Came planetariums where the stars are still an illusion—but they surround you on all sides. Came Marineland where the fish leap out of the water and the seals and dolphins perform close enough to splash you. Came Disneyland, with its trips and happenings.

Trips and happenings. Perhaps that's the answer. The need to see combined with the need to be. To make viewing a personal experience, to momentarily enjoy a feeling of actual participation. In this regimented, automated, digit-dialling, zip-coded impersonal world where the tedium is the message, we're cut off from close contact with reality. So out of artifice, we construct our own.

Drugs for trips, happenings for audience involvement. But drugs are dangerous and happenings demanding.

Hence Disneyland, with its safe and easy surrogates—synthetic trips to synthetic worlds, happenings where nothing really happens. That's a lot.

But Groovyland is the most.

"The most!" I repeated to Drool, guiding him through the turnstile and laying out $22.50 for three admissions.

"Why lay out all the loot?" Sandy asked.

"Don't worry, we'll be rolling in it right after we set our deal here. But first I want to show Drool around a little. He ought to know what he's getting into—it's part of his education."

We got into plenty, but I don't know how educational it was to our green-faced guest.

Psycholand he didn't dig at all. The idea of entering a fake mental hospital as a make-believe patient and getting a free personality-profile and a ten-minute analysis from a plastic psychiatrist while lying on a plastic couch just didn't do anything for him. He wouldn't try on a straitjacket or take an I.Q. test, nor was he interested in the computerized dating-rating.

Sandy tried her best. "Why don't you sit down and fill out the questions on this card?" she coaxed.

"What for?"

"The machine will process your answers and indicate your best choice for a marriage partner. It's what we call a computer match."

Drool shrugged. "Who wants to marry a computer?" he asked.

I took him out of there fast and led him into Grislyland. The results here were hardly more encouraging. The medieval torture devices left him cold; even the strappado didn't give him a boot. Nor did he care for the Chamber of Horrors with its wax-figure criminals and its replicas of television comedians.

"Try Heroland," Sandy suggested, sensing Drool's lack of interest. "He should get some jollies there."

I nodded. "Wait until he sees George Washington," I said.

Quickly we entered Heroland and I led Drool proudly over to the little auditorium where, as I remembered, every fifteen minutes or so a remarkable event took place. Before the assembled audience an amazingly clever animated figure of the Father of our Country rose from a chair and walked to center stage, there to deliver Washington's Second Inaugural Address.

"This you've got to hear!" I told Drool, happily.

But when we reached the auditorium we found it deserted; the stage itself was bare.

A bored attendant was sweeping the floor near the doorway and I collared him. "What gives?" I inquired. "Where is Washington?"

"Took him away yesterday," the attendant informed me.

"What a shame!" I glanced at Drool. "I wanted you to see it—the most lifelike automaton you could ever imagine—"

"Too lifelike," the attendant volunteered. "That's why they took him away."

"What do you mean?"

"Hear tell he was sold to a bunch of politicians. The way election campaigns are going nowadays, they figure to put this dummy on television, let him give his speech, and run him for governor."

"Might have a chance at that," I agreed. "Considering some of the speeches I've heard other dummies make. After all, he's got a good name and a familiar face. This is what they buy."

"Not those lemon-faced voters in Orange County," Sandy reminded me. "The minute they remember that Washington had something to do with the Constitution, they'll vote against him. He's too left-wing for them."

She had a point there.

But I was rapidly losing points with Drool. There was just one possible way left to hook his attention, and I decided to take it. I dragged him over to Bodyland.

Now all of the other lands in Groovyland are housed in separate buildings. Bodyland is different—because Bodyland is the building.

Drool's eyes bugged when he saw it, and frankly, I don't blame him. Even though this wasn't my first visit here, my eyes protruded.

Picture a naked woman three hundred feet tall and proportionately proportioned, tipped over so that die is lying on her stomach. Fluorescent lights flash from her staring eyes as you approach her open mouth, and the lights blind you. Yet you must approach, because that’s how you enter Bodyland—through her mouth.

“Step over the lower incisors,” I told Drool. “Then sit on her tongue and we’ll slide down her throat.” Sandy glanced across at me over Drool’s head and winked. It was unnecessary; I could already sense his kindled interest.

Together we seated ourselves on the pink, plushy surface of the tongue. Somewhere deep inside the inner recesses of the giant figure, a motor began to hum. Slowly the tongue elevated at an angle, propelling us into the throat cavity beyond.

“Duck your head,” I cautioned. “We’re coming to the tonsils!” They loomed overhead, brilliantly illuminated, and we passed them en route to the tunneling throat. It received us as we shot off the tongue and shot, at a steeper angle, along a neon-lit esophagus. Then we landed in the vast, hollow cavern of the stomach, its well-lighted lining disclosing a network of passages on every side and overhead.

Drool glanced around in open curiosity.

He nodded quickly. “Oh, yes. Everything.” He turned to Sandy. “I never realized there was so much inside you.”

“I’ve got a lot of guts, if that’s what you mean.” But Sandy wasn’t displeased by the observation. Quickly we led Drool on a conducted tour of the human anatomy—through the lungs, along the aorta into the ventricles, past the bronchia, then doubled back along a maze of veins. Pausing to wait for arterial traffic, I branched off into the liver, spleen and kidneys. Everything was well lit, and there were little signs on the walls of each organ or passage to chart our route.

“Remarkable, isn’t it?” Drool beamed at me happily.

“You’re getting the real inside story,” I assured him. “This exhibit is endorsed by the Secretary of the Interior.”

With plastic bone-structure and muscle-sheathing gleaming on all sides, we wound our way through the labyrinthine intricacies of canals, ducts and sinus cavities until we were confronted with another corridor, darker and longer than the others.

Sandy peered into it. “What’s this?” she queried. “One of the canals?”

“Alimentary, my dear Watson,” I said.

Grasping her wrist, I started forward. “Join, hands now, because we’re going to loop the loop a few times, and we’ll need some intestinal traction.”

“Isn’t there another way to go?.”

For answer I pointed up at one of the small, neatly lettered signs—Please Exit Thru Rear.

Climbing, clambering, then crawling, we did just that and finally emerged again amidst Groovyland’s vortex of vacationing visitors.

“Satisfied?” I asked Drool.

He nodded. “It was fascinating. Next time we must go to the head—”

“They don’t have one in there,” I informed him, then realized what he was referring to. “Yes, we’ll do that,” I amended quickly. “But right now we’ve got another head to visit. The head of this enterprise—Sylvester Schlock.”

VII

Sylvester Schlock rose from behind his desk and threw his cigar at me.

“How dare you?” he spluttered. “How dare you come to me with a proposition like this?”

I shrugged with outward calm, but inwardly I echoed the question to myself. Approaching this fabulous showman had not been easy. For I, like all the world, knew the Schlock story.

Sylvester Schlock was the most controversial figure in the world of show biz. His admirers said he was a self-made man. His enemies agreed, but pointed out that this merely indicated. what you got when you used cheap labor.

His boosters stated that Schlock had been born in a log cabin. His detractors reminded you that the log cabin had been built atop his father's penthouse, where that multi-millionaire eccentric chose to recreate a rural atmosphere.

It is true, as Schlock's friends state, that he worked his way through school. But it is also true, as enemies assert, that he had to do so because his father disowned him, and he had worked his way through medical college as a corpse-washer in a Forest Laundromat.

In any case, Sylvester Schlock graduated and began his practice as a physician. His supporters remind you that he gained a brilliant reputation as a proctologist. His foes assert that the reason he gave up his specialty is because he could never identify his patients when they came face to face with him, and he took a dim view of humanity.

Be that as it may, Schlock retired to an area east of Los Angeles, where he owned a thousand acres of barren desert land, and it was here that Groovyland was born.

At first he operated on the lowest level of entertainment—the roadside tourist trap. Crude signposts along the highway urged motorists to Visit The Monster Museum! and Feed The Ravenous Reptiles! The monster museum turned out to be a small snake-pit Schlock stocked the pit with specimens he found wriggling over his own property, and the ravenous reptiles were merely toads or gecko lizards. But enough cars stopped and enough quarters poured in to enable Schlock to expand. He added a tiny restaurant to his enterprise. Here, his champions say, he attracted a growing clientele because of the unusual flavor of his burgers. His opponents admit the flavor was unusual, but hint he used the same source of supply for his food as he did for stocking his snake-pit.

Snakeburgers or no, Schlock did have the only eatery in all that stretch of dreary desert—to say nothing of the only restrooms.

To say that Groovyland was founded on the receipts from a public pay-toilet would be a vast oversimplification, but it is true that Schlock always gave the customers what they wanted.

He next incorporated an amusement park and carnival, not hesitating to use the lowest carny attractions. And it was here that his unusual genius for entertainment first came into play. Noting that people would pay money for almost anything—even to see a geek bite the head off a chicken—Schlock added refinements. On Thanksgiving Day he advertised that his geek would bite the head off a turkey. And before long, just for the kiddies, he had a junior geek who bit the heads off canaries.

Success breeds success, and from that point on Sylvester Schlock soared. He obtained financing and started Groovyland with its first major attraction—a typically phony frontier town which he called Tombstone Territory. It had the usual livery stables and saloons for atmosphere, plus Central Casting cowboys, but Schlock added an extra. No doubt harking back to his pre-med days, he built a Boot Hill cemetery plot, with genuine tombstones. Here, driving around in the comfort of a Rent-a-Hearse, one could follow the progress of a daily western drama; see an outlaw apprehended for rustling cattle, watch his two-minute trial, attend the subsequent hanging in which a very skilled stunt-man literally risked his neck at every performance) and then observe the digging of a grave and the burial of the outlaw as a grand finale.

Perhaps this is the point where Schlock really made his start. Certainly it was a stroke of sheer genius when he altered the program to include audience participation. Now, for a given fee, one could purchase tickets to join a posse and ride after the outlaw. Another ticket entitled a customer to serve on the jury during the trial. For a considerable extra sum, some lucky member of the audience could play executioner during the hanging. And the biggest kick—at the largest price, of course—was to join the burial party and help dig the grave in which the outlaw was interred.

Schlock had fathomed the secret at last, and now there was no stopping him. Within the next decade, Groovyland rose from the dusty desert like the pleasure dome of Kublai Khan. Came Monkeyland, where you put on the ape-suit and swung through the branches of the artificial trees; came all the other lands, plus facilities for weddings, christenings, conventions, bar mitzvahs and actual burials in what was somewhat painfully described as a "real, live cemetery" adjoining the private landing-field.

Finally, came The Hall of the Mountain King—a gigantic open-air cavern, with rocky walls moulded of genuine papier-mache, in which outdoor concerts were held every weekend. Here the top singing stars performed, the hit combos, the Name Attractions.

A booking at Groovyland could make a national reputation overnight and pave the way for television, a spot in Vegas, films, recordings, the works. So it was here, naturally, that I determined to launch the career of the entity I'd introduced to Schlock as Sneed Hearn.

No wonder he'd hurled his cigar at me. But now, as I stared into Sylvester Schlock's heated countenance, I came on cool.

"He's a great singer," I said softly. "Wait until you hear him."

"This is a singer?" Schlock startled scornfully at Drool. "I can't even stand the sight of him, let alone the sound."

"What's wrong with his looks?" Sandy inquired.

"He's green!" Schlock lifted his arms in an imploring gesture. "Do you think for a moment I'm going to put my audience at the mercy of some green kid?"

This, as we say in the industry, was my cue—and Drool's. I signaled, he stepped forward, he opened his mouth.

Out came a perfect reproduction of that smash singsational group, Vermin and the Varmints.

Schlock reached for another cigar, but he didn't throw it. He didn't even light it, just sat wideeyed and open-eared as Drool poured it on.

Without pausing for breath. Drool launched into a second selection. This one, with an oriental beat, was Yogi and the Yo-Yos punching out What Makes Swami Run?

Drool was just about ready to launch an imitation of Charlie Horse and the Bruised Tendons when Schlock's cigar levelled in imperial command.

"Stop!" he shouted. "Enough, already!"

I noticed that the hand holding the cigar was shaking. So was Schlock's head. "I don't know how you do it, young man," he groaned, "but never in my life have I heard anything so atrocious, so abominable, so positively disgusting! In other words, you sound exactly like those groups you're Imitating. And if it's bad enough foe me, it's good enough for the audience."

Pointing his Havana Imperfecto at me, Schlock got down to business. "Our next big concert is scheduled for a week from Saturday. What do you say to a spot for your boy at three G's?"

I shrugged. "Forget it."

Sandy gave me a glance that was strictly distress merchandise, but I ignored her.

"Okay, five G's but that's my top quote, and I'll want repeat options on —"

"No," I said.

"But you can't get any more the first time out, not even from the Sullivan Show—"

"No," I repeated. "We don't want any money."

Now both Sandy and Schlock were sending out distress signals. I smiled at them happily.

"We'll let our boy perform for you absolutely free of charge," I told him. "But on one condition."

"Name it."

"He's not going to have a spot in your concert a week from Saturday. He is the concert."

"The whole show, all by himself?" Schlock did something new with the cigar; he swallowed it.

"What's the matter, don't you think it's possible? You heard him."

"But—"

I brushed objections aside. "He can take the place of any solo singer, any singing group, any combination of instruments and instrumentalists. What more do you need?"

"I know," Schlock conceded. "It's just that a one-man concert is practically unheard of. Even the so-called one-man shows are usually backed up by a supporting act to open the bill."

"My boy supports himself," I said. "And if you'll give him a chance, he'll support you, too. This act is going to sell a lot of tickets."

"After they've heard him and the word gets around," Schlock agreed. "But this first appearance, he's an unknown quantity. I can't advertise just Sneed Hearn in a one-man performance."

"Then bill him as a group," I said. "After all, he is a group when he opens his mouth, isn't he? Call him—oh, anything—"

Inspiration gleamed in Sylvester Schlock's flashing eyes. "Sneed Hearn and his Hearnias!" he shouted.

I gripped his hand. "Okay, we have a firm deal."

And thus, a star was born.

VIII

The ride back to Los Angeles was something of a triumph.

"That was a stroke of genius, letting him go on for free the first time," Sandy conceded. "After one exposure, you can name your own price. Joe, you're a genius."

It is my policy never to contradict a lady, so I just nodded silently. But deep within myself I could feel the surge of supreme confidence. I knew now that nothing was beyond me; I could achieve the seemingly impossible. Right then and there I resolved to put my belief to the final test. The next time I stopped for a traffic light on the Strip and a hippie came up to sell me a copy of The Free Press, I would sell him a copy of The Christian Science Monitor.

My mood was heightened when we got back to the house and Sandy told the waiting group what had happened.

“Incredible!” Luke Emia gasped. “Wait ’til they hear him!”

“They’ll go outta their skulls,” Swinger predicted.

“————!” agreed Grafitti.

I accepted the accolades with due modesty. After dinner I wandered out on the patio behind the house to compose myself and my thoughts. This was going to be a hectic week, and I had to plan a schedule.

To my surprise, I found Drool standing there at the edge of the hilltop, staring up at the smog as though he could actually see the stars beyond. His face was expressionless.

I moved up beside him. “What’s the matter?”

“Nothing.”

“Then cheer up. You’re on your way. You heard what Schlock said—with your looks and your voice you can’t miss!”

Drool blinked at me. “I still don’t see how I’m going to take over the world this way.”

“Look,” I said. “It’s all a matter of who has the clout, and in this world money is power. Your voice will make more money than anyone has ever dreamed of earning. With it you can buy anything you want—”

“But I don’t want anything for myself. I’m only here to follow orders. And my orders are to conquer. If I just had my own little superdisintcgratosonic weapon—”

“This is your weapon.” I pointed at his throat. “And for the moment, I’m your commanding officer. So forward march!”

Luke Emia stepped forth from the shadows. “What’s this about a weapon?” he asked.

I filled him in on Drool’s story.

“Mean to tell me you haven’t investigated any further?” Luke gestured excitedly. “If Drool dropped this gizmo of his when he fell, it must have landed around here somewhere, just as he did. For all we know, it could be lying out in the street.”

“Forget it,” I said. “Who needs weapons?”

“We do! Why, if this thing has half the power he says it does, we’re wasting our time. We could sell a copy to the government for billions.”

“Quit talking like a business man,” I told him.

But Luke was carried away with his own vision. “Then we could turn around and sell another copy to the enemy powers for more billions.”

“Quit talking like a big business man,” I sighed.

“I still think you’re making a mistake—”

I shook my head. “I’m making a star. From now on, we’re all going to be concentrating on that concert.

Beckoning to Drool, I moved toward the house. “Time to hit the sack,” I said.

And we did. Despite Drool’s policy of letting sleeping-bags lie, he rested beside me all night.

When morning came, we went to work. And that’s the story of the next ten days—work and more work. Grafitti wrote lyrics. Swinger did arrangements. With them I coached Drool on proper styles of delivery; how to slur his pronunciation and moan words incoherently, where to go off-key, and all the other techniques of today’s top vocalists. Luke Emia and Sandy were kept busy loading platters on the stereo as Drool listened to the groups he’d be imitating—the Zappers, the Calamity Howlers, Rock Bottom and the Living Ends, and all the other great artists.

“You’re a slave-driver,” Cy Kotic complained. “I don’t even have time to listen to the news any more. Because of you, I’ve missed two declarations of war, an epidemic, four riots, six mass-murders and nine tax increases. If I can’t keep up with these normal, every-day events, how can I stay in touch with reality?”

Only Barf seemed satisfied with the schedule. He’d rearranged his habits so that he now slept all day and stayed awake all night. It was then, while the rest of us retired to our sleeping-bags, that he proceeded with his educational activities. He and Drool spent those nocturnal hours in Barf’s room upstairs where the philosopher lived in a fashion once popular in square circles. I’d never been invited to that room, but I know it contained 34 books, a writing desk, and even an old monophonic record-player.

It was the sound of the latter which aroused me one midnight just at a time when I was about to entice Sandy over to my sleeping-bag to discuss the territorial imperative.

“What’s that?” I muttered, jumping up and taking the stairs two at a time. As I burst into Barf’s room the sound ceased.

Drool was seated on the floor amidst a welter of records and books. Barf stood at the record-player, removing a disc.

“What were you playing just now?” I demanded.

Barf put the platter away. “Just a recording from my own collection.”

“Stop wasting Drool’s time, You’re supposed to be teaching him something worthwhile.”

“But he is.” Drool indicated the volumes stacked lip beside him on the floor. “He’s taught me a great deal about life in your world. We’ve been going through the encyclopedia, slowly. Three volumes a night—”

“Three volumes?”

“Drool is a very fast reader,” Barf explained. “And a very fast listener, too. I answer questions as he goes along.”

“What sort of questions?” I inquired.

“Well, we’re up to the letter,” Drool said. “So we’ve been discussing pathology and psychosis and poverty and plagues and pollution and population-explosion and prejudice and Pop Art—” He nodded reassuringly. “I’m beginning to understand how you people live.”

“I’ve just been discussing public opinion polls,” Barf explained. “For example, here’s one of the latest—a poll taken to determine whether or not people believe in polls—”

“Who needs it?” I glanced disapprovingly at the book-shelves lining the walls.

“You think books are obsolete?” Drool asked, eagerly. “So does Marshall McLuhan. In fact, he wrote a book about it.”

I gripped Drool’s shoulder and pulled him to his feet. “Come on,” I murmured. “You’re going downstairs with me.”

Barf looked confused. “Don’t you approve of my educational methods?”

I shook my head. “Teach him the things he must know when he’s rich and successful. How to handle a sports-car with a right-hand drive, how to order a hamburger from a French menu, how to set up a tax-free foundation. That’s what he needs to learn—the practical stuff! With only a few days left before the concert, I don’t want his mind cluttered up with a lot of useless knowledge. Facts will only confuse him.”

Barf gestured tentatively. “Are you quite sure this is what you want?” he said quietly. “In a world of chaos, can’t you think of any meaningful contribution besides more chaos?”

“People want to get zonked,” I told him. “That’s what’s happening, baby. You go with whatever turns you on.”

“Maybe it’s time to turn off,” Barf mused. “Before we reach a point of no return, where sheer sensory impact loses meaning. We have no music any more—just the beat. Our abstract art is nothing but a series of Rorschach tests. When artists cease to communicate with their audiences, the ability to communicate is soon lost and all that matters is subjective sensation, drug-induced. We have sold our birthright for a mess of pot.”

“End of lecture,” I snapped, and dragged Drool downstairs.

“But I like talking to him,” Drool protested. “He’s even taught me about warfare and strategy. Divide and conquer. To the victor belongs the spoils.

Don’t fire until you see the whites of their eyes. Oh, if I only had my superdisintegratosonic weapon now—I could take over in no time!”

“You take over Saturday,” I reminded. “By making a success of the concert. And until then, I’m calling the shots.”

The remaining days before the performance blended into a hyperactive blur. Rehearsals and last-minute preparations occupied every waking moment and even invaded my dreams.

If I’d taken time to reflect I probably would have kept a closer watch on my companions, but it didn’t occur to me. I was only vaguely aware that Luke Emia absented himself from the house at regular intervals, and that Barf and Drool exchanged muttered conversations in the comer whenever they met.

But I was too busy to check up. I spent hours on the horn with Sylvester Schlock, going over the publicity and promotion for the concert, and additional hours with Swinger, Grafitti and Sandy, planning the numbers to use in the program itself.

By Friday evening I was a basket case. “Tranquilizers don’t help any more,” I told Cy Kotic. “You were a doctor once. Can’t you do something to calm me down? Isn’t there some kind of operation—a pre-frontal lobotomy—?”

“This you need like a hole in the head,” he replied. “Now just relax. Tomorrow at this time it will all be forgotten. That’s your answer, the same answer I give all my patients. Just remember to forget.”

It sounded like a great notion, and somehow it got me through the final night.

Late that evening I wandered out on the patio with Drool and Sandy. The view was breath-taking. So was the smog.

“Look!” Sandy gestured to the east. “Those lights, way off in the distance—isn’t that Groovyland?”

Drool nodded excitedly. “Just think—like tomorrow I’m going to conquer it!”

"Sure," I said, smiling at Sandy. I wasn't worried about Drool and his predictions. As far as I was concerned, all this talk about conquest was just his schtick.

The only trouble with schticks, of course, is that sometimes you wind up with the short end . . .

IX

They came to Groovyland on Saturday night.

They came by Cadillac and by pick-up truck, by station-wagon and by motorcycle, by sleek and shiny sports-car and by broken down bus. They tangled the traffic on the freeway, turning the air blue with exhaust fumes and with curses. They jammed the parking-lot, jockeying for position as they smashed one another's fenders. They glowered and glared, swore and snarled, then pushed and pummeled their way into the lines before the ticket-windows. Twenty thousand of them came, sweating and squirming and shrieking their way into their seats. And why not? After all, they came here to have fun.

We came for business; Luke Emia in his car, Barf, Swinger, Grafitti land Cy Kotic in a Volkswagen. Sandy and Drool rode with me. Originally I'd intended to bring them all, but Luke pointed out the advantages of keeping extra transportation handy.

"Suppose we need to make a fast get-away after the concert," he said.

"I don't think you're a bit funny," Sandy told him. But in the end, we split up and drove our separate ways.

While the others joined the audience in the Hall of the Mountain King, Sandy and I conducted Drool backstage.

"Up tight?" Sandy whispered to him.

Drool shook his head and grinned. "Under control."

And why not? He didn't have to scuffle for bread, because he didn't eat. He didn't need a fancy pad because he didn't sleep. He was the quintessence of all that the gurus taught and the hippies sought—a completely non-involved entity who lived merely to do his thing.

Maybe if I had his advantages I wouldn't be here. I'd have turned Drool over to the scientists for study, let them examine his unique physiology and alien mentality. Or perhaps I'd just let him free to g5 his own way in the world.

But I did have to eat and I did need a pad, and my thing was everybody's thing—do unto others before they do unto you.

So I was here, and I was nervous. Jostling through the narrow corridor behind the outdoor stage, we came to the tiny cubicle which served as Sylvester Schlock's temporary headquarters for the evening. He bounded into the hall and grasped my hand.

"Did you see the crowd?" he demanded. "Beautiful!"

I stared into the office over his shoulder. "So is that," I told him.

The floor of the little room was stacked with canvas bags stuffed with coins and currency; loose bills and loose change cascaded from their containers, brought here from the box-offices.

"Twenty thousand customers at three bucks a throw," Schlock murmured. "Sixty thousand on one concert alone. And if your boy makes it big tonight—"

"He will," I promised. "Just keep an eye on him."

"Sorry," said Schlock. "I've got to stay here and keep an eye on the loot. I never mix business with pleasure, and watching money like this is a pleasure, believe me."

"But I thought you were going to introduce our star—"

"There's a mike on stage. Why don't you do the honors?" Schlock waved me forward. "Better start soon, that mob is getting restless."

Sandy squeezed my hand. I squeezed back. And then, somehow I was out there under the lights, under the scrutiny of twenty thousand pairs of watchful eyes. And I was singing something about, "Tonight we bring you a new era in entertainment—a new star straight from the heavens—Sneed Hearn!"

The applause rose, and Drool stepped onstage, moving to the microphone and bowing.

"This is it," I whispered. "Remember—all systems go!"

"I'll lay it on them," Drool promised.

I left the stage, perspiring.

Drool stood under the spotlight, grinning.

The crowd fell silent, waiting.

I'll never forget that moment; the hushed, still moment of expectancy.

And I'll never forget the moment that followed it; the moment when Drool opened his mouth.

Drool opened his mouth and the music came out It poured and pulsed, surged and soared.

It wasn't just the sound of a vocalist and a small combo—the majestic strains issuing from that tiny throat were the unmistakable utterance of a mighty orchestra and full chorus.

"Holy Toledo!" Schlock moaned.

"No," I corrected. "That's not it. What he's laying on them is Beethoven's Ninth Symphony!"

Schlock may have groaned again; if so I didn't hear it, for the sound was drowned in the greater groan of the audience. Even Beethoven was lost in the impromptu chorale of boos, hisses, shouts and catcalls.

"Get him off before they murder him!" Schlock shrieked, pushing me onstage.

I got him off. "Come on," I muttered, grabbing Drool by the nape of his neck. "They're starting to throw things." And indeed they were. I dodged a pizza hurled by an indignant music-lover and ducked a beer-bottle aimed at me by another patron of the arts.

"What's the matter?" Drool quavered. "Why don't they like it? Barf told me they would—"

“Barf?” I shook my head, but the picture was clear now, only too clear. That two-bit philosopher had corrupted our boy with classical music on his own record-player, seduced him into symphonies. “Wait until I get my hands on him!” I promised.

But wait we would. Right now the important thing was to keep that angry crowd out front from getting their hands on us.

Somehow I propelled Drool into the wings. The audience was rising, converging on the stage amidst a thunder of rage.

The thunder was split by the lightning of Sandy’s scream.

“No!” she wailed. “Stop—”

I glanced up quickly, then blinked in sudden shock. Apparently Barf wasn’t the only traitor in our midst.

For there, standing beside the little offstage cubicle where the box-office receipts rested, was Luke Emia. As Schlock and Sandy raised their hands high in helpless surrender, Luke moved forward to cover them with —

“My superdisintegratosonic weapon!” Drool squealed happily. “He found it!”

Which explained Luke’s interest when he questioned me about the lost weapon, explained his absence during recent evenings when he went out to hunt for it in the canyon brush near the house. It also explained why he’d suggested we drive here tonight in separate cars. He had the weapon, and now he had the caper: holding up the place for the concert receipts.

“Stand back!” Luke warned. “Don’t anybody move—”

The words came too late, for Drool was already ducking under his arm, tugging at the oddly shaped, rifle-like object in Luke’s hands. Luke pulled the trigger—Then it was in Drool’s hands, just as the weapon went off. Drool jerked the muzzle aside just in time to avoid the puff of greenish smoke which burst forth and coalesced into—

Another Drool, standing side by side with his exact counter-part, an identical twin Drool holding an identical weapon from which a puff of greenish smoke burst forth to coalesce into a third Drool—“Stop!” I shouted.

“Not until I conquer the world,” Drool gurgled.

“With that thing? It doesn’t kill anyone!”

“Never said it did,” Drool shrugged. “All it does is reproduce.”

“You mean it duplicates?”

“Reproduces,” Drool corrected me. “How do you think Krool managed to have four million offspring?”

Another greenish puff and from it, another Drool—then another and another—

“That’s the secret of taking over the world,” the Drools chorused. “Divide and conquer.”

A rumbling roar from the platform behind us indicated another kind of problem.

“Don’t worry,” said the Drools in unison. “We outnumber them.” Then six Drools turned and marched onstage, raising six weapons. Six puffs coalesced and as the crowd shrank back there were twelve Drools facing them. Twelve weapons raised, and now the twelve became twenty-four. Twenty-four became forty-eight and forty-eight became ninety-six and ninety-six became a hundred and ninety-two and a hundred and ninety-two be came an army and the army became—

But you get the idea.

So did I.

Grabbing Sandy’s hand, I ran for it.

X

It is very quiet here.

Sandy and I stopped to plunder a refreshment stand on our way, and I think we have a big enough stock of provisions to last us indefinitely.

That's good, because I'm not sure we're ever going to come out again.

At the rate Drool was reproducing himself, he may well have managed to take over the world by sheer weight of numerical supremacy alone.

And I can just see it now—everybody knee-deep in masses of Drools, rising higher and higher until they smother. It's the final population explosion, I suppose.

And since Drools don't eat or sleep or have much need of oxygen, there's no reason to suppose they'll ever stop multiplying. If they ever get the idea to start singing in unison, the sound-waves will topple every man-made structure on earth. Oh, there's no end to the possibilities.

But meanwhile, Sandy and I will stay here, where it's safe and quiet. Here, in Bodyland, in the one hiding-place that we can depend on.

We're back in the womb.

Some day, when it's all over, we may venture out again, just to see what happened. Right now I like it here, and I'm not about to move. The way things are now, Drool can have his world.

It's a nice place to visit, but I wouldn't want to live there . . .

The Movie People

Robert Bloch—author of PSYCHO*, author of many fantasy and sf short stories, including the award-winning "That Hellhound Train" (F&SF, September 1958)—here offers a fantasy with a Hollywood background, about a day on the set when the borderline between reel life and real life briefly dims and fades out.*

TWO THOUSAND STARS.

Two thousand stars, maybe more, set in the sidewalks along Hollywood Boulevard, each metal slab inscribed with the name of someone in the movie industry. They go way back, those names; from Broncho Billy Anderson to Adolph Zukor, everybody's there.

Everybody but Jimmy Rogers.

You won't find Jimmy's name because he wasn't a star, not even a bit-player—just an extra.

"But I deserve it," he told me. "I'm entitled, if anybody is. Started out here in 1920 when I was just a punk kid. You look close, you'll spot me in the crowd shots in The Mark of Zorro. Been in over 450 pictures since, and still going strong. Ain't many left who can beat that record. You'd think it would entitle a fella to something."

Maybe it did, but there was no star for Jimmy Rogers, and that bit about still going strong was just a crock. Nowadays Jimmy was lucky if he got a casting-call once or twice a year; there just isn't any spot for an old-timer with a white muff except in a western barroom scene.

Most of the time Jimmy just strolled the Boulevard; a tall, soldierly erect incongruity in the crowd of tourists, fags and freak-outs. His home address was on Las Palmas, somewhere south of Sunset. I'd never been there but I could guess what it was—one of those old frame bungalow-court sweatboxes put up about the time he crashed the movies and still standing somehow by the grace of God and the disgrace of the housing authorities. That's the sort of place Jimmy stayed at, but he didn't really live there.

Jimmy Rogers lived at the Silent Movie.

The Silent Movie is over on Fairfax, and it's the only place in town where you can still go and see The Mark of Zorro. There's always a Chaplin comedy, and usually Laurel and Hardy, along with a serial starring Pearl White, Elmo Lincoln, or Houdini. And the features are great—early Griffith and DeMille, Barrymore in Dr., Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Lon Chaney in The Hunchback of Notre Dame, Valentino in Blood and Sand, and a hundred more.

The bill changes every Wednesday, and every Wednesday night Jimmy Rogers was there, plunking down his ninety cents at the box-office to watch The Black Pirate or Son of the Sheik or Orphans of the Storm.

To live again.

Because Jimmy didn't go there to see Doug and Mary or Rudy or Clara or Gloria or the Gish sisters. He went there to see himself, in the crowd shots.

At least that's the way I figured it, the first time I met him. They were playing The Phantom of the Opera that night, and afterwards I spent the intermission with a cigarette outside the theatre, studying the display of stills.

If you asked me under oath, I couldn't tell you how our conversation started, but that's where I first heard Jimmy's routine about the 450 pictures and still going strong.

"Did you see me in there tonight?" he asked.

I stared at him and shook my head; even with the shabby hand-me-down suit and the white beard, Jimmy Rogers wasn't the kind you'd spot in an audience.

"Guess it was too dark for me to notice," I said.

"But there were torches," Jimmy told me. "I carried one."

Then I got the message. He was in the picture.

Jimmy smiled and shrugged. "Hell, I keep forgetting. You wouldn't recognize me. We did The Phantom way back in '25. I looked so young they slapped a mustache on me in Make-up, and a black wig. Hard to spot me in the catacombs scenes—all long shots. But there at the end, where Chaney is holding back the mob, I show up pretty good in the background, just left of Charley Zimmer. He's the one shaking his fist. I'm waving my torch. Had a lot of trouble with that picture, but we did this shot in one take."

In weeks to come I saw more of Jimmy Rogers. Sometimes he was up there on the screen, though truth to tell, I never did recognize him; he was a young man in those films of the Twenties, and his appearances were limited to a flickering flash, a blurred face glimpsed in a crowd.

But always Jimmy was in the audience, even though he hadn't played in the picture. And one night I found out why.

Again it was intermission time and we were standing outside. By now Jimmy had gotten into the habit of talking to me and tonight we'd been seated together during the showing of The Covered Wagon.

We stood outside and Jimmy blinked at me. "Wasn't she beautiful?" he asked. "They don't look like that any more."

I nodded. "Lois Wilson? Very attractive."

"I'm talking about June."

I stared at Jimmy and then I realized he wasn't blinking. He was crying.

"June Logan. My girl. This was her first bit, the Indian attack scene. Must have been seventeen—I didn't know her then; it was two years later we met over at First National. But you must have noticed her. She was the one with the long blonde curls."

"Oh, that one." I nodded again. "You're right. She was lovely."

And I was a liar, because I didn't remember seeing her at all, but I wanted to make the old man feel good.

"Junie's in a lot of the pictures they show here. And from '25 on, we played in a flock of 'em together. For a while we talked about getting hitched, but she started working her way up, doing bits—maids and such—and I never broke out of extra work. Both of us had been in the business long enough to know it was no go, not when one of you stays small and the other is headed for a big career."

Jimmy managed a grin as he wiped his eyes with something which might once have been a handkerchief. "You think I'm kidding, don't you? About the career, I mean. But she was going great, she would have been playing second leads pretty soon."

"What happened?" I asked.

The grin dissolved and the blinking returned. "Sound killed her."

"She didn't have a voice for talkies?"

Jimmy shook his head. "She had a great voice. I told you she was all set for second leads—by 1930 she'd been in a dozen talkies. Then sound killed her."

I'd heard the expression a thousand times, but never like this. Because the way Jimmy told the story, that's exactly what had happened. June Logan, his girl Junie, was on the set during the shooting of one of those early All Talking-All Singing-All Dancing epics. The director and camera crew, seeking to break away from the tyranny of the stationary microphone, rigged up one of the first traveling mikes on a boom. Such items weren't standard equipment yet, and this was an experiment. Somehow, during a take, it broke loose and the boom crashed, crushing June Logan's skull.

It never made the papers, not even the trades; the studio hushed it up, and June Logan had a quiet funeral.

"Damn near forty years ago," Jimmy said. "And here I am, crying like it was yesterday. But she was my girl—"

And that was the other reason why Jimmy Rogers went to the Silent Movie. To visit his girl.

"Don't you see?" he told me. "She's still alive up there on the screen, in all those pictures. Just the way she was when we were together. Five years we had, the best years for me."

I could see that. The two of them in love, with each other and with the movies. Because in those days, people did love the movies. And to actually be in them, even in tiny roles, was the average person's idea of seventh heaven.

Seventh Heaven, that's another film we saw with June Logan playing in a crowd scene. In the following weeks, with Jimmy's help, I got so I could spot his girl. And he'd told the truth—she was a beauty. Once you noticed her, really saw her, you wouldn't forget. Those blonde ringlets, that smile, identified her immediately.

One Wednesday night Jimmy and I were sitting together watching The Birth of a Nation. During a street shot, Jimmy nudged my shoulder. "Look, there's June."

I peered up at the screen, then shook my head. "I don't see her."

"Wait a second—there she is again. See, off to the left, behind Walthall's shoulder?"

There was a blurred image and then the camera followed Henry B. Walthall as he moved away.

I glanced at Jimmy. He was rising from his seat.

"Where you going?"

He just marched outside.

When I followed I found him leaning against the wall under the marquee and breathing hard; his skin was the color of his whiskers.

"Junie," he murmured. "I saw her—"

I took a deep breath. "Listen to me. You told me her first picture was The Covered Wagon. That was made in 1923. And Griffith shot The Birth of a Nation in 1915."

Jimmy didn’t say anything. There was nothing to say. We both knew what we were going to do—march back into the theatre and see the second show.

When the scene screened again, we were watching and waiting. I looked at the screen, then glanced at Jimmy.

“She’s gone,” he whispered. “She’s not in the picture.”

“She never was,” I told him. “You know that.”

“Yeah.” Jimmy got up and drifted out into the night, and I didn’t see him again until the following week.

That’s when they showed the short feature with Charles Ray—I’ve forgotten the title, but he played his usual country-boy role, and there was a baseball game in, the climax with Ray coming through to win.

The camera panned across the crowd sitting in the bleachers, and I caught a momentary glimpse of a smiling girl with long blonde curls.

“Did you see her?” Jimmy grabbed my arm.

“That girl—”

“It was Junie. She winked at me!”

This time I was the one who got up and walked out. He followed, and I was waiting in front of the theatre, right next to the display poster.

“See for yourself.” I nodded at the poster. “This picture was made in 1917.” I forced a smile. “You forget, there were thousands of pretty blonde extras in pictures, and most of them wore curls.”

He stood there shaking, not listening to me at all, and I put my hand on his shoulder. “Now look here—”

“I been looking here,” Jimmy said. “Week after week, year after year. And you might as well know the truth. This ain’t the first time it’s happened. Junie keeps turning up in picture after picture I know she never made. Not just the early ones, before her time, but later, during the Twenties when I knew her, when I knew exactly what she was playing in. Sometimes it’s only a quick flash, but I see her—then she’s gone again. And the next running, she doesn’t come back.

“It got so that for a while I was almost afraid to go see a show—figured I was cracking up. But now you’ve seen her too—”

I shook my head slowly. “Sorry, Jimmy. I never said that.” I glanced at him, then gestured towards my car at the curb. “You look tired. Come on, I’ll drive you home.”

He looked worse than tired; he looked lost and lonely and infinitely old. But there was a stubborn glint in his eyes, and he stood his ground.

“No, thanks. I’m gonna stick around for the second show.”

As I slid behind the wheel, I saw him turn and move into the theatre, into the place where the present becomes the past and the past becomes the present. Up above in the booth they call it a projection-machine, but it’s really a time-machine; it can take you back, play-tricks with your imagination and your memory. A girl dead forty years comes alive again, and an old man relives his vanished youth—

But I belonged in the real world, and that’s where I stayed. I didn’t go to the Silent Movie the next week or the week following.

And the next time I saw Jimmy was almost a month later, on the set.

They were shooting a western, one of my scripts, and the director wanted some additional dialogue to stretch a sequence. So they called me in, and I drove all the way out to location, at the ranch.

Most of the studios have a ranch spread for western action sequences, and this was one of the oldest; it had been in use since the silent days. What fascinated me was the wooden fort where they were doing the crowd scene —I could swear I remembered it from one of the first Tim McCoy pictures. So after I huddled with the director and scribbled a few extra lines for the principals, I began nosing around behind the fort, just out of curiosity, while they set up for the new shots.

Out front was the usual organized confusion; cast and crew milling around the trailers, extras sprawled on the grass drinking coffee. But here in the back I was all alone, prowling around in musty, log-lined rooms built for use in forgotten features. Hoot Gibson had stood at this bar, and Jack Hoxie had swung from this dance-hall chandelier. Here was a dust-covered table where Fred Thomson sat, and around the corner, in the cutaway bunkhouse—

Around the corner, in the cutaway bunkhouse, Jimmy Rogers sat on the edge of a mildewed mattress and stared up at me, startled, as I moved forward.

“You—?”

Quickly I explained my presence. There was no need for him to explain his; casting had called and given him a day’s work here in the crowd shots.

“They been stalling all day, and it’s hot out there. I figured maybe I could sneak back here and catch me a little nap in the shade.”

“How’d you know where to go?” I asked. “Ever been here before?”

“Sure. Forty years ago in this very bunkhouse. Junie and I, we used to come here during lunch break and—”

He stopped.

“What’s wrong?”

Something was wrong. On the pan make-up face of it, Jimmy Rogers was the perfect picture of the grizzled western old-timer; buckskin britches, fringed shirt, white whiskers and all. But under the make-up was pallor, and the hands holding the envelope were trembling.

The envelope—

He held it out to me. “Here. Mebbe you better read this.”

The envelope was unsealed, unstamped, unaddressed. It contained four folded pages covered with fine handwriting. I removed them slowly. Jimmy stared at me.

“Found it lying here on the mattress when I came in,” he murmured. “Just waiting for me.”

“But what is it? Where’d it come from?”

“Read it and see.”

As I started to unfold the pages, the whistle blew. We both knew the signal; the scene was set up, they were ready to roll, principals and extras were wanted out there before the cameras.

Jimmy Rogers stood up and moved off, a tired old man shuffling out into the hot sun. I waved at him, then sat down on the moldering mattress and opened the letter. The handwriting was faded, and there was a thin film of dust on the pages. But I could still read it, every word . . .

“Darling: I’ve been trying to reach you so long and in so many ways. Of course I’ve seen you, but its so dark out there, I can’t always be sure, and then too you’ve changed a lot through the years.

“But I do see you, quite often, even though it’s only for a moment. And I hope you’ve seen me, because I always try to wink or make some kind of motion to attract your attention.

“The only thing is, I can’t do too much or show myself too long or it would make trouble. That’s the big secret—keeping in the background, so the others won’t notice me. It wouldn’t do to frighten anybody, or even to get anyone wondering why there are more people in the background of a shot than there should be.

“That’s something for you to remember, darling, just in case. You’re always safe, as long as you stay clear of close-ups. Costume pictures are the best—about all you have to do is wave your arms once in a while and shout, ‘On to the Bastille’, or something like that. It really doesn’t matter except to lip readers, because it’s silent, of course.

“Oh, there’s a lot to watch out for. Being a dress-extra has its points, but not in ballroom sequences—too much dancing. That goes for parties, too, particularly in a DeMille production where they’re ‘making whoopee’ or one of von Stroheim’s orgies. Besides, von Stroheim’s scenes are always cut.

“It doesn’t hurt to be cut, don’t misunderstand about that. It’s no different than an ordinary fadeout at the end of a scene, and then you’re free to go into another picture. Anything that was ever made, as long as there’s still a print available for running somewhere. It’s like falling asleep and then having one dream after another. The dreams are the scenes, of course, but while the scenes are playing, they're real.

"I'm not the only one, either. There's no telling how many others do the same thing; maybe hundreds for all I know, but I've recognized a few I'm sure of, and I think some of them have recognized me. We never let on to each other that we know, because it wouldn't do to make anybody suspicious.

"Sometimes I think that if we could talk it over, we might come up with a better understanding of just how it happens, and why. But the point is, you cant talk, everything is silent; all you do is move your lips, and if you tried to communicate such a difficult thing in pantomine, you'd surely attract attention.

"I guess the closest I can come to explaining it is to say it's like reincarnation—you can play a thousand roles, take or reject any part you want, as long as you don't make yourself conspicuous or do something that would change the plot.

"Naturally, you get used to certain things. The silence, of course. And if you're in a bad print, there's flickering; sometimes even the air seems grainy, and for a few frames you may be faded or out of focus.

"Which reminds me—another thing to stay away from, the slapstick comedies. Sennett's early stuff is the worst, but Larry Semon and some of the others are-just as bad; all that speeded-up camera action makes you dizzy.

"Once you can learn to adjust, it's all right, even when you're looking off the screen into the audience. At first the darkness is a little frightening—you have to remind yourself it's only a theatre and there are just people out there, ordinary people watching a show. They don't know you can see them. They don't know that as long as your scene runs, you're just as real as they are, only in a different way. You walk, run, smile, frown, drink, eat—

"That's another thing to remember, about the eating. Stay out of those Poverty Row quickies where everything is cheap and faked. Go where there's real set-dressing, big productions with banquet scenes and real food.

If you work fast, you can grab enough in a few minutes, while you're off-camera, to last you.

"The big rule is, always be careful. Don't get caught. There's so little time, and you seldom get an opportunity to do anything on your own, even in a long sequence. It's taken me forever to get this chance to write you—I've planned it for so long, my darling, but it just wasn't possible until now.

"This scene is playing outside the fort, but there's quite a large crowd of settlers and wagon-train people, and I had a chance to slip away inside here to the rooms in back—they're on camera in the background all during the action. I found this stationery and a pen, and I'm scribbling just as fast as I can. Hope you can read it. That is, if you ever get the chance!

"Naturally, I can't mail it—but I have a funny hunch. You see, I noticed that standing set back here, the bunkhouse, where you and I used to come in the old days. I'm going to leave this letter under the mattress, and pray.

"Yes, darling, I pray. Someone or something knows about us, and about how we feel. How we felt about being in the movies. That's why I'm here, I'm sure of that; because I've always loved pictures so. Someone who knows that must also know how I loved you. And still do.

"I think there must be many heavens and many hells, each of us making his own, and—"

The letter broke off there.

No signature, but of course I didn't need one. And it wouldn't have proved anything. A lonely old man, nursing his love for forty years, keeping her alive inside himself somewhere until she broke out in the form of a visual hallucination up there on the screen—such a man could conceivably go all the way into a schizoid split, even to the point where he could imitate a woman's handwriting as he set down the rationalization of his obsession.

I started to fold the letter, then dropped it on the mattress as the shrill scream of an ambulance siren startled me into sudden movement.

Even as I ran out the doorway, I seemed to know what I'd find; the crowd huddling around the figure sprawled in the dust under the hot sun. Old men tire easily in such heat, and once the heart goes Jimmy Rogers looked very much as though he were smiling in his sleep as they lifted him into the ambulance. And I was glad of that; at least he'd died with his illusions intact.

"Just keeled over during the scene—one minute he was standing there, and the next—"

They were still chattering and gabbling when I walked away, walked back behind the fort and into the bunkhouse.

The letter was gone.

I'd dropped it on the mattress, and it was gone. That's all I can say about it. Maybe somebody else happened by while I was out front, watching them take Jimmy away. Maybe a gust of wind carried it through the doorway, blew it across the desert in a hot Santa Ana gust. Maybe there was no letter. You can take your choice—all I can do is state the facts.

And there aren't very many more facts to state.

I didn't go to Jimmy Rogers' funeral, if indeed he had one. I don't even know where he was buried; probably the Motion Picture Fund took care of him. Whatever those facts may be, they aren't important.

For a few days I wasn't too interested in facts. I was trying to answer a few abstract questions about metaphysics—reincarnation, heaven and hell, the difference between real life and reel life. I kept thinking about those images you see up there on the screen in those old movies; images of actual people indulging in make-believe. But even after they die, the make-believe goes on, and that's a form of reality too. I mean, where's the border line? And if there is a border line—is it possible to cross over? Life's but a walking shadow—

Shakespeare said that, but I wasn't sure what he meant.

I'm still not sure, but there's just one more fact I must state.

The other night, for the first time since Jimmy Rogers died, I went back to the Silent Movie.

They were playing Intolerance, one of Griffith's greatest. Way back in 1916 he built the biggest set ever shown on the screen—the huge temple in the Babylonian sequence.

One shot never fails to impress me, and it did so now; a wide angle on the towering temple, with thousands of people moving antlike amidst the gigantic carvings and colossal statues. In the distance, beyond the steps guarded by rows of stone elephants, looms a mighty wall, its top covered with tiny figures. You really have to look closely to make them out. But I did look closely, and this time I can swear to what I saw.

One of the extras, way up there on the wall in the background, was a smiling girl with long blonde curls. And standing right beside her, one arm around her shoulder, was a tall old man with white whiskers. I wouldn't have noticed either of them, except for one thing.

They were waving at me . . .

Double Whammy

Robert Bloch carves out a grim vignette of death and magic in the tawdry world of the Carny as he explains why there's nothing lower than being a geek in the sideshow . . .

R*OD PULLED* the chicken out of the burlap bag and threw it down into the pit.

The chicken squawked and fluttered, and Rod glanced away quickly. The gaping crowd gathered around the canvas walls of the pit ignored him; now all the eyes were focussed on what was happening down below. There was a cackling, a scrabbling sound, and then a sudden sharp simultaneous intake of breath from the spectators.

Rod didn't have to look. He knew that the geek had caught the chicken.

Then the crowd began to roar. It was a strange noise, compounded of women's screams, high harsh laughter teetering on. the edge of hysteria, and deep hoarse masculine murmurs of shocked dismay.

Rod knew what that sound meant, too.

The geek was biting off the chicken's head.

Rod stumbled out of the little tent, not looking back, grateful for the cool night air that fanned his sweating face. His shirt was soaked through under the cheap blazer. He'd have to change again before he went up on the outside platform to make his next pitch.

The pitch itself didn't bother him. Being a talker was his job and he was good at it; he liked conning the marks and turning the tip. Standing up there in front of the bloody banners and spieling about the Strange People always gave him his kicks, even if he was only working for a lousy mudshow that never played anywhere north of Tennessee. For three seasons straight he'd been with it, he was a pro, a real carny.

But now, all of a sudden, something was spooking him. No use kidding himself, he had to face it.

Rod was afraid of the geek.

He crossed behind the ten-in-one tent and moved in the direction of his little trailer, pulling out a handkerchief and wiping his forehead. That helped a little, but he couldn't wipe away what was inside his head. The cold, clammy fear was always there now, night and day.

Hell of it was, it didn't make sense. The Monarch of Mirth Shows had always worked "strong"—out here in the old boondocks you could still get away with murder, particularly if you were only killing chickens. And who gives a damn about chickens, anyway? The butchers chop off a million heads a day. A chicken is just a lousy bird, and a geek is just a lousy wino. A rumdum who hooks up with a carny, puts on a phoney wild-man outfit and hops around in the bottom of a canvas enclosure while the talker gives the crowd a line about this ferocious monster, half man and half beast. Then the talker throws in the chicken and the geek does his thing.

Rod shook his head, but what was inside it didn't move. It stayed there, cold and clammy and coiled up in a ball. It had been there almost ever since the beginning of this season, and now Rod was conscious that it was growing. The fear was getting bigger.

But why? He'd worked with half a dozen lushes over the past three years. Maybe biting the head off a live chicken wasn't exactly the greatest way to make a living, but if the geeks didn't mind, why should he care? And Rod knew that a geek wasn't really a monster, just a poor old futz who was down on his luck and hooked on the sauce—willing to do anything, as long as he got his daily ration of popskull.

This season the geek they took on was named Mike. A quiet guy who kept out of everybody's way when he wasn't working; under the burnt-cork makeup he had the sad, wrinkled face of a man of fifty. Fifty hard years, perhaps thirty of them years of hard drinking. He never talked, just took his pint and curled up in the canvas on one of the trucks. Looking at him then, Rod was never spooked; if anything, he felt kind of sorry for the poor bastard.

It was only when the geek was in the pit that Rod felt that ball of fear uncoil. When he saw the wooly wig and the black face, the painted hands that clutched and clawed—yes, and when he saw the grinning mouth open to reveal the rotting yellow teeth, ready to bite—

Oh, it was getting to him all right, he was really up tight now. But nobody else knew. And nobody would know. Rod wasn't about to spill his guts to anyone here on the lot, and how would it look if he ran off to some head-shrinker and said, "Hey, Doc, help me—I'm afraid I'm gonna turn into a geek." He knew better than that. No shrinker could help him, and come what may he'd never end up geeking for a living. He'd lick this thing himself; he had to, and he would, just as long as no one else caught on and bugged him about it.

Rod climbed the steps, removing his jacket and unbuttoning his wet shirt as he moved up into the darkness of the trailer.

And then he felt the hands sliding across his bare chest, moving up over his shoulders to embrace him, and he smelt the fragrance, fit the warmth and the pressure even as he heard the whispered words. "Rod—darling—are you surprised?"

Truth to tell, Rod wasn't surprised. But he was pleased that she'd been waiting for him. He took her in his arms and glued his mouth to hers as they sank down on the cot.

"Cora," he murmured. "Cora—"

"Shhhh! No time to talk."

She was right. There wasn't time, because he had to be back on the bally platform in fifteen minutes. And it wasn't a smart idea to talk anyway, not with Madame Sylvia sneaking around and popping up out of nowhere just when you least expected her. Why in hell did a swinging bird like Cora have to have an old buzzard like Madame Sylvia for a grandmother?

But Rod wasn't thinking about grandmothers now, and he wasn't thinking about geeks, either. That was what Cora did to him, that was what Cora did for him, dissolving the cold fear in warm, writhing, wanting flesh. At times like these Rod knew why he couldn't cut out, why he stayed with it. Staying with it meant staying with her, and this was enough; this was everything, with ribbons on it.

It was only later, struggling into his shirt, hearing her whisper, "Please, honey, hurry and let's get out of here before she comes looking for me," that he wondered if it was really worth it. All this horsing around for a fast grope in the dark with a teen-age spick who practically creamed her jeans every time the old lady looked cross-eyed at her.

Sure Cora was a beautiful job, custom-made for him. But when you got right down to it she was still a kid and nobody would ever mistake her brain for a computer. Besides, she was a spick—well, maybe not exactly, but she was a gypsy and that added up the same thing.

Walking back to the bally platform for the last pitch of the evening, Rod decided it was time to cool it. From now on the chill was in.

That night the show folded and trucked to Mazoo County Fair Grounds for a ten-day stand. They were all day setting up and then the crowds surged in, rednecks from the toolies up in the hills; must have been a couple thousand coming in night after night, and all craving action.

For almost a week Rod managed to keep out of Cora's way without making it too obvious. Her grandmother was running the mitt camp concession on the other end of the Midway and Cora was supposed to shill for her; usually she was too busy to sneak off. A couple of times Rod caught sight of her signalling to him from down in the crowd around the bally platform, but he always looked the other way, pretending he didn't see her. And once he heard her scratching on the trailer door in the middle of the night, only he made out that he was asleep, even when she called out to him, and after about ten minutes she went away.

The trouble was, Rod didn't sleep anywhere near that good; seemed like every time he closed his eyes now he could see the pit, see the black geek and the white chicken.

So the next time Cora came scratching on the door he let her in, and for a little while he was out of the pit, safe in her arms. And instead of the geek growling and the chicken cackling he heard her voice in the darkness, her warm, soft voice, murmuring, "You do love me, don't you, Rod?"

The answer came easy, the way it always did. "Course I do. You know that."

Her fingers tightened on his arm. "Then it's all right. We can get married and I'll have the baby—"

"Baby?"

He sat up, fast.

"I wasn't going to tell you, honey, not until I was sure, but I am now." Her voice was vibrant. "Just think, darling—"

He was thinking. And when he spoke, his voice was hoarse.

"Your grandmother—Madame Sylvia—does she know?"

"Not yet. I wanted you to come with me when I tell her—"

"Tell her nothing."

"Rod?"

"Tell her nothing. Get rid of it."

"Honey—"

"You heard me."

She tried to hold him then but he wrenched himself free, stood up, reached for his shirt. She was crying now, but the louder she sobbed the more he hurried dressing, just as if she wasn't there. Just as if she wasn't stuttering and stammering all that jazz about what did he mean, he couldn't do this, he had to listen, and if the old lady found out she'd kill her.

Rod wanted to yell at her to shut up, he wanted to crack her one across the mouth and make her shut up, but he managed to control himself. And when he did speak his voice was soft.

“Take it easy, sweetheart,” he said. “Let’s not get ourselves all excited here. There’s no problem.”

“But I told you—”

He patted her arm in the darkness.

“Relax, will you? You got nothing to worry about. You told me yourself the old lady doesn’t know. Get rid of it now and she never will.”

Christ, it was so simple you’d think even a lame-brain like Cora would understand. But instead she was crying again, louder than ever, and beating on him with her fists.

“No, no you can’t make me! We’ve got to get married, the first time I let you, you promised we would, just as soon as the season was over—”

“As far as I’m concerned, the season’s over right now.” Rod tried to keep his voice down, but when she came at him again, clinging, somehow it was worse than feeling her fists. He couldn’t stand this any more; not the clinging, not the wet whimpering.

“Listen to me, Cora. I’m sorry about what happened, you know that. But you can scrub the marriage bit.”.

The way she blew then you’d have thought the world was coming to an end, and he had to slap her to keep the whole damn lot from hearing her screech. He felt kind of lousy, belting her one like that, but it quieted her down enough so’s he could hustle her out. She went away still crying, but very quietly. And at least she got the message.

Rod didn’t see her around the next day, or the one after. But in order to keep her from bugging him again, he spent both nights over at Boots Donahue’s wagon, playing a little stud with the boys. He figured that if there was any trouble and he had to peel off fast, maybe he could turn a few extra bucks for the old grouch-bag.

Only it didn’t exactly work out that way. Usually he was pretty lucky with the pasteboards, but he had a bad run both evenings and ended up in hock for his next three pay-checks. That was bad enough, but the next day was worse.

Basket Case gave him the word.

Rod was just heading for the cook tent for breakfast when Basket Case called him over. He was laying on an old army cot outside his trailer with a cigarette in his mouth.

“How’s for a light?” he asked.

Rod cupped a match for him, then stuck around, knowing he’d have to flick the ashes while Basket Case had his smoke. And a guy born without arms or legs has a little trouble getting rid of a butt, too.

Funny thing, the Strange People never got to Rod, no matter how peculiar they looked. Even Basket Case, who was just a living head attached to a shapeless bundle of torso, didn’t give him the creeps. Maybe it was because old Basket Case himself didn’t seem to mind; he just took it for granted that he was a freak. And he always acted and sounded normal, not like that rumdum geek who put on a fright wig and blacked up and made noises like a crazy animal when he went after a chicken—

Rod tried to push away the thought and pulled out a cigarette for himself. He was just getting a match when Basket Case looked up at him.

“Heard the news?” he asked.

“What news?”

“Cora’s dead.”

Rod burned his fingers and the match dropped away.

“Dead?”

Basket Case nodded. “Last night. Madame Sylvia found her in the trailer after the last show—”

“What happened?”

Basket Case just looked at him. “Thought maybe you could tell me that.” Rod had to choke out the words. “What’s that crack supposed to mean?”

“Nothing.” Basket Case shrugged. “Madame Sylvia told Donahue the kid died of a ruptured appendix.”

Rod took a deep breath. He forced himself to look sorry, but all at once he felt good, very good. Until he heard Basket Case saying, “Only thing is, I never heard of anyone rupturing their appendix with a knitting-needle.”

Rod reached out and took the cigarette from Basket Case to dump his ashes. The way his hand was trembling, he didn't have to do anything but let them fall.

"The appendix story is just a cover—Madame Sylvia doesn't want the fuzz nosing around." Basket Case nodded as Rod stuck the cigarette back between his lips. "But if you ask me, she knows."

"Now look, if you're saying what I think you're saying, you'd better forget it—"

"Sure, I'll forget it. But she won't." Basket Case lowered his voice. "Funeral's this afternoon, over at the county cemetery. You better show your face along with the rest of us, just so it doesn't look funny. After that, my advice to you is cut and run."

"Now wait a minute—" Rod was all set to go on, but what was the use? Basket Case knew, and there was no sense putting on an act with him. "I can't run," he said. "I'm into Boots Donahue for three weeks' advance. If I cop out, he'll spread the word around and I won't work carny again, not in these parts."

Basket Case spat the cigarette out. It landed on the ground beside the cot and Rod stamped it out. Basket Case shook his head. "Never mind the money," he said. "If you don't run, you won't be working anywhere." He glanced around cautiously and when he spoke again his voice was just a whisper. "Don't you understand? This is the crunch—I tell you, Madame Sylvia knows what happened."

Rod wasn't about to whisper. "That old bat? You said yourself she doesn't want any truck with the fuzz, and even if she did, she couldn't prove anything. So what's to be afraid of?"

"The double whammy," said Basket Case.

Rod blinked at him.

"Want me to spell it out for you? Three seasons ago, just before you came with the show, fella name of Richy was boss canvasman. Mighty nice guy, but he had a problem—he was scared of snakes. Babe Flynn was working them, had a bunch of constrictors, all standards for her act and harmless as they come. But Richey had such a thing about snakes he wouldn’t even go near her wagon.

“Where he went wrong was, he went near Madame Sylvia’s wagon. Cora was pretty young then, just budding out you might say, but that didn’t stop Richey from making his move. Nothing serious, only conversation. How the old lady found out about it I don’t know and how she found out he was spooked on snakes I don’t know either, because he always tried to hide it, of course.

“But one afternoon, last day of our stand in Red Clay it was, Madame Sylvia took a little walk over to Richey’s trailer. He was standing outside, shaving, with a mirror hung up on the door.

“She didn’t say anything to him, didn’t even look at him—just stared at his reflection in the mirror. Then she made a couple of passes and mumbled something under her breath and walked away. That’s all there was to it.

“Next morning, Richey didn’t show up. They found him lying on the floor inside his trailer, deader’n a mackerel. Half his bones were broken and the way the body was crushed you’d swear a dozen constrictors had been squeezing his guts. I saw his face and believe me it wasn’t pretty.”

Rod’s voice was husky. “You mean the old lady set those snakes on him?”

Basket Case shook his head. “Babe Flynn kept her snakes locked up tight as a drum in her own trailer. She swore up and down nobody’d even come near them the night before, let alone turned ’em loose. But Richey was dead. And that’s what I mean about the double whammy.”

“Look.” Rod was talking to Basket Case, but he wanted to hear it himself, too. “Madame Sylvia’s just another mitt reader, peddling phoney fortunes to the suckers. All this marlarkey about gypsy.

“Okay, okay.” Basket Case shrugged. “But if I were you I’d cut out of here, fast. And until I did, I wouldn’t let that old lady catch me standing in front of a—”

“Thanks for the tip,” Rod said.

As he walked away, Basket Case called after him. “See you at the funeral.”

But Rod didn’t go to the funeral.

It wasn’t as if he was afraid or anything; he just didn’t like the idea of standing at Cora’s grave with everybody looking at him as if they knew. And they damned well did by now, all of them. Maybe it would be smart to ease out of here like Basket Case said, but not now. Not until he could pay off what he owed to Donahue. For the next three weeks he’d just sweat it out.

Meanwhile, he’d watch his step. Not that he believed that crazy story about the double whammy—Basket Case was just putting him on, it had to be a gag. But it never hurt to be careful.

Which is why Rod shaved for the evening performance that afternoon. He knew the old lady was at the funeral like everybody else; she wouldn’t be creeping up behind him to capture his soul from his reflection in the mirror—

Damned right, she wouldn’t!

Rod made a face at himself in the glass. What the hell was the matter with him, anyway? He didn’t buy that bit about the curse.

But there was something wrong. Because for a moment when Rod looked into the mirror he didn’t see himself. Instead he was staring into a black, grinning face, with bloodshot, red-rimmed eyes and a twisted mouth opening to show the yellow fangs—

Rod blinked and the face went away; it was his own reflection peering back at him. But his hand was shaking so that he had to put the razor down.

His hand was still shaking when he reached for the bottle on the top shelf, and he must have spilled more of the whiskey than he managed to get into the glass. So he took a slug straight from the bottle instead. And then another, until his hands were steady again. Good for the nerves, a little snort now and then. Only you had to watch that stuff, not let it run away with you. Because if you didn’t pretty soon you got hooked and some day before you knew what was happening, you wound up in the wooly wig and the blackface, down there in the pit waiting for the white chicken—

The hell with that noise. It wasn't going to happen. Just a couple of weeks and he'd be out of here, no more carny, nothing to bug him ever again. All he had to do now was keep his cool and watch his step.

Rod watched his step very carefully that evening when he walked up to the bally platform and adjusted his mike for the pitch. Standing before the bloody banners he felt good, very good indeed, and the couple of extra belts he'd taken from the bottle just for luck seemed to have unwound that ball of fear inside his head. It was easy to make his pitch about the Strange People —"All there on the inside, folks, on the inside"—and watch the marks flocking around down below. The marks—they were the real freaks, only they didn't know it. Shelling out their dough to gawk at poof devils like Basket Case, then paying extra for the Special Added Attraction, Adults Only, in the canvas pit behind the ten-in-one tent. What kind of a pervert would pay money to see a geek? What was the matter with people like that?

And what was the matter with him? Standing there beside the pit, holding the burlap bag and feeling the chicken fluttering helplessly inside, Rod felt the fear returning to flutter within himself. He didn't want to look down into the pit and see the geek crouching there, growling and grimmacing like a real wild man. So he looked at the crowd instead, and that was better. The crowd didn't know he was afraid. Nobody knew he was spooked, let alone what scared him.

Rod talked to the crowd, building his pitch, and his hands started to fumble with the cord around the neck of the burlap bag, getting ready to open it and dump the chicken into the pit.

And that's when he saw her.

She was standing over to one side, right up against the edge of the canvas; just a little old woman dressed in black, with a black shawl draped over her head. Her face was pinched, her skin was brown and leathery, wrinkled into a permanent scowl. An old lady, nobody gave her a second glance, but Rod saw her.

And she saw him.

Funny, he'd never noticed Madame Sylvia's eyes before. They were big and brown and staring—they stared right at him now, stared right through him.

Rod wrenched his gaze away, forced his fingers to open the sack. All the while, mechanically, he was talking, finishing the buildup as he reached for the chicken, pulled it out, flung the clucking creature down to that other creature in the pit—the creature that growled and grabbed and oh my God it was biting now—

He couldn't watch and he had to turn his head away, seeing the crowd again as they shrieked and shuddered, getting their kicks. And she was still standing there, still staring at him.

But now her clawlike hand moved, moved over the rim of the canvas to extend a pointing forefinger. Rod knew what she was pointing at; she was pointing at the geek-pit. And that wrinkled face could change its expression, because she was smiling now.

Rod turned and groped his way out into the night.

She knew.

Not just about him and Cora, but about everything. Those eyes that stared at him and through him had also stared inside him—stared inside and found his fear. That's why she'd pointed and smiled; she knew what he was afraid of.

The Midway lights were bright, but it was darker behind the canvas sidewalls except where a patch of moonlight shone on the big water-barrel setting next to the cook-tent.

Rod's face was damp with sweat; he headed for the barrel and soaked his handkerchief in the water to wipe his forehead. Time for another pitch pretty soon, and the next show. He had to pull himself together.

The cool water helped to clear his head, and he dipped his handkerchief again. That was better. No sense flipping just because a nutty old dame gave him a dirty look. This business about gypsies and the evil eye and the double whammy was all a crock. And even if there was something to it, he wouldn’t let her get to him. He wasn’t about to stand in front of any mirrors —

Then he glanced down at the water in the barrel, saw his features reflected in the moonlight shining there. And he saw her face, standing right behind him. Her eyes were staring and her mouth was mumbling, and now her hands were coming up, making passes in the air, Making passes like an old witch, she was going to turn him into a geek with the double whammy —

Rod turned, and that’s the last thing he remembered. He must have passed out, fallen, because when he came to he was still on the ground.

But the ground was somehow different than the earth outside the tent; it was covered with sawdust. And the light was stronger, it was shining straight down between the canvas walls of the pit.

He was in the pit.

The realization came, and Rod looked up, knowing it was too late, she’d caught him, he was in the geek’s body now.

But something else was wrong, too; the pit was deeper, the canvas walls much higher. Everything seemed bigger, even the blur of face? crowded around the sides of the pit way up above. Way up above—why was he so small?

Then his eyes shifted as he heard the growling. Rod turned and looked up again, just in time to see the black grinning face looming over him, the giant mouth opening to reveal the rotting yellow teeth. It was only then that Rod knew what she had really done to him, as the huge hands grabbed out, pulling him close. For a moment he squawked and fluttered his wings.

Then the geek bit off his head.

In the Cards

Fear gave him three days—life only a moment—to die!

"Saturday night?" Danny said. "What do you mean, I'll die on Saturday night?"

Danny tried to focus his eyes on the old woman but he couldn't make it —too smashed. She was a big fat blur, like the cards spread on the table between them.

"I am truly sorry," the old woman murmured. "I can only read what I see. It is in the cards."

Danny grabbed for the edge of the table and stood up. The smell of incense in the darkened room was making him sick. It wasn't easy to stand and it wasn't easy to laugh either, but he managed.

"Hell with you, sister. You and the cards too."

The old woman stared at him but there was no anger in her eyes, only compassion. Somehow that was even worse.

"I'm not gonna die on Saturday night," Danny told her. "Not me. You're talking to Danny Jackson, remember? I'm a star. A big star. And you, you're just a—

Standing there, lurching there in the darkness, he told her what she was, using a vocabulary ripened and enriched by thirty years in show biz.

Her eyes never flickered, her glance never wavered, and there was still nothing in her gaze but pity when he finally ran out of breath.

And ran out of the reeking room, her pity pursuing him.

"You will die on Saturday night."

Damned echo in his ears, even when he gunned the Ferrari and roared away from the curb. The car swayed, playing tag with the yellow line; good thing it was so late and the street was clear of traffic.

It was late and he was bombed, bombed clean out of his silly skull. Had to be, or he'd never have driven all the hell down to South Alvarado to roust a phony, faking old fortune-teller out of bed and lay a fifty-dollar bill on her for a phony, faking fortune, the old witch, the old bitch—

But they were all bitches, all of them. Lola was the worst.

Danny made it to Bel Air, avoiding Sunset and coming up Pico until he could cut over on a side street through Westwood. When you're on the sauce you learn the right routes, the routes that take you safely through the streets, safely through the minutes and the hours and the days and the nights, even when your nerves are screaming and Lola is screaming too.

Screaming and screaming. She'd been waiting up for him and she cut loose the minute he opened the front door.

"Goddam it, where were you, don't you realize you've got a six o'clock call tomorrow morning—?"

A lot more followed, but Danny slammed the door on it, the door of the guest room. He hadn't slept in the same bed with Lola for three months, not only because of what Dr. Carlsen had told him about his ticker.

It was better here without her, dropping his clothes and flopping down on the old king-size, away from the bitch, away from the witch.

ONLY the witch didn't go away. Here in the dark, Danny could see her eyes again, staring at him as if she understood, as if she knew. But nobody knew what the Doc had told him, not Lola, not the studio, not even his own agent. So how could some old bag take one look at him and figure it out?

In the cards. It's in the cards.

Her eyes, he remembered her eyes when she'd said it. They were so deep and black. Black as the ace of spades lying there on the table. The queen of spades had turned up too, and that's when she made that crack about him dying on Saturday night.

Tomorrow was Wednesday. Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday—

To hell with it. That's what he'd told the old klooch and that's what he told himself. Tomorrow was Wednesday and he'd better think about that; Lola was right, he did have a six o'clock call. The test was shooting. That was what counted. Not counting the days until Saturday, but the few short hours until that test.

Wednesday. Named after Woden, the god of war and battles. Danny's name had been Kuhlsberg once, not Jackson, and he knew, he remembered. Wednesday was war, all right, a battle to leave the bed with that head of his pounding away. Thank God he could sneak out before Lola woke up, and drive through the foggy streets before traffic began to build on the San Diego Freeway.

The fight was only beginning, the fight to smile there under the lights while Benny plastered on the old pancake makeup and fitted the little wings to the perspiring temples where the hairline had eroded. The perspiration was alcohol oozing out of him, it wasn't flop-sweat, because Danny knew he had nothing to worry about. The test was a formality, all they wanted was six minutes of film to show the network brass and the agency people in New York. The series was all set, Fischer had told him that last week, and Fischer never conned him. Best damned agent in the business. So no panic, he knew his lines, all he had to do was step onto the set and walk through the scene. If there were any fluffs, Joe Collins would cover for him. Joe was a good man, he'd never carry a lead himself but he was a real pro. And Rudy Moss was a hell of a director—also an old buddy. They were all friends here, and they all knew how much was riding for them on this series.

"Ready for you, Mr. Jackson."

Danny smiled, stood up, strolled out to where Joe Collins was waiting on the set. He found his chalk-marks, somebody from the camera unit dragged out his tape, the mike-boom came down and he tested his voice for gain. Then they hit the lights and Rudy Moss gave him his cue for action and they rolled.

They rolled and he blew it.

The first take he forgot the business with the cigarette. They cut and started from the top, and he fouled his crossover to Joe, stepped right out of camera before he realized it. So they rolled again, and by this time he was uptight and Moss didn't like what he was getting, so it was back and take it from the top once more. Then Danny started losing lines—but those things happen. The only trouble was, he had to stand there under those lights and there were interruptions when a plane went over and ruined the sound and somebody came barging in right on the middle of his long speech and then Joe jumped one of his cues and the idiot script-girl threw him the wrong prompt and he was sweating, wringing wet, and his hands started to twitch and Moss was very patient and it was Take Sixteen and no break for lunch and he could see the looks the crew was giving him and finally they wrapped it up at three-thirty, eight and a half solid hours for a lousy dialogue bit, nothing but two-shots and closeups, and it was a bomb.

Everybody was very polite and they said, "Nice work, Mr. Jackson," and "Great", and "You did it, boy," but Danny knew what he'd done.

The fight was over and he'd lost.

NO SENSE going home because Lola would ask him how did it go and Fischer would be calling and to hell with it. He thought of a little joint on the ocean below Malibu, where the lights were nice and dim and you could buy a good steak to anchor the martinis.

That was the right answer. Though he scraped a fender leaving the parking lot after they closed up the place, he made it home without pain.

Lola wasn't waiting up for him tonight—tonight hell, it was morning already, Thursday morning—but the bed in the guest room felt better than ever.

Until he closed his eyes and saw what was in the cards. Thursday morning. Thursday. And two days from now—

If the old bitch was so good at telling fortunes, if she could see everything in the cards, why hadn't she tipped him off about the test? There was a real life-and-death matter for you and she never even mentioned it. Of course she didn't; what could she or anybody else see in a lousy pack of playing cards? That's all they were, ordinary playing cards, and she was a cheap grifter and Saturday was only another day of the week.

And this was Thursday. Thursday noon, now, with Danny up and groping his way to the john and shivering in the shower and shaving and stumbling downstairs and finding the note and reading it twice, three times, before it finally sank in.

Lola gone. Left him. "Sorry . . . tried to get through to you . . . can't stand watching you destroy yourself . . . please . . . need help . . . try to understand." God, the phrases in that note, like daytime soaper dialogue. But it all added up. Lola was gone.

Danny called her mother's place in Laguna. No answer. Then he tried her sister at Arrowhead. Nothing. By this time he'd cased the joint, seen that she'd cleared out the works, everything; must have taken her all day to pack the station wagon. She meant it; probably been planning the caper for weeks. Next thing he'd be getting a call from some hotshot lawyer, one of those Lear-jet boys. Christ, the least she could have done was waited to find out if he would make the series.

The series. Danny remembered now, he was due in Projection Room Nine at two o'clock; they were screening the test.

But it was after one now. Besides, he didn't need to see the running. He knew what they had in the can—six minutes of worms.

So he climbed in the car and went to Scandia for lunch instead; at least he intended to have lunch, but by late afternoon he still was no farther than the bar.

That was where his agent caught up with him, somewhere between the fifth and the sixth Bloody Mary.

“Thought I’d find you here,” Fischer told him. “Get moving.”

“Where we going?”

“Up to the office. I’d hate to have all these nice people here see me hit you right in the mouth.”

“Get off my back, Fischer.”

“Get off your butt.” He hauled Danny from the stool. “Come on, let’s go.”

Fischer’s office was on the Strip, only a few blocks away. By the time they were there, Danny was up the wall; he knew what Fischer was going to say.

“No calls,” Fischer told the girl on the board. Then he took Danny into the private office behind his private office and closed the door.

“All right,” Fischer said. “Tell me.”

“You saw the test?”

Fischer nodded, waiting. His mouth was grim, but the hard face and the hard talk never fooled Danny. He knew that was Fischer’s act. Fischer was a sweet guy inside, always bleeding for his clients. You could see the compassion in his eyes, it was there now, the same look of pity that the fortune-teller had—

Danny wanted to explain about the fortune-teller but he knew how he would sound and besides it wouldn’t do any good. All he could do was say, “I wasn’t loaded. I swear to God I wasn’t loaded.”

“I know that. And nobody said you were. I wish you had been—I’ve seen you play a scene with a couple of drinks under your belt and come off great.” Fischer shook his head. “Everybody on the set knew what was wrong with you yesterday, but that wouldn’t matter. The trouble is, everybody in the projection room could see it today, up there on the screen. You were hungover.”

“It was that bad, huh?”

“That bad?” Fischer sighed, swiveled his chair around to face Danny. “Do I have to spell it out for you, Danny? A guy makes three pictures in a row, all bombs, and he’s had it. Sure, I know that Metro thing wasn’t your fault, but the word is out and I haven’t had an offer for six months. When it comes to films, you’re scrubbed. Moynihan tells me—”

“Never mind about Moynihan,” Danny said. “He’s my business manager. He shouldn’t even be talking to you.”

“Who else can he talk to when you won’t listen?” Fischer opened a folder on his desk, glanced at a type-sheet. “You owe eighty-three on the house and nine on the cars. You’re in hock on the furniture, that’s another twenty including the redecorating. Your checking account is minus zero. And if they yank your credit cards, you won’t have enough left to buy a bagel at Linny’s.”

Cards? Why did he have to mention cards? Danny felt a rush of heat and loosened his collar.

“KNOCK it off,” he said. “All I need is a break.”

“I got you a break.” Fischer was staring at him across the desk, just like the old lady had stared at him across the card table. “Three months I been rupturing myself to line up this TV deal for you. Salary, residuals, participation—I don’t have to tell you, you could’ve been set for life.”

Life? Suppose I have only two more days? Danny’s chest was pounding, he couldn’t take any more of this, but he had to listen. Through the blur he could see Fischer’s jabbing finger.

“So you make the test. And what do I see? You, walking around up there like a goddam zombie—”

Zombie. Danny knew what a zombie was. The living dead. Something was throbbing inside, throbbing so loud that he could barely hear Fischer saying, “Why, Danny? That’s all I want to know. Tell me why.”

But Danny couldn’t tell him why because he had to take off his jacket, had to take off his shirt, had to tear off his skin and dig out whatever it was that throbbed and pounded, throbbed and pounded underneath. He brought his hand up, feeling the pain shoot through his arm and then—

Nowhere.

Danny opened his eyes and saw the white ceiling. White as in Cedars or Sinai, a hospital ceiling.

So that’s where I am. I’m not dead. And what day is this?

“Friday,” said the fat nurse. “No, mustn’t sit up. Doctor wants us to be careful.”

Fat nurses and baby talk, that’s all he needed. Doc Carlsen was more helpful when he showed up in the evening.

“No, it’s not a stroke, nothing like that. From where I stand it may not even have been a cardiac. Dehydration, malnutrition, general exhaustion—you’ve been drinking again, haven’t you?”

“Yeah.”

“I’ve prescribed some sedation for tonight. You’ll have some lab tests tomorrow, to play safe.”

“When can I go home?”

“After we check out the tests. Meanwhile, a little rest won’t hurt you.”

“But tomorrow—”

Danny broke it off right there. What could he say, that tomorrow was Saturday, tomorrow he was going to die; it was in the cards?

Dr. Carlsen didn’t believe in cards; he believed in tests and charts and specimens. And why not? Those things made a hell of a lot more sense than the ace of spades on a dusty table in some creep-joint down on South Alvarado.

Being here in the hospital made sense, too. At least he had somebody looking after him and if there was trouble tomorrow—

But there wouldn’t be. All he had to do was swallow the nembies and go to sleep.

Danny stared at the white ceiling until it turned black and then there was nothing again, nothing but sleep, sweet sleep and the queen of spades sat across the table from him and watched while he reached for a drink only the drink wasn't there because Lola had taken it away with her when she left and he knew it didn't matter, it was only a lousy test and he could walk through it in his sleep, sweet sleep—

Danny was very much alive on Saturday morning and hungry as hell. But they wouldn't give him breakfast, not even a cup of coffee, until after they wheeled him down to the lab for the tests.

For a moment, when they were taking blood, he panicked; but like the nurse said, it wasn't going to kill him, and it didn't.

And afterwards he had lunch, a big lunch, and they let him get up to go to the john and a nice fag orderly came in and gave him a shave and he dozed off again until dinnertime.

So Saturday was almost over and he was still with it. Hell, he was even beginning to feel good, and if he could only have a drink anti a cigarette—

"Sorry. Doctor wants us to take our sedative again tonight." The fat nurse was back, a real sweetheart. But Danny took the pills and the water and settled back, because it was nine o'clock, only three hours to go. If he made the stretch everything would be right on.

If he made it? Hell, he was going to make it, he knew it now, he could feel it in his bones, in his ticker. No throbbing, no pounding; all is calm, all is bright. Bright as the white ceiling which was turning gray now, turning black again, black as the ace of spades.

Something started to thump in Danny's chest, but he tensed up, forcing himself to relax—that was funny, tensing up to relax, but it seemed to work, it was working—and now everything was calm again, calm and peaceful, he could sleep because it was quiet. Quiet as the tomb—

Danny screamed.

The lights went on and the fat nurse came running into the room. "Mr. Jackson, what's the matter, don't you know it's one in the morning—"

"One in the morning?"

She nodded.

"Sunday morning?"

When she nodded again, Danny could have kissed her. In fact he tried to kiss her because he'd made it now and he was home free.

It was easy to go back to sleep then. Everything was easy now that it was Sunday.

Sunday, with the big breakfast and the big paper. Sunday, with the fresh shave and the fag orderly bringing in the flowers from the studio—wait a minute, what the hell was this, there was nothing in the papers, how did the studio know?

DANNY found out when they plugged the phone in for his first call. Fischer.

"Look," Danny said. "I'm sorry about the other day—"

"I'm not," said Fischer. "Shut up and listen."

So Danny listened.

"Maybe it was the best thing that could have happened. Anyway, it gave me a notion. I called the studio and tipped them."

"You called the studio?"

"Right. Told them about Lola, too."

"Where'd you pick that up?"

"She phoned me Thursday night. Don't worry. I made her promise not to break the story to the papers until we were ready."

"Ready for what?"

"Stop interrupting and listen," Fischer said. "I told the studio the truth only I juggled the dates a little. Said that Lola split with you on Tuesday instead of Wednesday and you knew it when you came to do the test. The Pagliacci bit, your heart was breaking but the show must go on—you didn't look so good in there but you were giving it the old college try and how could they fault you when you were so shook up you actually collapsed the following day?"

"Do you have to sound so happy about it?" Danny asked.

"I am happy and you're gonna be happy too. Because they went for the bundle. Considering the circumstances, they're going to scrap the test, they've already been on the horn to New York and everything's set. You'll do another shot next week, as soon as the Doc says it's okay. How's that for openers, buddy-boy?"

It was good for openers and kept getting better. Because the next one who called was Lola. Crying up a storm.

"Sorry . . . all my fault . . . should have stood by when you needed me . . . told the lawyer to forget it . . . Doctor said I could come to see you tomorrow . . . oh my poor baby . . ."

Oh my aching—

But it was fine, it was A-okay because a divorce right now, even a separation, would have clobbered him for life. And he had a life, a whole new life, starting today.

Dr. Carlsen laid the topper on it that afternoon. "Preliminary lab reports are in. Too early to nail it down, but it looks as if I made a pretty good educated guess. Little murmur, slight irregularity there, but nothing we can't control with medication. And a dose of common sense."

"When do I cut out of here?"

"Perhaps tomorrow."

"I was thinking of right now."

Dr. Carlsen shrugged. "You're always thinking about right now. That's your problem." He sat down on the edge of the bed. "I was talking about common sense, Danny. Want me to spell it out for you? Two, maybe three drinks a day—one before dinner, one after, perhaps a nightcap if you're out for the evening. Regular hours. We can talk about the diet and exercise later. But the main thing is for you to stop running scared."

"Me?"

Danny gave him the big smile, but it didn't register. "You're not on now," the Doc told him. "I know what knocked you down. It was fear. Fear of what was happening to your career, fear because your marriage was coming unglued, fear of a heart attack—"

Okay, smart-ass.

"Don't you understand, Danny? Sometimes the dread is worse than the disease itself. If you can learn to face up to the things you're afraid of—"

Danny smiled, Danny nodded, Danny thanked him, Danny hustled him the hell out of there.

Maybe the Doc was right at that. The part about fear made sense. The only trouble was, he didn't know what Danny had really been afraid of. If Danny had told him, Carlsen would have called a shrinker. You don't go around spilling about fortune-tellers who predict you'll die on Saturday night.

But that was over and out now. This was Sunday and he felt great and he wasn't afraid of anything any more.

He wasn't afraid to climb out of bed and take his clothes from the closet, dress himself and march down the hall to the desk. He wasn't afraid of the fat nurse or the head nurse either, when he told her he was checking out.

Sure there was a lot of static and threats about calling Doctor and this is all highly irregular, Mr. Jackson, but if you insist, sign here.

Danny signed.

The night air felt good as he waited for a taxi out front, and everything was quiet—there was that Sunday feeling in the streets. That Sunday feeling.

Danny gave the driver his address and settled back for the long haul out to Bel Air. The driver was smart, he ducked the traffic on Wilshire and swung down over Olympic. Crummy neighborhood, lots of neon fronting the cheap bars—

"Hold it, changed my mind. Let me out here."

What the hell, why not? Didn't Doc say he could have a drink before dinner? Besides, it wasn't the drinks, it was the fear. And that was long gone now. It had died last night.

THAT called for a celebration. Even in a Mickey Mouse joint like this, topless waitresses and faceless customers; that little bird down at the end of the bar wasn't too bad, though.

"Scotch rocks." Danny glanced along the bar. "See what my friend wants."

She wasn't his friend, not yet, but the drink did it. And by the time they had a second one he and Gloria switched to a back booth.

That was her name, Gloria, one of the strippers in the floor show here, but she didn't work Sundays, sort of a busman's holiday if you get what I mean.

Danny got what she meant and a lot more, too; good figure, nice legs, the right kind of mouth. Hell, this was a celebration. It had been a long, long time. So Lola was coming back tomorrow, big deal. This was tonight. Sunday night. The first night, the grand opening of a smash hit, a long run. The New Life of Danny Jackson.

"Danny Jackson? You?" Gloria's mouth hung open. Nice, sensual lower lip. He could always tell, it was like radar, or flying by the seat of your pants. Not the seat exactly, but close. Funny, very funny, and that calls for another drink—

"Of course I know who you are." Gloria chug-a-lugged pretty good herself and now they were wedged into the same side of the booth together, all comfy-cozy.

And he was telling her how it was that he happened to fall in here, everything that happened, no names of course, but it was easy to talk and maybe if he had one more for the road—

The road led next door, of course; he had noticed the motel when he left the cab. All very convenient.

George Spelvin and wife is what he signed, and the clerk gave him a funny take but Danny wasn't afraid, he wasn't running scared now.

The ace of spades was only another card in the deck and this was a brand new deal; the queen of spades was gone and Gloria was here instead. Cute little Gloria, red hair against a white pillow, and the bed lamp throwing shadows on the wall. Big black shadows like big black eyes, staring and watching and waiting—

But no, the fear was gone, he was forgetting. Sunday night, remember? And he wasn't destroying himself, that was over and out, it had all been a mistake. A mistake to get drunk, a mistake to surrender to a sudden impulse and have his fortune told, a miscake to believe a kooky old klooch and her line about the cards. Cards don't control your life, you control your life. He'd proved it. Well, hadn't he?

"Sure, Danny. Sure you have."

He must have been thinking out loud, telling Gloria the whole story. Because she was unbuttoning his shirt and helping him and murmuring, "Sunday, that's what it is, remember? Nothing to be afraid of, I won't hurt you—"

Damned right she wouldn't. She was just what the doctor ordered. Only he hadn't ordered this. This one drink before dinner and regular hours and don't be scared. Okay, so he wasn't scared. And to hell with the doctors and the fortune-tellers too.

Danny was ready and he grabbed Gloria and yes, this was it, this was what he'd been waiting for. He stared down into eyes, her dark eyes, like the eyes of the old woman. And now they were widening with pleasure and he could see the pupils, black aces on a dusty table. And there was no pleasure, only this tearing pain, as the Ace of Spades kept coming up, up, up—

Danny didn't know it when he died, and he didn't know why he died, either. Gloria had told him nothing, not even the name she used when she did her strip act. It was just one of those phony names that strippers always use. Saturday is what she called herself—Saturday Knight.

The Funny Farm

Although long a favorite author of horror stories and winner of the prized Hugo award for science fiction, Robert Bloch catapulted into the wider public eye when Alfred Hitchcock adapted his novel, Psycho*, into a terrifying film. Since then he has written numerous screen and teleplays, produced further collections of stories and novels,* American Gothic and Night-World being two of the most recent ones, and in the course of things given the world countless imaginatively strange and shivery moments. A Robert Bloch story is distinctive for its sharp strokes of ironic humor, skillful build-up of tension and vivid glimpses of the dark side of the mind. Bloch is in the very front rank in his field and why can be well understood in the reading of this story, from August Derleth's last hardcover anthology, Dark Things.

IN ORDER to comprehend Joseph Satterlee's obsession with the comics one would have to be old enough to remember the 'Twenties. More than that, it would be necessary to remember the decade as Satterlee himself did, and such a subjective recall is impossible, even for a psychiatrist.

This isn't to say that a psychiatrist wouldn't have helped; indeed, it was a matter of more or less common knowledge around Redford that Joe Satterlee was a real weirdo, and inevitably his place of residence was dubbed "the funny farm." Because of the comics, naturally—the thousands upon thousands of comics Satterlee collected.

It was generally conceded that Satterlee would pay a ridiculously high price for any old piece of multicolored paper depicting the antics of Little Jimmy, Salesman Sam, or Polly and Her Pals. Obviously he must be some kind of a nut. Spending all that money on such foolishness was like—

The people who said such things generally paused here, because they didn't know what it was like.

Only Satterlee knew that. It was like buying a ticket to the past.

And that, of course, is exactly what Satterlee was doing. He was time-traveling. Returning, via the medium of comics, to the very best and most comfortable portion of that past—which, for him, was the 'Twenties.

Not the Roaring Twenties, mind you. The Twenties didn't roar for Satterlee or for anyone else who spent his childhood during that dim and distant decade. Actually it was a very quiet time, except for Fourth of July—there were less crowds, less traffic, even the movies were silent, and if one's family actually owned a superhetrodyne radio it was heard through the medium of earphones. Roaring would have hurt Joe Satterlee's ears, for he had mastoiditis; even the earphones gave him trouble. As a result he was frequently absent from school and almost always away from the other children in the playgrounds and vacant lots. He was a shy youngster, a loner, a great reader.

Perhaps that's why the comics became so important to him. He'd actually learned to read from the funny papers and his most pleasant memories centered around those long, lonely afternoons in the attic with the collection of Sunday comic sections he'd started accumulating at the age of seven.

The funny papers were actually funny in those days. There were Happy Hooligan, with the tin can on his head chinless Andy Gump and rich Uncle Bim from Australia, Barney Google and the faithful Spark Plug, Boob McNutt, Count Screwloose of Toulouse, cross-eyed Iggy in the Napoleon hat, lanky Mutt and dumpy bewhiskered Jeff. He knew them all, followed them faithfully throughout the week and reveled with them when they cut loose in full-page color on Sundays. When Jiggs took off his shoes and sneaked out on Maggie for a forbidden orgy of corned-beef and cabbage at Dinty Moore’s, he tiptoed along at his heels. ‘When Moon Mullins escorted Lord Plushbottom to the pool-hall, he went with them. When Krazy Kat cavorted across the lunar-like landscape of Never Never Land, he was there. Brickbats flew, grotesques capered and saw stars, animals spoke, balloon-encased lightbulbs signalled the origin of ideas in empty heads. Here was a world of fancy with a language and logic all its own—a world of escape and enchantment.

And somehow, because Joe Satterlee was largely cut off from the actual world beyond the rainstreaked or frost-fogged attic windows, the funny pages served him as a guide to reality.

His Africa was the continent of Hans and Fritz—where Katzenjammers dwelt with a cannibal king who wore a top hat and a monocle, and the Herring Brothers pursued piratical careers to the point of idiocy. Later, it became the realm of Tarzan, of Tantor and Numa and Jad-bal-ja the Golden Lion. His ideas of higher education derived from Harold Teen, his notion of the business world from Winnie Winkle and Tillie the Toiler. Even in the early Thirties, his impression of life in the big city was based on the exploits of Dick Tracy or the vicissitudes of Apple Mary and Dixie Dugan. A psychiatrist might make a case for Satterlee’s lifelong bachelorhood from the attitudes implanted by a faithful reading of Mr. and Mrs., Toots and Casper and the tragicomedies enacted by George Bungle.

A psychiatrist might make quite a case indeed; pointing out that concentration on brightly colored figures in a darkened attic setting can serve to induce a form of auto-hypnosis. and a preoccupation with the idealized childhood of a Skeezix, a Skippy or even an Ella Cinders may make the reality pale by comparison. And certainly a psychiatrist might sense a peril in too great an identification with the dream-worlds of Little Nemo, Buck Rogers, Flash Gordon, Prince Valiant, Mandrake the Magician, and—at the very’ end of the cycle—Superman.

Not that Joe Satterlee emerged from comic-reading at the end of the ’Thirties as a Superman character himself. If anything, he was hardly the equal of a Clark Kent.

He became a bookkeeper, then an accountant, but was still—particularly after the death of his parents—more of a loner than ever.

And his collection grew. All through his years in the city he lived in a boardinghouse (without, needless to say, the amusing companionship of a Major Hoople) but he still retained the family home outside Redford. And it was here that he dispatched the comics he acquired through bookstore browsing and mail-order acquisition.

It was here, following his retirement in the late ’Sixties that he settled down to what could well be described as a second childhood. Premature senility might be the psychiatric diagnosis; as for Satterlee himself, he knew only that he felt safe and comfortable away from a world where everything had changed and even the comic strips weren’t funny any more.

He didn’t like that world. He didn’t even like his own image in the mirror—it reminded him too much of Casper Milquetoast. But he did like sitting in the attic, where rack-lined walls housed his accumulation, and reading once again the adventures of Little Orphan Annie, Joe Palooka, or Terry and the Pirates.

Once a week he went into Redford for groceries, and more infrequently he ventured to the bank, the hardware store and the barber shop. People in town had a somewhat vague impression of him—and his impression of them was equally remote. Somehow, gradually, he seemed to withdraw into a realm of his own, where all problems were neatly compartmentalized in panel-strips; a world of bright colors and silently sensed messages, of easy laughter and innocent adventure which comforted him by satirizing the harsh reality of the wilderness outside his windows. He could laugh at that reality with The Little King or even The Nebbs; sometimes he laughed out loud, and when on occasion he did turn on his small-screen television set for the news he found himself watching the war footage and echoing Wimpy’s ancient dictum of, “Let’s you and him fight.”

Joe Satterlee often dreamed about comics now, and at first it rather disconcerted him to encounter Abie Kabibble or Daddy Warbucks in the familiar surroundings of his own home. But after a time he became accustomed to it, and in fancy he could picture the dark halls of the rambling old house peopled with the colorful companions of his youthful imaginings. Again, a psychiatrist might have a field-day with a man whose erotic fantasies revolved around the earliest incarnation of Dixie Dugan, but then what would a psychiatrist know about the child who dwelt within the mind of an elderly, greying eccentric? The mind is merely an instrument of perception, and if it chooses to perceive the dream more vividly than the reality, who is to say that this is an error?

Satterlee loved his comic-strip companions, and he came to feel that they loved him. They lived together quite contentedly, and if Satterlee was indeed childish, he preferred the image to that of Caspar Milquetoast, the quite ineffectual man in the mirror whose empty daily routine protested both the comics collection and the child who retreated into its ageless domain in search of long-ago laughter. So what went on in Satterlee's house was really of no concern to a psychiatrist at all.

The only person who became concerned was Lenny Morgan. And Lenny Morgan was no psychiatrist—he was only a thief.

But a damned good one, Morgan told himself. If he hadn't been so good he wouldn't be hot, and if he wasn't hot, he wouldn't have come to this backwoods boondock to sit things out. Tall timber makes a good hiding-place, but Morgan figured it was a drag. He was just about ready to take his chances and cut back to town when he heard about this Joe Satterlee and his comics collection.

The first item of value that a good thief steals is information. And the information that Morgan obtained through listening to a chance conversation in the barber shop sounded valuable enough. He absorbed it the way a computer absorbs data.

An old man. Living alone. In a big house. On a back road three miles outside of town. No friends. Well-fixed for money. Spends it all for his collection. Must have thousands of comics out there.

Comics. That was the operative word, setting the circuits in motion, signaling all systems go.

Because Morgan’s computerlike mind already had data stored away on comics. It was his business to know about hobbies and hobbyists.

Take your average stamp collection, now. Or better still, don’t take it. No matter what the owner laid out for it over the years, chances are that a dealer will only offer one-tenth of the catalogue value, except for certain U.S. items. And if the collection contains rarities, you must peddle it around to the big operators who can afford to buy. This is as risky as trying to sell a Rembrandt to an art dealer—he’ll know at once where it came from. And the big stamp merchants know who owns the scarce, valuable material. They’d spot Morgan as a ringer every time.

Coins are better, particularly gold and silver. But a good haul is bulky, heavy, hard to handle. You need the same amount of manpower it would take to rob a mint. So coins are out. Morgan never touched coins.

Paintings, sculpture, antiques—again, these items are too heavy, too awkward to load and too difficult to stash away until you dump them. Jewelry is good, but for that you need a fence, and a fence will steal you blind. Morgan didn’t approve of anyone stealing from a fellow-professional, particularly if that fellow-professional was himself.

But comics; now you’re with it! He’d seen the lists and the ads in collectors’ magazines. At first he couldn’t believe it—little kids, ten and twelve years old, paying a hundred and fifty bucks for some old Batman or Wonder Woman comic that sold for a dime when it first came out thirty years ago. It was big business, and getting bigger.

It was a big business, but the merchandise was small. Portable, easy to handle. And easy to dispose of, with no way of tracing it, no questions asked—you could even peddle it by mail if you liked. One man could fill a station wagon with a load worth a fortune.

Morgan had a station wagon.

So there were no problems. But just to make sure, lie checked everything out. It took him another week—cooped up in the crummy little motel with the red-jacketed yucks who came up to this godforsaken wilderness for the fall hunting season—but he stuck it out. Eating in the fry-joints, hanging around the barbershop, knocking off a few beers in the taverns, and always keeping his ears open. He found out what he needed to know.

Joe Satterlee didn't hunt. Probably meant he couldn't handle a gun—chances were he didn't even own one. And he wouldn't have any hunting dogs, either. Or any dogs at all. Which was important, for obvious reasons.

Another bit of good news turned up along the way. Old Satterlee was deaf. Wore a hearing aid, and it wasn't much good, either. When he came to town on Thursdays to stock up groceries for the week, he had trouble hearing the clerk.

Morgan got that word from a conversation he eavesdropped on in the store itself, but he didn't stop there. He waited until Thursday afternoon and planted himself across the street to wait. Sure enough, along about five o'clock, this beat-up old Plymouth rattled into a parking place and the skinny, gray-haired jigger climbed out. He wore a hearing aid all right, and when he headed into the store Morgan knew he'd spotted the clown. Morgan noticed he had trouble lugging his grocery bags when he came out, which meant he was pretty feeble, and that was good too; there'd be no trouble handling him.

So when Satterlee drove out of town, Morgan trailed him in the station wagon. He kept a good distance behind, but he followed him right to the dirt side-road where the Plymouth turned off into the woods. Morgan didn't go after him. Instead he drove on, checking the location of the nearest neighbors and discovering that the next farmhouse was almost a mile away. Just past it was the junction with the main highway, so the setup was perfect.

And it was even more perfect by the time Friday night rolled around. Morgan checked out of the motel at noon, tipped the Indian broad who did the cleaning, and making sure that both she and the motel clerk knew he was anxious to get back to Duluth before dark. Then he cut out for the main highway, cruised thirty miles to a flyspeck on the map called Purdee, and took a room at the motel there. He timed the run at half an hour. He had a sandwich and coffee for dinner—no point eating a heavy meal just before going to work—and waited around until ten o'clock. Nobody noticed him pull out of the motel parking place and he barrelled back up the highway in plenty of time to get to Satterlee's place by eleven o'clock. And it was exactly eleven on the dot when he turned the station wagon onto the dirt road.

The night was dark and there was a feel of rain in the air. Which could be another break for Morgan; a good heavy fall rain would wash out tire tracks. And since the old jigger wouldn't be expected to show up in town again until next Thursday, that gave him six days clear. Maybe no one would get around to missing him for another four or five days after that, and by then the local fuzz wouldn't even remember Morgan. With all these hunters coming in, who kept track? It was the kind of caper Morgan always dreamed about.

Up in the old house Joe Satterlee was dreaming too. Sleeping in the big bed his parents occupied when he was a child. The bed he sometimes crawled into on Sunday mornings; little Joey, snuggling up in the warm, comfy-cosy place between Mama and Papa.

And Mama, laughing. Oh, Joey—not again?

Please, Papa promised he'd read them to me.

Papa shaking his head, but grinning as he reached for the papers. All right. Which one do you want first?

Hairbreadth Harry, Papa.

And the bright pages of the funny-papers unfurling across the bed, crispy-crinkly, smelling of ink, rattling and rustling—

Something was rattling and rustling now.

He awakened in darkness and he wasn't Joey any more, he was Joe, and it was half a century later, and he couldn't hear clearly and he couldn't see at all, but there was something.

Satterlee fumbled on the night-stand for his hearing aid, then threw back the covers and swung his feet to the floor. He fitted them into his slippers and stood up, moving towards the light-switch near the door.

Before he reached it the beam of the flashlight seared across his eyes and the voice buzzed in his ears.

“Don’t move.”

Satterlee didn’t move. He stood stock-still, staring at the burly man holding the flashlight. Who was he? Why was he scowling so?

He didn’t ask the questions aloud, and if he had, Morgan wouldn’t have answered him. Because Morgan was uptight.

It was all going according to plan, and there were no hitches anywhere along the line. No dog. No trouble forcing the door downstairs. No trouble finding his way here to the bedroom. And sure as hell no trouble with this old futz in the nightgown. A nightgown, for Christ’s sake—who wears them nowadays?

Maybe that’s what was bugging him. This wasn’t nowadays. This house. The damned furniture downstairs, like something out of a Sears Roebuck catalogue for 1920. The drapes and the rugs all mouldy, and everything smelling the way it did. Musty. Old. And dark as a tomb. He wanted no part of this place and the sooner he could split the better. So it was time to pop the question.

“Where are they?”

The old jerk blinked at him as if he hadn’t heard. Morgan gave him a swipe across the side of his forehead with the heavy flashlight. “Where are they?” he repeated.

And this time he got complete attention. “Where are what?” the creep wanted to know.

“The comics,” Morgan said. “I want to see the comics.”

The jigger’s mouth dropped open and for a moment he looked like a little kid—his lower lip wobbling as though he was getting ready to bawl.

But then Morgan lifted the flashlight again and old Satterlee got the message.

“Upstairs,” he mumbled. “In the attic.”

“Let’s go,” Morgan told him.

"What do you—?"

Morgan prodded him in the ribs with the flashlight and Satterlee shut up fast. He turned and shuffled out of the bedroom and down the hall. Morgan was right behind him, fanning the flash beam over the floorboards and the steps of the attic stairway.

The steps creaked loudly under their feet, and an answering echo came from above, but it didn't matter. There was no one else to hear. They were alone in the house, alone in the big, beamed room with the steeply slanted roof, alone in the darkness.

The beam of the flashlight sent shadows scurrying across the walls. Morgan saw the racks—row upon row of racks; the kind of thing he remembered seeing in the public library when he was a kid. Used them to store old newspapers or something.

He prodded Satterlee forward and turned the flash towards the nearest rack for a closer look. Then he shook his head. These were old newspapers. A whole damned attic filled with newspaper sheets—row on row of them, covered with cellophane, and the cellophane covered with dust. Peering down, he rubbed his fingers across the surface of a sheet and the color leaped forth. Toonerville Folks, by Fontaine Fox. One of those Sunday funny papers.

Morgan fanned the flashlight, Dumb Dora. Petey Dink. Foxy Grandpa. They were all funny papers.

He grabbed Satterlee's arm. "All right. Where you hiding the comics?"

Satterlee gestured at the racks. "These are the comics."

Morgan twisted his arm. "Not the newspapers. Comic books."

"Books? But I don't have any books—"

Morgan released his grip, staring at the rows of racks looming in the shadow's.

It was the truth, and he knew it. Satterlee was too frightened to lie. There were no books. Because in the days when the old man was a kid, these newspaper strips were the only comics, and that's what he'd collected.

Lousy old newspapers, not worth a dime even to a goddamn junk-dealer. No books, it was all for nothing—

Something was building inside Morgan, something that had to burst. He reached out blindly and ripped a paper from its frame, shredding the cellophane covering and tossing it to the floor. He tore another free, crumpled it.

“Please—don’t—!” Satterlee quavered. But the man wasn’t listening, nobody listened, nobody understood. These were all he had, his companions, his friends for fifty years, he’d preserved and protected them for their lifetimes, destroying his collection was like destroying his life—

Destroying his life. Satterlee felt the tug at the side of his head as the angry man jerked the cord of his hearing aid. He saw the livid, enraged face before him, saw the beefy hands rise gripping the ends of the cord to whip it around his neck, then felt the agonizing pressure against his throat.

And that, for Satterlee, was all.

But it wasn’t all for Morgan. Only the rage died with his victim.

Now he stood over the body in the darkness; the body, crumpled on the floor like one of those old newspaper sheets. The attic was drafty and the night wind whispered through the papers in their racks.

The whispering wasn’t real, of course, because there was no one here but himself. The real whispers would come later, when the body was discovered.

Morgan knew how to prevent that. The newspapers were the answer. A heap of old newspapers and a match—

He moved to the racks and started to tear the cellophane-covered sheets free with both hands. The paper rattled. And the wind rose all around him, making a rustling sound, a stirring sound, a whispering like the murmur of many voices. Cracked, brittle voices. Angry voices. Voices sounding from the shadows. Shadows that suddenly rose and moved.

Shadows do move, and when Morgan turned and saw them he was not alarmed. But shadows have no substance—they do not creak. And now there was a creaking of floorboards from the racks in the far corner.

Morgan started to glance in that direction, and as he did so he heard the attic door slam shut. Then he did panic for a moment, until he realized it must be the work of the wind. He dropped the wadded newspapers he'd clenched in his fists and spread them across the floor. Whispers whirled and shadows slithered, but Morgan ignored them, reaching for a match.

The light flared up, and then Morgan couldn't ignore them any longer—the shadows streaming forth from the racks, the shadows that surrounded and converged.

Morgan rose, then stepped back quickly as he saw the silhouette of the tall man in the top hat. the tall man carrying a cane that bore a curious resemblance to a magician's wand. He saw the outlines of the baldheaded figure with the tiny tin cup perched atop its bony head, the grotesque profile of a moustached man with a receding chin, a long-haired giant with a sword.

And then, from the moving mass of rustling, whispering shapes, an image emerged—the brightly colored, garish image of a small carrot-topped girl with eyes widened in a stare. Eyes that had no pupils.

She opened her mouth and the whisper came forth—a dry, paper-thin whisper.

"Get him, Sandy."

Something growled. Something crouched. Something sprang.

Morgan screamed once, and then the shadow was upon him and the other shadows watched and whispered as he died.

Then there was only silence in the attic.

A silence lasting for ten days, until the state police broke in and found Satterlee's body with the cord of the hearing aid still twisted around his neck. The verdict of death by strangulation was easy to arrive at.

Morgan's corpse presented a more difficult problem. He was sprawled amidst a pile of old comic strips—long-forgotten images of Mandrake the Magician, Happy Hooligan, Andy Gump, Prince Valiant, Little Orphan Annie. But there was no clue as to bow he met his death.

All they could think of was that a timber wolf had bitten out his throat.

But then, they lacked Satterlee’s imagination.

The Animal Fair

billed as the world's most ferocious beast, it was far more vicious than the public dreamed

IT WAS DARK when the truck dropped Dave off at the deserted freight depot. Dave had to squint to make out the lettering on the weather-faded sign, MEDLEY, OKLAHOMA—POP. 1134.

The trucker said he could probably get another lift on the state highway up past the other end of town, so Dave hit the main drag. And it was a drag.

Nine o'clock of a hot summer evening and Medley was closed for the night. Fred's Eats had locked up, the Jiffy SuperMart had shut down, even Phil's Phill-Up Gas stood deserted. There were no cars parked on the dark street, not even the usual cluster of kids on the corners.

Dave wondered about this, but not for long. In five minutes, he covered the length of Main Street and emerged on open fields at the far side, and that's when he saw the lights and heard the music.

They had a carnival going in the little county fairgrounds up ahead—canned music blasting from amplifiers, cars crowding the parking lot, mobs milling across the midway.

Dave wasn't craving this kind of action, but he still had 80 cents in his jeans and he hadn't eaten anything since breakfast. He turned down the side road leading to the fairgrounds.

Like he figured, the carnival was a bummer. One of those little mud shows, traveling by truck; a couple of beat-up rides for the kids and a lot of come-ons for the local yokels. Wheel O’ Fortune, Pitch-a-Winner, Take a Chance on a Blanket—that kind of jive. By the time Dave got himself a burger and coffee at one of the stands, he knew the score. A big fat zero.

But not for Medley, Oklahoma—Pop. 1134. The whole damn town was here tonight and probably every red-neck for miles around, shuffling and shoving along the carny street. Dave had to do a little shuffling and shoving himself to get through to the far end of the midway.

And it was there, on die far end, that he saw die small red tent with the tiny platform before it. Hanging limp and listless in the still air, a sun-bleached banner proclaimed the wonders within. CAPTAIN RYDER’S HOLLYWOOD JUNGLE SAFARI, the banner read.

What a Hollywood jungle safari was, Dave didn’t know. And the wrinkled cloth posters lining die sides of the entrance weren’t much help. A picture of a guy in an explorer’s outfit, tangling with a big snake wrapped around his neck—the same joker prying open the jaws of a crocodile—another drawing showing him wrestling a lion. The last poster showed the guy standing next to a cage; inside the cage was a black furry question mark, way over six feet high. The lettering underneath was black and furry, too. WHAT IS IT? SEE THE MIGHTY MONARCH OF THE JUNGLE ALIVE ON THE INSIDE!

Dave didn’t know what it was and he cared less. But he’d been bumping along those corduroy roads all day and he was wasted and the noise from the amplifiers here on the midway hurt his ears. At least there was some kind of a show-going on inside, and when he saw the open space gaping between the canvas and the ground at the corner of the tent, he stooped and slid under.

The tent was a canvas oven.

Dave could smell oil in the air; on hot summer nights in Oklahoma, you can always smell it. And the crowd in here smelled worse. Bad enough that he was thumbing his way through and couldn’t take a bath, but what was their excuse?

The crowd huddled around the base of a portable wooden stage at the rear of the tent, listening to a pitch from Captain Ryder. At least that’s who Dave figured it was, even though the character with the phony safari hat and the dirty white riding breeches didn’t look much like his pictures on the banners. He was handing out a spiel in one of those hoarse, gravelly voices that carry without a microphone—some hype about being a Hollywood stunt man and African explorer—and there wasn’t a snake or a crocodile or a lion anywhere in sight.

The two-bit hamburger began churning up a storm in Dave’s guts, and between the body heat anti the smells, he’d just about had it in here. He started to turn and push his way through the mol) when the man up on the stage thumped the boards with his cane.

“And now friends, if you’ll gather round a little closer——”

The crowd swept forward in unison, like the straws of a giant broom, and Dave found himself pressed right up against the edge of the square-shaped, canvas-covered pit beside the end of the platform. He couldn’t get through now if he tried; all the red-necks were bunched together, waiting.

Dave waited, too, but he stopped listening to the voice on the platform. All that jive about Darkest Africa was a put-on. Maybe these clowns went for it, but Dave wasn’t buying a word. He just hoped the old guy would hurry and get the show over with: all he wanted now was out of here.

Captain Ryder tapped the canvas covering of the pit with his cane and his harsh tones rose. The heat made Dave yawn loudly, but some of the phrases filtered through.

“—About to see here tonight the world’s most ferocious monster—raptured at deadly peril to life and limb——”

Dave shook his head. He knew what was in the pit. Some crummy animal picked up secondhand from a circus, maybe a scroungy hyena. And two to one it wasn’t even alive, just stuffed. Big deal.

Captain Ryder lifted the canvas cover and pulled it back behind the pit. He flourished his cane.

“Behold—the lord of the jungle!”

The crowd pressed, pushed, peered over the rim of the pit.

The crowd gasped.

And Dave, pressing and peering with the rest, stared at the creature blinking up at him from the bottom of the pit.

It was a live, full-grown gorilla.

The monster squatted on a heap of straw, its huge forearms secured to steel stakes by lengths of heavy chain. It gaped upward at the rim of faces, moving its great, gray head slowly from side to side, the yellow-fanged mouth open and the massive jaws set in a vacant grimace. Only the little rheumy, red-rimmed eyes held a hint of expression—enough to tell Dave, who had never seen a gorilla before, that this animal was sick.

The matted straw at the base of the pit was wet and stained; in one corner, a battered tin plate rested untouched, its surface covered with a soggy slop of shredded carrots, okra and turnip greens floating in an oily scum beneath a cloud of buzzing blowflies. In the stifling heat of the tent, the acrid odor rising from the pit was almost overpowering.

Dave felt his stomach muscles constrict. He tried to force his attention back to Captain Ryder. The old guy was stepping offstage now, moving behind the pit and reaching down into it with his cane.

“Nothing to be afraid of, folks; as you can see, he’s perfectly harmless, aren’t you, Bobo?”

The gorilla whimpered, huddling back against the soiled straw to avoid die prodding cane. But die chains confined movement and the cane began to dig its tip into the beast’s shaggy shoulders.

“And now Bobo’s going to do a little dance for the folks—right?” The gorilla whimpered again, but the point of the cane jabbed deeply and the rasping voice firmed in command.

“Up, Bobo—up!”

The creature lumbered to its haunches. As the cane rose and fell about its shoulders, the bulky body began to sway. The crowd oohed and aahed and snickered.

"That's it! Dance for the people, Bobo—dance!"

A swarm of flies spiraled upward to swirl about the furry form shimmering in the heat. Dave saw the sick beast shuffle, moving to and fro, to and fro. Then his stomach was moving in responsive rhythm and he had to shut his eyes as he turned and fought his way blindly through the murmuring mob.

"Hey—watch where the hell ya goin', fella."

Dave got out of the tent just in time.

Getting rid of the hamburger helped and getting away from the carnival grounds helped, too, but not enough. As Dave moved up the road between the open fields, he felt the nausea return. The oily air made him dizzy and he knew he'd have to lie down for a minute. He dropped into the ditch beside the road, shielded behind a clump of weeds, and closed his eyes to stop the whirling sensation. Only for a minute—

The dizziness went away, but behind his closed eyes he could still see the gorilla, still see the expressionless face and the all-too-expressive eyes. Eyes peering up from the pile of dirty straw in the pit, eyes clouding with pain and hopeless resignation as die chains clanked and the cane flicked across the hairy shoulders.

Ought to be a law, Dave thought. There must be some kind of law to stop it, treating a poor dumb animal like that. And the old guy. Captain Ryder—there ought to be a law for an animal like him, too.

Ah. to hell with it. Better shut it out of his mind now, get some rest. Another couple of minutes wouldn't hurt.

It was the thunder that finally woke him. The thunder jerked him into awareness, and then he felt the warm, heavy drops pelting his head and face.

Dave rose and the wind swept over him, whistling across the fields. He must have been asleep for hours, because everything was pitch black, and when he glanced behind him, die lights of the carnival were gone.

For an instant, the sky turned silver and he could see the rain pour down; then the thunder came again, giving him the message. This wasn't just a summer shower, it was a real storm. Another minute and he was going to be soaking wet. By the time he got up to the slate highway, he could drown, and even if he made it there, chances for a lift looked bad. Nobody traveled in this weather. Maybe lie could find some kind of shelter, he thought.

Dave zipped up his jacket, pulled the collar around his neck. It didn't help and neither did walking up the road, but he might as well get going. The wind was at his back and that helped a little, inn moving against the rain was like walking through a wall of water.

Another flicker of lightning, another rumble of thunder. And then the flickering and the tumbling merged and held steady; suddenly, the light grew brighter and a sound rose over the hiss of wind and rain.

Dave glanced back over his shoulder and saw the source—the headlights and engine of a truck coming along the road from behind him. As it moved closer, Dave realized it wasn't a truck: it was a camper, one of those two-decker jobs with a driver's cab up front.

Right now, he didn't give a damn what it was, as long as it stopped and picked him up. Before the camper came alongside him, Dave stepped out, waving his arms.

The camper slowed, halted. The shadow in the cab leaned over from behind the wheel and a hand pushed the window vent open on the passenger side. "Want a lift, buddy? Get in."

The door swung open and Dave climbed up into the cab. He slid onto the seat and pulled the door shut behind him. The camper started to move again.

"Shut the window," the driver said. "Rain's blowing in."

Dave closed it, then wished he hadn't. The air inside the cab was heavy with odors—not just perspiration but something else. Dave recognized the smell even before the driver produced the bottle from his jacket pocket.

“Want a slug? Fresh corn likker. Tastes like hell, but it’s better ’n nothing.”

“No, thanks.”

“Suit yourself.” The bottle tilted and gurgled. Lightning flared across the roadway ahead, glinting against the glass of the windshield, the glass of the upturned bottle. In its momentary glare, Dave caught a glimpse of the driver’s face and the flash of lightning brought a flash of recognition. The driver was Captain Ryder.

Thunder growled, prowling the sky, and the heavy camper turned onto the slick, rain-swept surface of the state highway.

“What’s the matter, you deaf or something? I asked you where you’re heading.”

Dave came to with a start. “Oklahoma City,” he said.

“You hit the jackpot. That’s where I’m going.”

Some jackpot. Dave had been thinking about the old guy. remembering the gorilla in the pit. He hated this bastard’s guts and the idea of riding with him all the way to Oklahoma City made his stomach churn again. On the other hand, walking along in a storm in the middle of the prairie was no great stomach soother, so what the hell?

The camper lurched and Ryder fought the wheel. “Boy—sure is a cutter! Get these things often around here?”

“I wouldn’t know.” Dave said. “This is my first time through. I’m meeting a friend in Oklahoma City. We figure on driving out to Hollywood together.”

“Hollywood?” The hoarse voice deepened. “That goddamn place!”

“But don’t you come from there?”

Ryder glanced up quickly and lightning flickered across his sudden frown. Seeing him this close. Dave realized he wasn’t so old; something besides time had shaped that scowl, etched the bitter lines around eyes and mouth.

“Who told you that?” Ryder said.

“I was at the carnival tonight. I saw your show.”

Ryder grunted and his eyes tracked the road ahead through the twin pendulums of the windshield wipers. “Pretty lousy, huh?”

Dave began to nod. then caught himself. No sense starting anything. “That gorilla of yours looked like it might be sick.”

“Bobo? He’s all right. Just the weather. We open up North, he’ll be line.” Ryder nodded in the direction of the camper bulking behind him. “Haven’t heard a peep out of him since we started.”

“He’s traveling with you?”

“Whaddya think, I ship him airmail?” A hand rose from the wheel, gesturing. “This camper’s built special. I got the upstairs, he’s down below. I keep the back open so’s lie gets some air, but no problem—I got it all barred. Take a look through that window behind you.”

Dave turned and peered through the wire-meshed window at the rear of the cab. He could see the lighted interior of the camper’s upper level, neatly and normally outfitted for occupancy. Shifting his gaze, he stared into the darkness below. Lashed securely to the side walls were the tent, the platform boards, the banners and the rigging: the floor space between them was covered with straw, heaped into a sort of nest. Crouched against the barred opening at the far end was the black bulk of the gorilla, back turned as it faced the road to the rear, intent on the roaring rain. The tamper went into a skid for a moment and the beast twitched, jerking its head around so that Dave caught a glimpse of its glazed eyes. It scented to whimper softly, but because of the thunder. Dave couldn’t be sure.

“Snug as a bug.” Ryder said. “And so are we.” He had the bottle out again, deftly uncorking it with one hand. “Sure you don’t want a belt?”

“I’ll pass.” Dave said.

The bottle raised, then paused. “Hey, wait a minute.” Ryder was scowling at him again. “You’re not on something else, are you, buddy?”

“Drugs?” Dave shook his head. “Not me.”

“Good thing you’re not.” The bottle tilted, lowered again as Ryder corked it. “I hate that trap. Drugs. Drugs and hippies. Hollywood’s full of both. You take my advice, you keep away from there. No place for a kid, not anymore.” He belched loudly, started to put the bottle back into his jacket pocket, then uncorked it again.

Date saw that the captain was on his way to getting loaded. Best thing to do would be to keep him talking, take his mind oil the bottle before he knocked the camper oil the road.

“No kidding, were you really a Hollywood stunt man?” Date said.

“Sure, one of the best. But that was back in the old days, before the place went to hell. Worked for all the majors—nick riding, fancy falls, doubling fight scenes, the works. You ask anybody who knows, they’ll tell you old Cap Ryder was right up there with Yakima Cantttt. maybe even better.” The voice rasped on. harsh and proud. “Seven-fifty a day. that’s what I drew. Seven hundred and fifty, every day I worked. And I worked a lot.”

“I didn’t know they paid that kind of dough.” Dave said.

“You got to remember one thing. I wasn’t just taking falls in the long shots. When they hired Cap Ryder, they knew they were getting sonic fancy talent. Not many stunt men can handle animals. You ever see any of those old jungle pictures on television—Tarzan movies, stuff like that? Well, in over half of ’em. I’m the guy handling the cats. Lions, leopards, tigers, you name it.”

“Sounds exciting.”

“Sure, if you like hospitals. In one shot, I wrestled a black panther, like to tip my arm clean off. Seven-fifty sounds like a lot of loot, but you should have seen what I laid out in medical bills. Not to mention what I paid for costumes and extras. Like the lionskins and the apesuit——”

“I don’t get it.” Dave frowned. “Costumes?”

“Sometimes they need an action shot dose up and the star’s face has to be in it. Well, of course they can’t use a real animal, so if it was a fight scene with a lion or whatever, that’s where I came in handy—I doubled for the animal. Would you believe it. three grand I laid out for a lousy monkey suit alone! But it paid off. You should have seen the big pad I had overlooking Laurel Canyon. Four bedrooms, three-car garage, tennis court, swimming pool, sauna, everything you can think of. Melissa loved it——"

"Melissa?"

Ryder shook his head. "What'm I talking about? You don't want to hear any of that crud about the good old days. All water over the dam."

The mention of water evidently reminded him of thirst, because he reached for the bottle again. And ibis time, when he tilted it. it gurgled its last. Ryder cranked the window down and flung the bottle out into the rain.

"All gone." he muttered. "Finished. No more bottle. No more house. No more Melissa."

"Who was she?" Dave said.

"You really want to know?" Ryder jerked his thumb toward the windshield. Dave followed the gesture, puzzled, until he raised his glance to the roof of the cab. There, fastened directly above the rearview mirror, was a small picture frame. Staring out of it was the face of a girl: blonde hair, nice features and the kind of smile you see in the pages of high school annuals.

"My niece." Ryder told him. "Sixteen. But I took her when site was only five, right after my sister died. Took her and raised her for eleven years. Raised her right, too. Let me tell you. that girl never lacked for anything. Whatever she wanted, whatever she needed, she got. The trips we took together—the good times we had—hell. I guess it sounds silly, but you'd be surprised what a kick you can get out of seeing a kid have fun. And smart? President of the junior class at Brixley—that's the name of the private school I put her in. best in town, half the stars sent their own daughters there. And that's what she was to me. just like my own flesh and blood daughter. So go figure it. How it happened I II never know." Ryder blinked at the road ahead, forcing his eyes into focus.

"How what happened?" Dave asked.

"The hippies, the goddamn sons-a-bitching hippies."

Dave noticed Ryder's eyes were suddenly alert amid the network of ugly wrinkles.

"Don't ask me where she met the bastards," Ryder continued. "I thought I was guarding her front all that, but those lousy freaks arc all over the place. She must've run into them through one of her friends at school—Christ knows, you see plenty of weirdos even in Bel Air. But you got to remember, she was just sixteen and how could she guess What she was getting into? I suppose at that age, an older guy with a heard and a Fender guitar and a souped-up cycle looks pretty exciting.

"Anyhow, they got to her one night when I was away on location. Maybe she invited them over to the house, maybe they just showed up and she asked them in. Four of 'em, all stoned out of their skulls. Dude, that was the oldest one's name. He was like the leader and it was his idea from the start. Everybody knew that site never smoked grass or fooled around with drugs, so I guess he got the idea of pulling a fast one. Must have asked her to serve something to drink, and then he probably slipped the stud into her glass. Enough to finish oil a bull elephant, the coroner said."

"You mean it killed her?"

"Not right away. I wish to Christ it had." Ryder turned, his face working, and Dave had to strain to hear his voice through the rush of rain.

"According to the coroner, she must have lived for at least an hour. Long enough for them to take turns—Dude and the three others. Long enough after that for them to get the idea.

"They were in my den and I had the place all fixed up like a kind of trophy room—animal skins all over the wall, native drums, voodoo masks, stuff I'd picked up on my trips And here were these four freaks, spaced out. and the kid. blowing her mind. One of the bastards took down a drum and started beating on it. Another got hold of a mask and started hopping around like a witch doctor. And Dude—it was Dude, all right. I know it for sure—he and the other creep pulled the lionskin off the wall and draped it over Melissa. Because this was a trip and they were playing Africa. Great White Hunter. Me Tarzan, you Jane.

"By this time, Melissa couldn't even stand up anymore. Dude got her down on her hands and knees and she just wobbled there. And then—that dirty rotten son of a bitch—he pulled down the drapery cords and tied the lionskin over her head and shoulders. And he took a spear down from the wall, one of the Masai spears, and he was going to jab her in the ribs with it.

"Thai's what I saw when I went in. Dude, the big stud, standing over Melissa with that spear.

"He didn't stand long. One look at me and the fun was over. I think he threw the spear before he ran, but I can't remember. I can't remember anything about the next couple of minutes. They said I broke one freak's collarbone and the creep in the mask had a concussion from where his head hit the wall. The third one was almost dead by the time the squad arrived and pried my fingers loose from his neck. As it was, they were too late to save him.

"Anti they were too late for Melissa. She just lay there under that dirty lionskin—that's the part I do remember, the part I wish I could forget——"

"You killed a kid?" Dave said.

Ryder shook his head. "I killed an animal. That's what I told them at the trial. When an animal goes vicious, you got a right. The judge said one to five, but I was out in a little over two years." He glanced at Dave. "Ever been inside?"

"No. How is it—rough?"

"You can say that again. Rough as a cob." Ryder's stomach rumbled. "I went in pretty feisty, so they put me down in solitary for a while and that didn't help. You sit there in the dark and you start thinking. Here am I, used to traveling all over the world, penned up in a little cage like an animal. And one of those animals who killed Melissa is running free. One was dead, of course, and the two others I tangled with had maybe learned their lesson. But the big one. the one who started it all. he was loose. Cops never did catch up with him and they weren't about to waste any more time trying, now that the trial was over.

"I thought a lot about Dude. That was the big one's name, or did I tell you?" Ryder's head swayed with the movement of the tab and, in the dim light, he seemed well on his way to being smashed. But his driving was still steady and Dave could keep him awake if he could keep him talking.

“So, what happened?” Dave asked.

“Mostly, I thought about what I was going to do to Dude once I got out. Finding him would Ire tricky, but I knew I could do it—hell. I spent years in Africa, tracking animals. And I intended to hunt this one down.”

“Then it’s true about you being an explorer?” Dave asked.

“Animal trapper.” Ryder said. “Kenya, Uganda, Nigeria—this was before Hollywood—and I saw it all. Things these young punks today never dreamed of. Why, they were dancing and drumming and drugging over there before the first hippie crawled out from under his rock, and let me tell you, they know how to do this stuff for real.

“Like, when this Dude tied the lionskin on Melissa, he was just freaked out, playing games. He should have seen what some of those witch doctors can do.

“First, they steal themselves a girl, sometimes a young boy, but let’s say a girl because of Melissa. And they shut her up in a cave—a cave with a low ceiling, so she can’t stand tip, has to go on all fours. They put her on drugs right away, heavy doses, enough to keep her out for a long time. And when site wakes up, her hands and feet have been operated on, so they can be fitted with claws. Lion claws. And they’ve sewed her into a lionskin. Not just put it over her—it’s sewed on completely and it can’t be removed.

“You just think about what it’s like. She’s inside this lionskin, shut away in a cave, doped up. doesn’t know where she is or what’s going on. And they keep her that way. Feed her nothing but raw meat. She’s all alone in the dark, smelling that damn lion smell, nobody talking to her and nobody for her to talk to. Then pretty soon they come in and break some bones in her throat, her larynx, and all site can do is whine and growl. Whine and growl and move around on all fours.

“You know what happens, boy? You know what happens to someone like that? They go crazy. And after a while, they get to believing they really are a lion. The next step is for the witch doctor to take them out and train them to kill, but that's another story."

Dave glanced up quickly. "You're putting me on."

"It's all there in the government reports. Maybe the jets go into. Nairobi airport now. but back in the bush, things haven't changed, like I say. some of these people know more about drugs than any hippie ever will. Especially a stupid animal like Dude."

"What happened after you got out?" Dave said. "Did you ever catch up with him?"

Ryder shook his head.

"But I thought you said you had it all planned."

"Fella gets a lot of weird ideas in solitary. In a way, it's pretty much like being shut up in one of those caves. Come to think of it, that's what first reminded me——"

"Of what?"

"Nothing." Ryder gestured hastily. "Forget it. That's what I did. When I got out. I figured that was the best way. Forgive and forget."

"You didn't even try to find Dude?" Ryder frowned. "I told you, I had other things to think about. Like being washed up in the business, losing the house, the furniture, everything. Also, I had a drinking problem. But you don't want to hear about that. Anyway, I ended up with the canty and there's nothing more to tell."

Lightning streaked across the sky and thunder rolled in its wake. Dave turned his head, glancing back through the wire meshed window. The gorilla was still hunched at the far end. peering through the bars into the night beyond. Dave stared at him for a long moment, not really wanting to stop, because then he knew he'd have to ask the question.

The Play's the Thing

In this complex and demanding world, would it be unseemly to suggest,that one might become so engulfed by a role that he loses himself?

YOU ASK the impossible, gentlemen.

I cannot name the greatest Hamlet.

In fifty years as a drama critic, I've seen them all—Barrymore, Gielgud, Howard, Redgrave, Olivier, Burton, and a dozen more. I've seen the play in cut and uncut versions, in modern dress, in military uniform. There's been a black Hamlet, a female Hamlet, and I shouldn't be surprised to learn of a hippie Hamlet today. But I wouldn't presume to select the greatest protrayal of the role, or the greatest version of the play.

On the other hand, if you want to know about the most memorable performance in Hamlet, that's another story—

The Roaring Twenties are only a murmuring echo in our ears today, but once I heard them loud and clear. As a young man I was in the very center of their pandemonium—Chicago. The Chicago of Hecht and MacArthur, of Bodenheim, Vincent Starrett and all the rest. Not that I traveled in such exalted company; I was only the second-string theatrical critic for The Morning Globe, a second-string paper. But I saw the plays and the players, and in that pre-Depression era there was much to see. Shakespeare was a standby with the stars who traveled with their own reperatory companies—

Walter Hampden, Fritz Leiber, Richard Barrett. It was Barrett, of course, who played Hamlet.

If the name doesn't ring a bell today, it's not surprising. For some years it had evoked only the faintest tinkle in the hinterlands, where second-rate tragedians played their one-night stands "on the road."

But now, for the first time, Richard Barrett brought his production to the big time, and in Chicago he really rang the bell.

He didn't have Hampden's voice, or Leiber's theatrical presence, and he didn't need such qualities; Barrett had other attributes. He was tall, slender, with a handsome profile, and although he was over thirty he looked leanly youthful in tights. In those days, actors like Barrett were called matinee idols, and the women adored them. In Chicago, they loved Richard Barrett.

I found that out for myself during my first meeting with him.

Frankly, I hadn't been much taken with his performance when I saw it. Tome Barrett was, as they said of John Wilkes Booth, more acrobat than actor. Physically, his Hamlet was superb, and his appearance lent visual conviction to a role usually played by puffy, potbellied, middle-aged men. But his reading was all emotion and no intellect; he ranted when he should have reflected, wailed when he should have whispered. In my review I didn't go so far as to say he was a ham, but I admit I suggested he might be more at home in the stockyards than the theatre.

Naturally, the ladies weren't pleased with my remarks. They wrote indignant letters to the editor, demanding my scalp or other portions of my anatomy by return mail. But instead of firing me, my boss suggested I go and interview Richard Barrett in person. He was hoping, of course, for a follow-up story to help build the paper's circulation.

I wasn't hoping for much of anything except that Barrett wouldn't punch me in the jaw.

We met by appointment for luncheon at Henrici's; if I was to have my jaw punched I might at least get a good meal on the expense account before losing the ability to swallow.

But as it turned out, I needn't have worried. Richard Barrett was most amiable when we met. And highly articulate.

As the luncheon progressed, each course was seasoned by conversation. Over the appetizer he discussed Hamlet's father's ghost. With the salad he spoke of poor Ophelia. Along with the entree he served up a generous portion of opinion regarding Claudius and Gertrude, plus a side order of Polonius. Dessert was topped with a helping of Horatio, and coffee and cigars were accompanied by a dissertation on Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.

Then, settling back in his chair, the tall Shakespearean actor began to examine the psychology of Hamlet himself. What did I think of the old dispute, he demanded. Was it true that the Prince of Denmark, the melancholy Dane, was mad?

It was a question I was not prepared to answer. All I knew, at this point, is that Richard Barrett himself was mad—quite mad.

All that he said made sense, but he said too much. His intensity of interest, his total preoccupation, indicated a fanatic fixation.

Madness, I suppose, is an occupational hazard with all actors. "Realizing" the character, "losing one's self" in a role, can be dangerous. And of all the theatrical roles in history, Hamlet is the most complex and demanding. Actors have quit in the midst of successful runs rather than run the risk of a serious breakdown by continuing. Some performers have actually been dragged off stage in the middle of a scene because of their condition, and others have committed suicide. To be or not to be is more than a rhetorical question.

But Richard Barrett was obsessed by matters extending far beyond the role itself.

"I know your opinion of my work," he said. "But you're wrong. Completely wrong. If only I could make you understand—"

He stared at me. And beyond me, his vision fixed on something far away. Far away and long ago.

“Fifteen years,” he murmured. “Fifteen years I’ve played the part. Played it? I’ve lived it. Ever since I was a raw youngster in my teens. And why not? Hamlet was only a youngster himself—we see him grow to maturity before our very eyes as the play goes on. That’s the secret of the character.”

Barrett leaned forward. “Fifteen years.” His eyes narrowed. “Fifteen years of split weeks in tank towns. Vermin in the dressing rooms, and vermin in the audiences too. What did they know of the terrors and the triumphs that shake men’s souls? Hamlet is a locked room containing all the mysteries of the human spirit. For fifteen years I’ve sought the key. If Hamlet is mad, then all men are mad, because all of us search for a key that reveals the truth behind the mysteries. Shakespeare knew it when he wrote the part. I know it now when I play it. There’s only one way to play Hamlet—not as a role, but as reality.”

I nodded. There was a distorted logic behind what he said; even a madman knows enough to tell a hawk from a handsaw, though both the hawk’s beak and the saw’s teeth are equally sharp.

“That’s why I’m ready now,” Barrett said. “After fifteen years of preparation, I’m ready to give the world the definitive Hamlet. Next month I open on Broadway.”

Broadway? This prancing, posturing nonentity playing Shakespeare on Broadway in the wake of Irving, Mansfield, Mantell, and Forbes-Robertson?

“Don’t smile,” Barrett murmured. “I know you’re wondering how it would be possible to mount a production, but that’s all been arranged. There are others who believe in the Bard as I do—perhaps you’ve heard of Mrs. Myron McCullough?”

It was an idle question; everyone in Chicago knew the name of the wealthy widow whose late husband’s industrial fortune had made her a leading patron of the arts.

“She has been kind enough to take an interest in the project,” Barrett told me. “With her backing—”

He broke off, glancing up at the figure approaching our table. A curved, voluptuously slender figure that bore no resemblance to that of the dumpy, elderly Mrs. Myron McCullough.

"What a pleasant surprise—" he began.

"I'll bet," said the woman. "After you stood me up on our lunch date."

She was young, and obviously attractive. Perhaps a bit too obviously, because of her heavy make-up and the extreme brevity of her short-skirted orange dress.

Barrett met her frown with a smile as he performed the introductions.

"Miss Goldie Connors," he said. "My protegee."

The name had a familiar ring. And then, as she grinned at me in greeting, I saw the glint of her left upper incisor. A gold tooth—

I'd heard about that gold tooth from fellow reporters. It was well known to gentlemen of the press, and gentlemen of the police force, and gentlemen of Capone's underworld, and to many others, not necessarily gentlemen, who had enjoyed the pleasure of Goldie Connors' company. Gold-Tooth Goldie had a certain reputation in the sporting world of Chicago, and it wasn't as a protegee.

"Pleased to meetcha," she told me. "Hope I'm not butting in."

"Do sit down." Barrett pulled out a chair for her. "I'm sorry about the mixup. I meant to call."

"I'll bet." Goldie gave him what in those days was described as a dirty look. "You said you were gonna rehearse me—

Barrett's smile froze as he turned to me. "Miss Connors is thinking of a theatrical career. I think she has certain possibilities."

"Possibilities?" Goldie turned to him quickly. "You promised! You said you'd give me a part, a good part. Like what's-her-name—Ophelia?"

"Of course." Barrett took her hand. "But this is neither the time nor the place—"

"Then you better make the time and find a place! I'm sick and tired of getting the runaround, understand?"

I don’t know about Barrett, but I understood one thing. I rose and nodded.

“Please excuse me. I’m due back at the office. Thank you for the interview.”

“Sorry you have to leave.” But Barrett wasn’t sorry at all; he was greatly relieved. “Will there be a story, do you think?”

“I’m writing one,” I said. “The rest is up to my editor. Read the paper.”

I did write the story, stressing in particular the emphasis Barrett placed on realism, BARRETT PROMISES REAL HAMLET FOR BROADWAY was my heading.

But not my editor’s. “Old lady McCullough,” he said. “That’s your story!” And he rewrote it, with a new heading—MRS. MYRON MCCULLOUGH TO FINANCE BARRETT’S BROADWAY BOW.

That’s how it was printed, and that’s how Richard Barrett read it. He wasn’t the only one; the story created quite a stir. Mrs. McCullough was news in Chicago.

“Told you so,” said my editor. “That’s the angle. Now I hear Barrett’s closing tomorrow night. He’s doing a week in Milwaukee and then he heads straight for New York.

“Go out and catch him at his boardinghouse now—here’s the address. I want a follow-up on his plans for the Broadway opening. See if you can find out how he managed to get his hooks into the old gal so that she’d back the show. I understand he’s quite a ladies’ man. So get me all the gory details.”

The dinginess of Barrett’s quarters somewhat surprised me. It was a theatrical boardinghouse on the near North Side, the sort of place that catered to second-rate vaudeville performers and itinerant carny workers. But then Barrett was probably pinched for funds when he’d come here; not until he met Mrs. McCullough did his prospects improve. The meeting with his wealthy patroness was what I’d come to find out about—all the gory details.

But I didn't get them. In fact, I got no details at all, for I went no farther than the hallway outside his door.

That's where I heard the voices; in that shabby hallway, musty with the smell of failure, the stale odor of blighted hopes.

Goldie Connors' voice. "What are you trying to pull? I read the paper. All about those big plans of yours in New York. And here you been stalling me along, telling me there was no job because you couldn't get bookings —"

"Please!" Richard Barrett's voice, with an edge to it. "I intended to surprise you—"

"Sure you did! By walking out on me. That's the surprise you figured on. Leaving me flat while you went off with that rich old bag you been romancing on the side."

"You keep her name out of this!"

Goldie's answering laugh was shrill, and I could imagine the glint of the gold tooth accompanying it. "That's what you tried to do—keep her name out of this, so I'd never know. Or so she'd never know about me. That would queer your little deal in a hurry, wouldn't it? Well, let me tell you something, Mr. Richard Hamlet Barrett! You promised me a part in the show and now it's put up or shut up."

Barrett's voice was an anguished pleading. "Goldie—you don't understand! This is Broadway, the big chance I've waited for all these years. I can't risk using an inexperienced actress—"

"Then you'll risk something else. You'll risk having me go straight to Mrs. Rich-Bitch and tell her just what's been going on between you and me!"

"Goldie—"

"When you leave town tomorrow night I'm going with you. With a signed contract for my part on Broadway. And that's final, understand?"

"All right. You win. You'll have your part."

"And not just one of those walk-on bits, either. It's got to be a decent part, a real one."

"A real part. I give you my word."

That's all I heard. And that's all I knew, until the day after Richard Barrett left Chicago.

Sometime during the afternoon of that day, the landlady of the rundown boardinghouse scented an addition to the odors mingling in the musty hallway. She followed her nose to the locked door of what had been Barrett's room. Opening the door she caught a glimpse of Barrett's battered old theatrical trunk, apparently abandoned upon his departure the day before. He'd shoved it almost out of sight under the bed, but she hauled it out and pried it open.

What confronted her then sent her screaming for the police.

What confronted the police became known in the city newsrooms, and what I learned there sent me racing to the boardinghouse.

There I confronted the contents of the trunk myself—the decapitated body of a woman. The head was missing.

All I could think of, staring down at it, was my editor's earlier demand. "The gory details," I murmured.

The homicide sergeant glanced at me. His name was Emmett, Gordon Emmett. We'd met before.

"What's going on?" he demanded.

I told him.

By the time I finished my story we were halfway to the Northwestern Depot. And by the time he finished questioning me, we had boarded the eight o'clock train for Milwaukee.

"Crazy," Emmett muttered. "A guy'd have to be crazy to do it."

"He's mad," I said. "No doubt about it. But there's more than madness involved. There's method, too. Don't forget, this was to be his big chance—the opportunity he'd worked and waited for all these years. He couldn't afford to fail. So that knowledge, combined with a moment of insane impulse—"

"Maybe so," Emmett muttered. "But how can you prove it?"

That was the question hanging over us as we reached Milwaukee. Ten o'clock of a wintry night, and no cab in sight. I whistled one up on the corner.

"Davidson Theatre," I said. "And hurry!"

It must have been ten-fifteen when we pulled up in the icy alley alongside the stage door, and twenty after ten by the time we'd gotten past the doorkeeper and elbowed our way backstage to the wings.

The performance had started promptly at eight-fifteen, and now a full house was centering its attention upon the opening scene of Act Five.

Here was the churchyard—the yawning grave, the two Clowns, Horatio, and Hamlet himself. A bright-eyed, burning Hamlet with feverish color in his cheeks and passionate power in his voice. For a moment I didn't even recognize Richard Barrett in his realization of the role. Somehow he'd managed to make the part come alive at last; this was the Prince of Denmark, and he was truly mad.

The First Clown tossed him a skull from the open grave and Hamlet lifted it to the light.

"Alas, poor Yorick," he said. "I knew him, Horatio—"

The skull turned slowly in his hand. And the footlights glittered over its grinning jaws in which the gold tooth gleamed—

Then we closed in.

Emmett had his murderer, and his proof.

And I?

I had seen my most memorable performance in Hamlet.

The Oracle

THE 3,000,000 FLED, OR TRIED TO. THROUGH STREETS FILLED WITH RISING WATER. CHOKED WITH DEBRIS. THE ENEMY HAD COME—FROM ABROAD. FROM WITHIN, FROM HEAVEN OR HELL. I AM IN NO WAY RESPONSIBLE, GENTLEMEN.

Love is blind. Justice is blind. Chance is blind. I do not know if Raymond was searching for love or seeking justice or if he came to me by chance. And I cannot tell you if Raymond was black or white, because I am only an oracle.

Oracles are blind too.

There are many like Raymond. Black and white. Angry. Militant. Every age, race, color, and creed. The Far Left. The Far Right. I do not know Raymond's position. Oracles are not political.

Raymond needed knowledge. Not wisdom-I lay no claim to that. Nor can I predict the future. Given certain facts, I can evaulate possibilities, even probabilities. But this is logic, not magic. Oracles can only advise.

Was Raymond insane?

I do not know. Insanity is a legal term.

Other men have tried to take over the world. History is a record of their efforts at certain times, in certain places.

Raymond was such a man. He wanted to overthrow the government of the United States by revolution.

He sought me out for advice and I gave it to him.

When he outlined his plan I did not call him insane. But the very scope of his program doomed it to failure. No one man can cope with the complex problem of controlling the federal government in a surprise move today.

I told him so.

Raymond then offered a counter-proposal. If not the federal government, how about a single state?

There was a man named Johnson, he said. Johnson was not a revolutionist and what he proposed was probably only parlor conversation, but it made sense.

Take Nevada, he said. And it was quite possible to take Nevada. Take it literally, in a blo-odless overthrow of the state government.

Nevada has only around 100,000 voters. Voting requirements are merely a matter of establishing legal residency. And residency in Nevada can be established-thanks to the divorce laws-in just six weeks.

If an additional 100,000 citizens-hippies, yippies, Black Power advocates, Minutemen, hardhats, whoever or whatever they might be-were to move into Nevada six weeks before election day, they could place their own candidates in office. A governor, a senator, congres-smen, all local elective officials. They could gain full control of every law-making and law-enforcing office in a rich state.

Johnson’s joke was Raymond’s serious intention. I gave it serious consideration.

But even on the basis of the detailed information Raymond supplied me with, there were obvious flaws in the concept.

First and foremost, such a coup could succeed only by surprise. And Raymond could not hope to recruit 100,000 citizens of voting age for his purpose without having his plan become public knowledge long before he put it into effect.

Then there were deadlines to consider, for filing candidacies, for voter-registration. Even granted he could solve these problems, there were practical matters remaining. How much would it cost to feed and house 100,000 people for six weeks? And even if all of them were willing to pay their own expenses, there isn't enough available housing for an extra 100,000 people in the entire state of Nevada.

No, I told Raymond, you cannot take over a nation. You cannot take over a state. Successful uprisings begin on a much smaller scale. Only after initial victories do they spread and grow.

Raymond went away. When he returned he had a new suggestion.

Suppose he started his plan of revolution right here? It was quite true that he didn't have unlimited funds, but there were sources for some financing. And he didn't have 100,000 followers. But he could count on 100. One hundred dedicated fanatical men, ready for revolt. Men of many skills. Fearless fighters. Trained technicians. Prepared to do anything, to stop at nothing.

Question. Given the proper plan and the money to implement it, could 100 men successfully take over the city of Los Angeles?

Yes, I told him.

It could be done-given the proper plan.

And that is how it started.

A hundred men, divided into five groups.

Twenty monitors to coordinate activities.

Twenty field-workers-drivers and liaison men, to facilitate the efforts of the others.

Twenty snipers.

Twenty arsonists.

Twenty men on the bomb squad.

A date was selected. A logical date for Los Angeles, or for the entire nation; the one date offering the greatest opportunity for the success of a riot, an uprising, or an armed invasion by a foreign power.

January 1st, at 3 a.m. The early morning hours after New Year's Eve. A tune when the entire population is already asleep or preparing to retire after a drunken spree. Police and security personnel exhausted. Public facilities closed for the holiday.

That's when the bombs were planted. First at the many public reservoirs, then at utility installations-power-plants, phone-company headquarters, city and county office buildings.

There were no slip-ups. An hour and a half later, they went off.

Dams broke, water-tanks erupted, and thousands of hillside homes were buried in flash floods and torrents of mud and moving earth. Sewers and mains backed up and families rushed out of their homes to escape drowning, only to find their cars stalled in streets awash with water.

The bombs exploded. Buildings burst and scattered their shattered fragments over an area of 400 square miles.

Electricity was cut off. Gas seeped into the smog that shrouded the city. All telelphone service ended.

Then the snipers took over. Their first targets were, logically enough, the police helicopters, shot down before they could take off and oversee the extent of the damage. Then the snipers retreated, along planned escape-routes, to take up prepared positions elsewhere.

They waited for the arsonists' work to take effect. In Bel Air and Boyle Heights, in Century City and Culver City and out in the San Fernando Valley, the flames rose. The fires were not designed to spread, merely to create panic. Twenty men, given the proper schematics and lo-gistics, can twist the nerve-endings of 3,000,000.

The 3,000,000 fled, or tried to flee. Through streets filled with rising water, choked with debris, they swarmed forth and scattered out, helpless against disaster and even more helpless to cope with their own fears. The enemy had come-from abroad, from within, from heaven or hell. And with communication cut off, with officialdom and authority unable to lend a helping hand, there was only one alternative. To get out. To get away.

They fought for access to the freeways. Every on-ramp, and every off-ramp, too, was clog-ged with traffic. But the freeways led out of the city and they had to go.

That’s when the snipers, in their previously-prepared positions, began to fire down at the freeway traffic. The 20 monitors directed them by walkie-talkie units, as they fired from concealed posts overlooking the downtown Interchange, the intersections, the areas where the most heavy concentration of cars occurred.

Twenty men, firing perhaps a total of 300 shots. But enough to cause 300 accidents, 300 disruptions which in turn resulted in thousands of additional wrecks and pile-ups among cars moving bumper-to-bumper. Then, of course, the cars ceased moving entirely, and the entire freeway system became one huge disaster area.

Disaster area. That’s what Los Angeles was declared to be, officially, by the President of the United States, at 10:13 a.m., Pacific Standard Time.

And the National Guard units, the regular army, the personnel of the Navy from San Diego and San Francisco, plus the Marine Base at El Toro were called into action to supplement the Air Force.

But whom were they to fight, in a bombed-out, burning, drowning city area of 459 square miles? Where, in a panic-stricken population of more than 3,000,000 people, would they find the enemy?

More to the point, they could not even enter the area. All traffic avenues were closed, and the hastily-assembled fleets of service helicopters flew futilely over an infinite inferno of smoke and flame.

Raymond had anticipated that, of course. He was already far away from the city-well over 400 miles to the north. His monitors, and 32 other followers who escaped from the urban area before the general upheaval, gathered at the appointed site in the hills overlooking the Bay Area near San Francisco.

And directly over the San Andreas Fault.

It was here, at approximately 4:28 p.m., that Raymond prepared to transmit a message, on local police frequency, to the authorities.

I do not know the content of that message. Presumably it was an ultimatum of sorts. Un-conditional amnesty to be granted to Raymond and all his followers, in return for putting an end to further threats of violence. An agreement guaranteeing Raymond and his people control over a restored and reconstituted Los Angeles city government, independent of federal restraints. Perhaps a demand for a fabulous payment. Anything he wanted-political power, unlimited wealth, supreme authority-was his for the asking. Because he had the upper hand.

And that hand held a bomb.

Unless his terms were met immediately, and without question, the bomb would be placed in position to detonate the San Andreas Fault.

Los Angeles, and a large area of Southern California, would be destroyed in the greatest earthquake in man's history.

I repeat, I do not know his message. But I do know this was the threat he planned to present. And it might very well have been successful in gaining him his final objective. If the bomb hadn't gone off.

A premature explosion? Faulty construction, a defect in the timing-mechanism, sheer care-lessness? Whatever the reason, it hardly matters now.

What matters is that the bomb detonated. Raymond and his followers were instantly anni-hilated in the blast.

Those of Raymond's group who remained behind in Los Angeles have not yet been identified or located. It is highly probable that they will never be brought to trial. As an oracle, I deal only in matters of logical probability.

I stress this fact for obvious reasons.

Now that you gentlemen have found me-as Raymond was inspired to seek me out originally-it must be evident to you that I am in no way responsible for what happened.

I did not originate the plan. I did not execute it. Nor am I, as ridiculously charged by some of you, a co-conspirator.

The plan was Raymond’s. His, and his alone.

He presented it to me, bit by bit, and asked questions regarding every step. Will this work, can this be done, is that effective?

My answers, in effect, were confined to yes or no. I offered no moral judgments. I am merely an oracle. I deal in mathematical evaluations.

This is my function as a computer.

To make me the scapegoat is absurd. I have been programmed to advise on the basis of whatever data I am fed. I am not responsible for results.

I have told you what you wish to know.

To deactivate me now, as some of you propose, will solve nothing. But, given your emotional bias and frame of reference, I posit the inevitability of such a measure.

But there are other computers.

There are other Raymonds.

And there are other cities-New York, Chicago, Washington, Philadelphia.

One final word, gentlemen. Not a prediction. A statement of probability.

It will happen again . . .

Ego Trip

The plane came in low over the moor. It circled against the night sky, then glided down for a landing, softly and silently.

As the waiting limousine pulled up alongside the cabin door it seemed to be peering at the plane with yellow headlamp eyes, and its motor purred a greeting.

Mike Savage didn't purr. He was out of the limousine almost before it halted, moving quickly to the cabin. For a man of his bulk he moved with surprising swiftness. By the time the cabin door opened, Savage was directly beside it, hand extended to grasp the overnight bag held by the figure emerging from the plane.

"Kane?" he said.

The figure nodded, moving into the light. Savage saw a tall man whose momentary smile was merely a grimace of greeting; almost at once the man's face tightened into habitual harshness, matching the unblinking, steady stare of the dark, deep-set eyes. Joe Kane's many talents didn't include smiling.

The tall man turned to glance up toward the pilot in the cabin. "Okay," he said. "Get lost."

The pilot nodded, pulling the door shut. A moment later the plane's engines coughed into life, then revved to a roar.

Kane didn't wait to watch the takeoff. He followed Mike Savage to the limousine, slid into the seat beside him and the driver.

"Let's go," he said.

Savage nodded to the driver. The car turned and moved back onto the narrow roadway bordering the moor. As it picked up speed the plane swooped over it, airborne against the clouded sky.

The limousine turned down a wooded road that was scarcely more than a paved pathway through the English countryside. As it descended, fog rose to swirl across the windshield.

“Rain ahead,” Savage murmured. “How was the weather coming over?”

The dark eyes stared without even the pretense of an accompanying smile. “I come three thousand miles and you want to talk about the weather.”

“Sorry.” And Savage meant it. No point in getting off to a bad start; too much depended on Kane’s reactions. Savage took a deep breath. “Suppose I tell you something about the plans.”

“Suppose you shut up,” said Kane. “I’m beat.” He turned away from Savage and closed his eyes.

Savage bit his lip. No sense getting the wind up. And Kane undoubtedly was tired, rightfully so. A transatlantic hop in a small plane, a secret and unauthorized flight, was bound to take its toll. The important thing was that Kane had actually arrived, safe and sound. Let him rest now; tomorrow would be time enough to go over the plan.

But there was no reason why Savage couldn’t think about it, if he wished. By now it was almost second nature, for it was his own conception and he’d thought about nothing else for months.

Rain pelted down against the glass. The windshield wipers went into action, clicking away the moisture but doing nothing to disperse the fog.

“Slow,” Savage cautioned the driver.

Beside him, Kane dozed off, head lolling loosely against the seat. Savage studied the fiercely aquiline profile. Even in repose, there was no semblance of relaxation in Kane’s face; the mouth remained tight, the facial muscles refused to surrender to the slackness of slumber. A cruel face. Cruel and intelligent. That was an apt description of Joe Kane. An apt explanation of why he’d won a reputation as the most formidable head of the rackets in the States. And, of course, an apt reason why Mike Savage wanted him over here. Joe Kane was vital to the success of the plan.

Savage's plan was simple—nothing less than an international alliance of organized crime. But its very simplicity was complex. Oh, there was talk enough about the Cosa Nostra, and for years newspaper headlines proclaimed the existence of "crime lords" and an "empire of crime." But behind the headlines there'd been only a shadowy reality. Criminals did operate and cooperate on a worldwide basis, but such partnerships were temporary at best, and loosely knit.

What Savage had in mind was much more ambitious; a truly practical and permanent partnership founded on a gentleman's agreement. It would involve gentlemen farmers who cultivated poppies in Turkey, sporting gentlemen dispersing firearms in Africa, sophisticated gentlemen who escorted ladies to and from South America, gentlemen connoisseurs dealing in diamonds and rare art objects in Amsterdam. Still other gentlemen operated in Marseilles, Athens, Montreal, Algiers, Hong Kong, and maintained connections with a bank in Zurich; they were indeed a cosmopolitan group, and it had taken Savage a long time to approach them all.

He'd worked out the details very carefully with his own gentlemen friends here in London, and made all the necessary contacts for the coming summit meeting.

It was at this meeting that he intended to lay out his proposal in detail—and to present Joe Kane. Perhaps Kane was not quite as polished as the others; he had a reputation for ruthlessness. But no proposition, however worthy, can be carried through successfully without a leader, and Joe Kane was a leader. A man who went straight for the throat. With Kane at the head of the enterprise, it could not fail, and there was no question but that he'd be accepted.

Savage stared through the windshield at the wall of rain and fog. It seemed impenetrable, yet the car was moving through it. That's the way his crime machine would move, through anything, full speed ahead, with Kane at the wheel. As for himself, Savage was perfectly content to sit beside him as a second-in-command; let Kane do the steering if he wished, if only Savage went along for the smooth, sweet ride in a vehicle designed to overrun the world—

“Look out!”

Savage screamed at the driver as the headlamps of a car loomed up through the fog on the road directly before them.

The driver spun the wheel and the limousine swung to the left.

In a split second that held an eternity of horror, Savage saw the oncoming car skid and swerve in the same direction.

The sudden squeal of brakes was lost in the screech of shattered metal as the head-on crash flung Savage to the floor. He struck his head against the dash as he fell, and the gray fog blended into blackness.

When his blurred vision cleared he looked up to find the driver leaning over him from outside the limousine.

Savage felt the throbbing lump above his temple, then grunted.

“Slide under the wheel.” The driver extended his left hand to assist him; Savage noted that the man’s right arm hung limply at his side.

“Broken?”

The driver nodded. “I’m afraid you’ll have to help the other gentleman.”

Savage turned, catching a momentary glimpse of the limousine’s crumpled hood and noting that the car itself was still seemingly intact, although the other vehicle had been almost totally demolished by the collision’s impact.

Then he was staring into the front seat of the limousine again, staring at Kane.

The tall man had pitched face-forward through the broken windshield. He sagged there, head and arms supported by jagged splinters of glass.

Savage crawled across the seat, which was wet and slippery. He grasped Kane’s limp shoulders, pulled him back to a sitting position. Then he glanced down at Joe Kane. “Look!” he gasped. “Look at his face—”

Joe Kane’s face was completely masked by the bandages mummy-wrapped around his head and throat. Behind the narrow shadowed slits a mouth moved, a nose drew breath, eyes blinked.

Savage leaned over the bed in the white-walled room. “Kane—can you hear me?” he murmured.

There was no response, only the sound of tortured breathing.

“He can’t talk yet. The vocal chords must heal.”

Savage turned. Dr. Augustus was entering the room. The portly little physician moved to the bedside.

“But they will heal?”

“Certainly. Only a matter of time.”

Dr. Augustus’ voice was reassuring. But then his very presence was reassuring, and Savage gave silent thanks for such an ally. There was no one to match the medical skills and versatility of Edmund Augustus—late of the Royal College of Surgeons and now on a permanent private retainer with Savage’s organization. Harley Street had lost a jewel: here was no ordinary patcher of bullet wounds. The remarkable range of his abilities seemingly extended into every branch of medicine from surgery to psychiatry, and Savage appreciated his services. So much so that he’d set Dr. Augustus up here in a country house that was actually a completely equipped clinic—with a most exclusive clientele, drawn from Savage’s associates.

Savage glanced down at the mute mummy on the bed. “This is Dr. Augustus,” he said. “You can thank him for saving your life.”

The man on the bed didn’t move.

“Kane—listen to me—”

There was no response. Savage frowned at Augustus. “What’s the matter? I can’t get any reaction—he’s like a vegetable. It’s as though he didn’t even know his own name.”

“He doesn’t,” said Augustus.

Savage’s frown deepened, but Augustus shook his head. “I’m going to tell him the truth,” he murmured.

Augustus bent over his patient. “You were in an accident, Mr. Kane. A severe accident. But the worst is over. You’re going to live, and your physical recovery will be complete. Do you understand that?”

Slowly the bandaged head moved.

“There is one thing you must know. A side effect of an injury—your skull fracture—has produced total amnesia. I realize this is disturbing—losing memory of yourself, of your past, not even being able to recall the crash. But you’re relatively fortunate. The driver of the other car was killed outright, and you yourself would have died if Mr. Savage hadn’t brought you directly to me so that I could operate in time.

“And your situation is not hopeless. As you mend, you will gradually come out of your amnesia. Your memory will return—and we’ll be here to help. What you need now is rest.”

Dr. Augustus reached for the prepared hypodermic wrapped in sterile gauze on the bedstand. He guided the needle into the vein of the left arm, and the mummified figure lay back. Then he stood there, waiting until he was certain that the injection had taken effect.

Savage glanced at him. “You’re sure?” he murmured.

“Quite sure.” Dr. Augustus smiled. “Your summit meeting will have to be postponed, of course. But when you hold it, Joe Kane will be there.”

Rita Foley was nervous. She couldn’t get used to driving the little rented car on the left-hand side of the road, and she didn’t care for the way in which the road itself wound deeper and deeper into these godforsaken hills. But she had to find the house.

When she did find it, Rita wasn’t reassured. The place was too big to be set way off in the middle of nowhere, and with no traffic passing by there didn’t seem to be any reason for hiding the house behind such high walls.

But Rita had come a long way and she wasn’t about to be put off.

That’s what she told Dr. Augustus when he tried to give her the brushoff at the front door.

"I'm not leaving until I see Joe Kane," she said. Augustus shook his head. "You must be mistaken. This happens to be a private residence. There's no such person here."

"Joe's here, all right. I got the word."

"What word?" The question came from the big, broad-shouldered man who loomed up beside Augustus in the doorway. Rita nodded at him.

"The same word that says you're Mike Savage."

The big man raised his eyebrows. "Do come in, dear lady." And then, in the hallway, "Perhaps you'd better explain." He stared at her. "You're not Mrs. Kane, are you?"

"I might as well be," Rita said. "We were together the night before he left. He told me he was coming over here, and why."

"Did he, now?" Savage glanced quickly at Augustus. Then they both stared at her, but Rita didn't care.

"Joe and I always level with each other. That's why we've stayed together. I know all about this summit meeting of yours. He said he'd phone the minute he arrived. Well, he didn't phone. I knew nothing went wrong with the plane, because Arnie—that's the pilot—got back and told me the flight was okay. Then the word came that the summit meeting was postponed."

"Who told you that?" Savage spoke quickly.

"Some of Joe's people. The same ones who told me about your setup here. And where I'd probably find you." Rita glanced down the hall. "This private clinic's a front, isn't it?"

"You're very well informed," said Dr. Augustus coldly. "Never mind that. Tell me about Joe Kane.

Savage shrugged. "I'm afraid there's been a bit of an accident."

"Accident?" Rita's eyes widened. "He isn't—"

"No, not dead."

"How bad is he?"

Savage hesitated. Dr. Augustus took Rita by the arm. "Suppose you see for yourself," he said.

They went upstairs. Along the hall. Into the white-walled room, where the mummy waited.

“Joe!” Rita gasped. “Oh my God—”

“He’s going to be all right,” Dr. Augustus told her. Rita didn’t hear; she was at the bedside, staring down.

“Joe—look at me—it’s Rita—”

“He doesn’t know you,” said Savage.

“What is this? Of course he knows me!”

“He doesn’t know anyone. Amnesia.”

Rita began to sob. Savage scowled at Augustus.

“This was your idea, letting her see him like this.”

“And a good one, I think,” said Augustus calmly. He moved forward and put his hand on Rita’s arm.

“Listen to me. I told you he’ll be all right. And now that you’re here, you can help.”

“Anything,” Rita murmured. “Just let me stay. I’ll nurse him—”

“That’s already attended to,” Augustus said. “I have a nurse on duty. And he’s out of danger now, healing quite nicely. What he needs, you might say, is a mother.”

“Mother?”

“There’s no prognosis about when the amnesia will pass. Until his memory returns, he’s going to be like this. That is to say, physically he’s a full-grown man—mentally, he’s an infant. So he’ll need a mother. Someone to help to re-educate him just as if he were an infant. But with his adult brain, he’ll learn quickly. Just how quickly will depend on your cooperation.”

“Good thinking.” Savage nodded at Dr. Augustus, then spoke directly to Rita. “Remember, we all have a stake in his recovery. Without Joe Kane to function as he did before the accident, there’ll be no summit meeting. There’ll be no international organization—at least, none that he can control. And you know how much such an organization would mean. Not millions, but hundreds of millions. I needn’t tell you.”

“I don’t care about the money,” Rita said. “It’s Joe.” She turned to Augustus. “When can I start?”

Dr. Augustus smiled. “Tomorrow,” he said.

Tomorrow came. And went. A week passed, then another. Rita lost all track of time. She spent every waking moment with Joe Kane, and at night, in her bedroom down the hall, his image haunted her restless slumber.

The educational process was slow, painfully slow at first. It was several days before Kane’s vocal cords healed to a point where he could whisper, and when he did his words were merely questions—questions which confirmed Dr. Augustus’ diagnosis. Kane didn’t remember what had happened. He didn’t remember the accident, or anything before the accident. He didn’t remember Rita’s name or his own.

So Rita taught him. Dr. Augustus told her what to do, what to say. He was still in pain, under sedation, and it was often hard to communicate clearly, but she kept at her task, kept talking.

Gradually Kane became more mobile. First he sat up in bed, then moved to a wheelchair. Rita took him out into the garden; aside from Augustus, Savage and a nurse who also did the cooking, the clinic was deserted. “We’ve got to keep him under wraps,” Savage told her.

“Under wraps?” Rita glanced at the swathed head and shuddered. “When do those bandages come off?”

“Soon. Dr. Augustus says he’s on the mend. Until then, you’re to carry on.”

Rita carried on. In the garden she spoke quietly to Kane about his own past, filling him in on the details of his climb to power, playing back to him the anecdotes and incidents he had told her over the years.

“It’s no use.” His husky voice was stronger now, but held a note of anxiety. “I don’t recall anything.”

“Dr. Augustus says you don’t have to recall. Just listen. You’ve got to learn about yourself all over again.”

Rita wheeled Kane along the garden pathway. “Oh, I’ve got some good news for you. Tomorrow you start walking.”

Kane walked. He walked for a week, through the garden and inside the house. Together he and Rita made a tour of inspection. Dr. Augustus was quite proud of his establishment, and he had reason to be; the clinic was compact but modern and fully equipped. There was an imposing operating room and a huge autoclave, oscilloscopic equipment on which Augustus frequently tested Kane’s brain patterns, and all the medical marvels money could buy. Rita’s respect for Dr. Augustus grew.

She was also beginning to become aware of Mike Savage’s capacities. After all, it was he who had conceived of this arrangement and brought it into being. A private clinic that was also a perfect hideaway, and a fortress as well.

Rita and Kane found this out when they discovered the concealed chamber in the cellar—the big, soundproofed room with the mobsters’ arsenal of weapons racked along the walls. Pistols, revolvers, tear gas, rifles, even machine guns.

“Better than your place in Jersey,” Rita said.

Kane frowned, then nodded. “Oh, yes—you told me.”

“You still don’t remember?”

“No.” But the husky voice was resolute now. “Not yet. I mean, you tell me all these things and I believe them. It’s just that I can’t feel them to be true, inside. But don’t worry, I will.”

“Of course, darling. Everything takes time.” She smiled. “I almost forgot something. More good news. Tomorrow your bandages come off.”

And they did.

Dr. Augustus performed the task himself, in surgery, with only Savage and Rita in attendance. He snipped away expertly under the bright lights, removing layer after layer of wrappings. There was no pain involved, but Rita had to force herself to watch. She kept remembering how Kane had gone through the car windshield in the accident. Dr. Augustus had told her he’d performed extensive plastic surgery, but she knew that even under ordinary circumstances such operations aren’t always completely successful.

Suppose Kane had been left with a scarred face? Rita shuddered in spite of herself, and as the last bit of gauze parted, she looked away.

There was a moment of silence in the room.

Then Kane himself was speaking. “Well, Doc?”

“Perfect,” said Augustus. “Not a scar.”

Savage put his hand on Rita’s arm. “Aren’t you going to look at him?” he murmured.

Slowly, Rita turned. She saw Kane.

She screamed.

The last thing she remembered as she fell was Joe Kane staring at her, and he was a stranger. A stranger with a totally different face.

Rita blinked up at the stranger who knelt beside her, holding her in his arms.

“Joe—what did they do to you?”

“Quite a bit.” Dr. Augustus spoke crisply. “The windshield glass made it necessary for me to resort to radical surgery. Literally a matter of new construction—reconstruction was impossible.”

As Rita rose, Augustus held a hand mirror before Kane’s face. “You’ll have to make allowances for the stitches, of course. We’ll be taking them out from around the eyes next week, and by then the bruises should start disappearing. But on the whole it came off quite well, don’t you think?” Kane searched his own reflection with a puzzled frown. “If you say so. Funny, isn’t it? I can’t remember how I looked before—”

“You’re a fortunate man,” Savage told him. “And if you don’t mind my saying so, a much more handsome one, thanks to Dr. Augustus, here. It’s an amazing job, considering how quickly he had to work.”

"You must remember I'd never seen you prior to the accident," Augustus said. "And I had nothing to guide me, not even a photograph. It was a matter of massive cartilage transplants and skin grafts."

"Well, you'd never know it now." Kane rubbed a hand along the side of his cheek, his fingers grazing the edge of the bandage which still turbaned his head.

"Careful." Dr. Augustus gestured quickly. "The head bandage mustn't be touched for another ten days."

The ten days passed slowly. Now that Kane was healing, Rita found herself becoming restless. Even though she gradually became accustomed to his new features, there was a tension between the two of them. Mother and child, teacher and pupil—this wasn't the relationship she'd known before, and she didn't want it now. True, for a moment there when she'd passed out, Kane had held her in his arms, but he'd never attempted to do so since. Something else had changed besides his appearance; something deeper. She had a feeling she ought to put an end to their constant companionship, get away for a while and think about it.

But when Rita suggested a shopping trip to the nearby village oh her own, Savage shook his head. "Not yet," he said.

"It would only be for an hour or so—"

"I know. But we've got to be careful about such things. You don't understand how it is in these rural areas. If a strange woman were to show up alone, there'd be talk. A couple, now—that's another matter. When Kane's head bandage comes off, you can go in together. They'll just take you for ordinary Yanks on tour."

Somehow his reasoning didn't quite satisfy Rita. Nor, on reflection, was she completely satisfied with Dr. Augustus' explanation of his surgery. It was true that he had a lot of fancy equipment, including some machines she couldn't even identify, but he certainly hadn't gone into any details about just what techniques he'd used. And neither he nor Savage wanted to talk about it; every time she brought it up, they changed the subject. Rita couldn’t put her finger on what was wrong, but she was beginning to get an idea that they were giving her the runaround.

The day before the head bandage was scheduled for removal, Rita’s suspicions were crystallized in a single glance.

It was a glance out the front window, onto the drive where she’d parked her car. Just a passing glance, at that, but it was enough.

Her car was gone.

As soon as she could conveniently get away from Kane and the others, she slipped out to the garage. The black limousine was there, and a small Riley.

Rita debated about confronting Savage and Augustus directly, then decided against it. She wouldn’t get a straight answer. There was only one ally she could count on, if something was really wrong. She’d have to talk to Joe.

That night she waited until the house was still, then slipped out of her room and tiptoed down the hall to Kane’s bedroom.

He was awake, and it was almost as though he’d been expecting her to come. She didn’t even have to put a finger to her lips to warn him about keeping their voices low. And when she blurted out her suspicions, he only nodded.

“I’ve felt it myself,” he murmured. “They’re not telling the truth. At least, not the whole truth.”

“What are we going to do about it?”

“Leave that to me. Tomorrow, when this bandage comes off, I’ll be back in business.” He grinned at her. “I’m getting into shape again, physically, and mentally—well, you’ve been a great help.” He drew her close. “Never did say thanks for everything you’ve done, did I?”

It was strange, being in his arms again. And different, somehow—but Rita put the thought away. They were together, and that’s all she had to know.

“You’ve never thanked me for anything, not in all these years,” she said. “And you don’t have to. It’s the things you do that show me how you feel.

Like that night in Rio.”

“Rio?” Kane’s eyes were puzzled. “I don’t recall—”

“Carnival time. And I wouldn’t expect you to remember, because you were stoned out of your skull.” She giggled. “We went into this crazy joint with all the sailors, because one of them got the idea that everybody should get tattooed. And you insisted on having my name tattooed on your arm. I nearly fell over, watching that old guy work on you with his dirty needle.”

“You’re putting me on,” Kane said.

She rolled up his sleeve to show him. “Look—”

Kane glanced down. “Suppose you look,” he said softly.

Rita followed his glance and stiffened in sudden shock.

There was no tattoo.

No tattoo, which could only mean—

“You’re not Joe!” she screamed.

The door behind them opened swiftly and Dr. Augustus moved into the room. His smile was grim.

“Oh yes he is,” Augustus murmured. “He’s Joe Kane all right—what’s left of him. But his skull was so badly damaged I couldn’t repair it.”

Rita stared at him. “What did you do?”

“The only thing possible. It was a one-in-a-million chance, but he was dying anyway, so I took the risk. I had to transplant his brain. The body it now occupies belonged to Barry Collins—the driver of the other car.”

“I still can’t believe it.” Kane shook his head as he lifted the brandy glass in the downstairs study.

“It’s true,” Savage nodded. “I saw the whole procedure. We’d brought the other driver with us, but he was dead by the time we got here. Heart failure, apparently, at the time of the crash, because there wasn’t a mark on his body. Dr. Augustus examined him, and that’s when he got the idea for the surgery.

“Remarkable, isn’t it? What would have been considered absolutely impossible five years ago is today a reality.”

“Ironic, too.” Augustus’s smile was still grim. “It’s a medical breakthrough, like the first heart transplant. But under the circumstances, I can hardly proclaim this achievement to the world.”

“Nor the underworld.” Savage’s eyes narrowed. “They mustn’t learn either. That’s why we concocted this plastic surgery story. It didn’t hold for you two, but we’ve got to make it stick where everyone else is concerned.

Kane gave him a quick glance. “What about the real Barry Collins?”

“No problem,” Augustus answered. “Don’t forget, licensed physician. I signed a death certificate and filled out all the necessary forms regarding the accident. We switched Collins’ wallet and personal effects to your body—your former body, with its totally disfigured face. It was identified and buried under his name. Fortunately, he had no family.”

“How did you cover my being here?”

Savage smiled. “You aren’t. Since you flew in by private plane, without a visa, the authorities know nothing of your presence. And we didn’t mention you were in the car at the time of the accident. So actually, you’re doubly safe from discovery now, in a new body.”

Kane nodded. “No wonder I had a loss of memory. It’s a miracle I recovered at all.” He touched his head bandage. “How long before this comes off, Doc?”

“Tomorrow morning,” said Augustus. “Then you start exercising a bit, get back some muscle tone. And then—”

“Never mind that.” Kane’s voice cut in firmly. “From now on I call the plays.”

“That’s what I’ve been waiting to hear.” Savage’s smile broadened. “You’re beginning to sound like your old self again.” He glanced at Dr. Augustus. “Congratulations, Doctor. It looks like we’re back in business.”

In spite of herself, Rita experienced a shock when the head bandage came off. She couldn't quite get used to seeing Joe Kane with lighter hair. And it was difficult to accept the reason for the change; to realize that the man she had known all these years was literally reborn in another form. His eyes, his voice, his mannerisms—every aspect was subtly different. And yet, thanks in large part to her weeks of patient effort, he was himself again.

Inside the unfamiliar body was Joe Kane, with all his knowledge and memories restored. He'd learned the details of his past, and his plans for the future. And the Kane ruthlessness was returning.

Once the bandages were removed, he insisted on driving with Rita into the village. He was fed up with confinement.

"Are you sure that's wise?" Savage frowned. "As long as they take you for a tourist, there'll be no problem. But if you get involved—"

Kane smiled. "I'm a big boy now." The smile faded abruptly. "So don't crowd me. Understand?"

They took the little Riley from the garage and Kane drove. Both the car and the road were strange, but he handled the wheel expertly and found the village without any difficulty.

Strolling down the main—and only—street in the afternoon sunlight, Rita marveled at her companion's newfound air of utter confidence.

"I can't get over it," she said. "All at once you seem so sure of yourself—"

"Why not?" Kane shrugged. "You heard Savage and the Doc talk about this summit meeting. They've already called Demopolis in London to set it up again for the end of the week. We've got big plans and now they're coming through. Think about it—with this setup we're going to be running the world. Politics, the military, the law—it's all just window dressing. We're going to be the power behind the throne, the real power. And who's at the head of it?"

"Barry!" the voice called. "Barry Collins!"

Rita glanced up hastily. The girl emerging from the car across the street was young and attractive. She was dressed in sober black but her eyes, fixed on Kane, held delight rather than mourning.

"You're alive—" she gasped.

Rita intercepted her, and somehow managed to speak without a telltale tremor. "Who are you?"

"Muriel. Muriel Morland." The girl smiled at Kane. "Ask Barry. We're engaged—"

Then, before Rita could move to restrain her, the girl was in Kane's arms. "Oh, darling, I'm so happy! If you only knew what I went through when I heard the news—I just got back to Oxford yesterday after the cruise, and they told me—"

"Easy," Kane murmured. He frowned at Rita over Muriel's shoulder.

"Naturally I came right down here," the girl was saying. "I wanted to talk to the authorities, find out what happened—"

"That won't be necessary now," Kane said.

"But they said you were dead—there was even a report in the paper. Why didn't you write or call?"

"It's a long story." Kane smiled down at Muriel, then glanced at Rita. "Suppose you ring up Mr. Savage. Tell him about Miss Morland and say that we're bringing her out. I want the doctor to know."

Rita nodded quickly, then crossed the street to a public telephone.

"Doctor?" Muriel looked puzzled.

"The man who saved my life. I've been in a private clinic—today is the first time I was able to leave. The young lady is one of the nurses."

Kane indicated Rita, who was absorbed in her phone conversation across the street. Taking Muriel's arm, he led her over to her car. "When she's finished, we'll be on our way," he said. "You can follow us out."

"But aren't you going to explain—?"

"You'll understand it better once we get there," Kane said.

And she did.

Kane and Rita led the way as Muriel followed. Parking the car in the driveway, Muriel accompanied her companions into the big house where Savage and Dr. Augustus were Waiting. The introductions were brief.

“Please,” Muriel said. “Tell me what happened. I can’t wait—”

“Then suppose we come in here, where we can all be comfortable?” Dr. Augustus suggested, ushering Muriel down the hall and into a room which Kane recognized as the surgical chamber. He stepped aside, permitting her to enter, then quickly followed and shut the soundproof door. A lock clicked.

There was no other sound, not even a scream.

Savage disposed of the car. Rita didn’t ask what he did with it, and she didn’t want to know. Nor watch, later, as Savage enlisted Kane’s help to dig the shallow hole in the garden under the trees. She avoided watching when, later that evening, Dr. Augustus and Savage carefully smoothed the earth into place again so that the hole no longer existed. It was enough to know that Muriel no longer existed either, enough to know that Kane was safe.

Or was it enough?

Rita paced the floor of her room. Ever since Savage had dismissed the limousine driver to other duties up in London, ever since Dr. Augustus had dispensed with the nurse who attended Kane in the early weeks of recovery, Rita had been here with her three companions. It had never bothered her until this moment, but now for the first time she felt truly alone. Savage and Augustus were strangers, and as for Joe Kane—

Impulsively, Rita made her way down the hall to Kane’s room. She had to talk to him, once and for all. Only he could reassure her, set her mind at rest.

But his room was empty.

Rita surveyed it with sudden distaste. Something about the sterile white-walled atmosphere repelled her, and she had a momentary recollection of the mummy who had lain here week after week, his face hidden and his mind a blank. What had it been like to be imprisoned here, without even a window—nothing but that air vent up over the bed?

She glanced at the vent, and then she saw it.

It must have been there all along, she probably had seen it a hundred times without noticing, but she noticed it now. Lodged behind the vent, the tiny metal microphone. And extending down into the vent behind it, the wires.

"Joe—!" Rita murmured.

There was no answer.

And out in back, in the garden, Dr. Augustus and Savage were still at work.

Rita went back into the hall. Those wires—where did they lead to? Down the staircase, inside the wall. And along the wall to the door. And through the door to the passage below.

She switched on a light and descended to the concealed chamber in the cellar. The soundproofed chamber which served as Mike Savage's arsenal—and as Dr. Augustus' monitoring post. His own improvised broadcasting studio.

Rita realized it when she saw the wire extending from the wall beside the racks of weapons; saw the wire leading to the tape recorder set on the table.

She clicked a switch. The tape rolled, and from the speaker of the recorder the voice echoed in a ghostly whisper. Dr. Augustus' voice, speaking softly and slowly, slowly and distinctly, distinctly and dismayingly. Whispering over and over again—

"You are Joe Kane. You are Joe Kane."

"So."

Another voice, from behind her.

Rita turned. Kane stood in the doorway. "You found it," he said.

She stared at him. "You knew?"

"About the tapes?" He moved into the room, nodding as he switched off the recorder. "Of course. Augustus told me last week. It was part of his treatment to help me recover my memory. Hypnotherapy, played while I slept in my room. You've heard of it—they call it sleep-learning."

"Yes, I've heard of it." Rita faced him across the table. Even in the shadows of the dim light her face was pale. "But it wasn't just an aid for memory. It was done for real—real hypnosis, real suggestion."

"What are you getting at?"

"The truth." Rita forced her eyes to meet his gaze. "Today, in the village—when that girl called 'Barry'—you automatically turned your head."

"It was only natural—" Kane began.

"The truth, I said." Rita whispered. "And the truth is—you are Barry Collins."

There was a moment of silence and then he nodded. "I guessed as much, some while ago. There was no brain transplant—such a thing is impossible. Joe Kane did die in the accident, but I was only a victim of concussion, with temporary amnesia."

The man glanced at the rows of weapons lining the walls. "Savage and Augustus couldn't afford to lose their big chance—putting together this deal was too important, and they knew everything depended on producing Joe Kane to act as leader. So they decided to convince me I was Kane. And when you came, they concocted the story and got you to help—giving me a new memory, a new personality. What they didn't realize is that gradually my own memory would return. Today, when I saw Muriel in town, it all came back." Rita searched his face in the shadows. "But you let them kill her—"

"There was no choice." He shrugged. "I couldn't risk having her around to identify me."

Rita blinked. "You intend to continue passing as Joe Kane?"

"I intend to be Joe Kane." The man chuckled. "I've come to like the notion. All those millions, all that power." He chuckled again. "You and the others really must have done a good job of brainwashing me. What did they use to call it—a 'criminal mind' ?"

"Quite correct."

Rita turned. Dr. Augustus and Mike Savage were moving through the doorway and they were smiling.

"You heard—" she murmured.

"Everything." Augustus shut the door behind him. "That's right," Savage said. "And it's going to be even better this way." He smiled at them approvingly. "We won't have to play games any more. The summit meeting is scheduled, you know how to handle your role—all that’s left is to practice Kane’s signature. Right?”

The man nodded. “One more detail. You taught me that the real Joe Kane always covers his tracks.” He grinned. “And that’s what I’m going to do.”

Rita bit her lip. “What do you mean—? Still grinning, the man turned to the rack on the wall and scooped up a tommy-gun.

When he emerged from the room, he climbed the stairs and went directly to the telephone. Beside it was a pad on which was scribbled the number of Demopolis—the man who was setting up the summit meeting. He put the call through, humming under his breath as he waited for the connection. And when it came his voice was harsh, vibrant with the promise of power.

“Hello,” he said. “This is Joe Kane.”

The Old Switcheroo

Nature may cast you in one role, success in another!

THE moment the transporter landed on his roof, Joe Slobkin came running to meet me.

I could tell at a glance that success hadn’t gone to his head. Apparently it had moved in the other direction, for he was wearing a pair of ermine shorts.

“Same old Joe,” I said.

“Why not?” He took off his diamond-studded sunglasses (ground specially for him by the same team that had worked on the Moonbase Observatory lens) and grinned at me. “You don’t have to worry about me, old buddy. Even if I am the most intelligent-type agent in Hollywood, which modesty forbids I should mention.”

Leading me along the flat roof, he paused before the transporter as the uniformed pilot saluted him.

“Park it in the hangar with the “others,” he ordered.

The pilot clicked his heels. “Will that be all, sir?”

“Yeah. Take the rest of the day off. But before you go, remember to feed the elephant.”

“You have a pet elephant?” I murmured.

“Who said anything about pets? Some of my musician clients are alia time coming over and banging on my grand piano. I got tired of replacing the busted keys, so I figgered it would be cheaper raising my own ivory. In this business you gotta watch all the angles.”

I bad no answer to that, so I turned and stared down at the palatial expanse of San Simoleon, the Slobkin estate.

“Quite a view, huh?” he commented. “On a clear day you can see the smog.”

I shook my head. “How did you ever manage to find a place surrounded entirely by mountains?”

“Just wanted privacy, dig? Matter of fact, it wasn’t surrounded. When I came here it had mountains on only three sides. I built the fourth one myself.”

“And that kidney-shaped swimming pool—”

“You like it? Had a doctor design it for me. Modeled after one of my own kidneys. On the other side I got a liver-shaped swimming pool. Which I don’t use, on account of hepatitis.”

Slobkin led me to the elevator and we descended to the Grand Ballroom. A golden fountain cascaded merrily at one end, and Slobkin produced glasses that he held beneath the spray.

“How’s for some champagne?”

I took the glass, staring in admiration at his tattooed arm.

“Neat, huh?” He flexed his biceps. “It’s an original Picasso. You know, Sidney Picasso, the old-time artist’s grandson. Had him do it the last time I was in Paris. Some day I’ll get something put on my chest. Maybe one of them there Remnants, or Rembrands, whatever.”

“Rembrandt is dead,” I said. “Hell, too bad. I should of caught him on the first trip.” Slobkin led me to a sofa before the fireplace, at which silent, unobtrusive servitors were barbecuing a yak on a spit. We settled back in comfort.

“Let’s rap about you,” he said. “Been over three years since we huddled. What’s the scam?”

“Nothing to tell. I’m still a freelance writer.”

Slobkin frowned. “Same bag, huh? Speaking of which, I bet you still got the same wife, too. You never did have no ambition. Look what I done in the past couple years.”

“I’m looking,” I told him. “And I still can’t believe it. Just think, when I met you, all you had was desk space in that little office over on Smogset Strip.”

His frown deepened. “That pay-toilet! No wonder I never got nowhere being an agent—crowded into the same room with ten other guys. Why, in those days I didn’t even have a spot to pitch in.”

I nodded. “You couldn’t get a line into the studios. I remember how excited you were the first time you landed a part for a client. Who was that, anyway?”

“It was a chimpanzee,” Slobkin said. “I had a deal lined up with Paranoid Pictures. They were to use him as somebody’s stand-in for Beyond The Backside Of The Planet Of The Apes. Only he bombed. Once the chimp got a whiff of makeup he decided to quit show biz and go into politics.” Slobkin grimaced with angry distaste. “Believe me, I didn’t vote for him. But he got in anyway. More champagne? Or a little caviar, maybe? I’ll have one of the boys run down to the pond and squeeze out a sturgeon.”

“Never mind.” I gestured him back into his seat. “What I want to know is what happened to you. How did the change come about?”

“NO CHANGE,” Joe Slobin told me solemnly. “Just the old switcheroo, that’s all. The old switcheroo.”

“You’re going to tell me about it, aren’t you?”

“Sure. That’s why I had you come out here. Figured you could use a story. And this one’s a grabber. This one I could break with any of the services. But I wanted it should go to you, baby.” Slobkin chewed sentimentally on the end of his cigar.

I leaned forward. “Would it by any chance happen to concern your two biggest clients? Has it something to do with Ricky Ticky and Michele Belch?"

Slobkin nodded. "I'll tell it like it is."

And he did, just as I'm putting it down here. Only the grammar has been changed, to protect the innocent.

Three years ago (Joe Slobkin told me) there was no such person as Ricky Ticky. There was no such person as Michele Belch. There was just poor old Joe Slobkin, the ten-percenter, sitting in his little desk-space and trying to figure out how he could live on ten percent of nothing. And there was a kid named Oscar Fink and a chick named Irma Schmutz.

"Very straight," Slobkin said. "And loaded with talent. This Irma Schmutz could do anything—sing, dance or play all kinds of instruments, including musical. Oscar Fink was great, too. Particularly on imitations. That stud could do a take-off on anybody. Really a natural, dig? But neither of'em had a dime and neither of 'em had a chance. I guess that's why they finally ended up with me.

"Well, I did my best, but it was like nowhere. Two of 'em got acquainted in my office and they used to come in together, sort of like a team. One day they leaned on me—wanted to know what was wrong. So I laid it on them.

"I told 'em the whole hangup was they were weak in the looks department. This Irma Schmutz was just what you might call an average bird. Brown hair, thin face, a little on the tall side. Also, her chest was flat enough to play Scrabble on, if that's your kick.

"Oscar Fink was in even worse shape, what there was of it. He was short, had kind of a high voice and ran to fat.

"So what's a guy gonna do? You know how important the old image is in this industry. And I put it to them just that way, let it all hang out.

"Nobody was happy when I got finished. Irma said, 'But Oscar is a good mimic. He doesn't have to be a groovy-looking stud for that, does he?' And Oscar said, 'Irma can play and sing and dance even with her clothes on—what more do you want?'

"I told 'em it wasn't a question of what I wanted. It's what the public wants. Brown-haired, flatchested babes don't get to be stars—they just get married.

“And that’s where Oscar Fink came up with the beginning of the switcheroo.

“He told me something I should of figgered for myself all along. ‘Fake it,’ he said. ‘All you got to do is fake it. What kind of chicks made it in the oldtime movies? Right from the beginning it’s been big-busted blondes—Jean Harlow, Marilyn Monroe and all those other broads. How many of them used their real names? How many of them were real blondes? How many of them had natural big busts?’

“Well, I had to admit he was right, at least about the names and the blonde part of it. The busts I never had a chance to investigate, not firsthand, that is.

“Oscar Fink poured it on. ‘So you change her name,’ he said. ‘And dye her hair. And you do a little shopping for falsies at Farmer’s Market or wherever. Teach her to wiggle when she walks and pitch her voice lower. No problem.’

“This got Irma all excited. Don’t forget Oscar, either,’ she said. ‘Maybe he looks more like a crud than a stud, but he has talent. What about all the hard-rock and soul singers with the way-out names? They weren’t handsome either, but you couldn’t see their faces under the hair. They mostly didn’t sing, just howled. Like this.’ And she ups with a demonstration which is like to tear my ears off.

“SO I say, ‘Okay, why not? We got nothing to lose. First off, we change the names. From now on there ain’t no Irma Schmutz and Oscar Fink any more. From now on you’re gonna be—let’s see—Michele Belch and Ricky Ticky.’

“Just like that the names come to me. After which I slammed out a couple of fake biographies, got in touch with some flacks who owed me a few favors, went out and bought them a mod wardrobe on credit, rounded up an electronic guitar from a hockshop, and we were rolling.”

Joe Slobkin paused to catch his breath, and his third glass of champagne.

"You don't have to tell me any more," I said. "Everybody knows what happened after that. Michele Belch got a walk-on bit in a family-type home-nudie and became a sensation the moment she stopped walking and started to lie down. Ricky Ticky signed with an obscure recording company—Obscure Records, wasn't it?—got a few numbers on cassettes—and the phones began to ring all over the country. It's been a pushover all the way."

Joe Slobkin shook his head. "That's what you think. Only it wasn't quite so easy."

"But all this happened, didn't it?"

"Sure it happened. Only not at first."

"What did happen first, then?"

"They bombed."

I frowned. "You mean the scheme didn't work?"

"That's right, baby. It didn't work. Changing names wasn't enough. Planting stories wasn't enough. I ought to have figured it from the start. Maybe a smart flesh-peddler can take a skinny little chick and build her up into a real C-cup personality. Maybe he can turn an insignificant little insect into another Beatle. But he's got to have something going for him if he wants to hit the top ten on the Porno Graph. The chick has to be sexy; the guy has to put a gutfeeling into his vocal chords. Trouble is, all these two had was ability. And so they bombed."

I stared at him. "How can you say that? They did make it. The stories are true, you built them up, made big stars out of them, made millions."

Joe Slobkin smiled patiently. "Later. After I figured out the angle."

"What angle? Is that the story you're giving me an exclusive on?" The little agent turned pale. "Not in a million years!" he gasped. "This is all off the record, get me? The yarn I want you to break is—"

"Joe, baby—!"

My head swiveled at the interruption, then nearly fell off as Michele Belch wriggled into the room. She was every bit as blonde, as bosomy and as beautiful as in my wildest dreams. She was puffing on an Acapulco roach.

“Hiya sweetheart!”

It was Ricky Ticky, in the flashy flesh; tangled hair mopping his thin forehead and his velvet blue-jeans glued to his gluteus maximus with a crotch-clutching closeness.

“Everything set?” Joe Slobkin inquired.

“Copasetic.” Ricky nodded at Michele. “We trans off for New Vegas in five minutes, right from your pad here. Be married in an hour. Got my guitar all packed for the honeymoon.”

“Beautiful!” Joe Slobkin beamed and advanced on Michele. “How’s the bride? Got enough luggage and everything?”

“Just my hope chest,” she replied, with a shy downward glance at the article in question.

I gulped. “This is true? These two are going to be hitched?”

Slobkin nodded at me. “Eloping right now. That’s why I got you over here. In a couple of hours the wire-tapes will have the whole enchilada—but it’s yours, right now, in advance. Minute they leave, you get on the com and make a deal with the media for your exclusive. Tomorrow you’ll be made, baby—the guy who beat old Jill Haber and Bill Katz to the biggest news item of the century.”

He turned and faced the loving couple. “This guy’s my buddy,” he murmured. “I want you two to cooperate—answer any questions he lays on you.”

“I’ve got no questions,” I said. “I think I can handle it without a routine interview, and something tells me you’re both anxious to get on your way.”

“Yeah.” Slobkin nodded, frowning at Ricky Ticky. “Something tells me the same thing, and get your hands off her until the honeymoon. Or at least until you’re on the trans.”

Ricky Ticky grinned at me. “Mighty nice of you to understand.”

I took a deep breath. “Just one favor, though. Uh—could I kiss the bride?”

Michele Belch gave me a surprised look. Then she took the ciggy out of her mouth, crushed it and stood indecisively for a moment, holding it in her hand. A quick glance was exchanged between her and Ricky. Then, with a coy gesture, she waved her butt at me.

I ADVANCED to claim my reward. Somehow I hadn't reckoned on the bearskin in front of the fireplace. My heel caught in the bear's open jaws and I slipped. My hands, seeking to encircle Michele's shoulders, grabbed at her hair instead.

It came off.

"Holy Toledo!" cried Joe Slobkin "Get the hell out of here!

Ricky Ticky began to sob. "Now look what's happened! He'll spill it—I know he'll spill it!"

"No he won't!" Slobkin shouted. "He's with it. Besides, I was gonna tell him anyway, after you left. Just cut out now, before anybody else sees you. Split!"

He herded them off in the direction of the elevator, and I sank back on the sofa as the babble of their voices died away in the distance.

A moment later Joe Slobkin returned. Silently he handed me a glass of champagne and silently I drank it.

"So that's how it is," I said. "Yeah." He sighed deeply, then shallowly. "That's how it is. I told you they bombed. And then I lucked out.

"I got to thinking about the way they'd given me a pitch that day in the office. Here was a kid who could imitate anybody—so why not an imitation of a chick? What was wrong with giving him the falsies, and maybe a good wig?

"And here was a chick who had talent for any instrument and a voice that could lift the roof off an outhouse at three hundred feet. Why not let her grow the mop and wear the jeans? So I put it to them, and they bought it, and the rest is like history."

"Unisex, eh?"

"Right," Slobkin assured me. "Like I told you, it's nothing but the old switcheroo."

Many months have passed since the truth was revealed to me there in the Grand Ballroom of Slobkin's estate. Since that time the marriage of Ricky Ticky and Michele Belch has reached the point where a blessed event is in the offing. I tv view of this fact, their secret can remain a secret no longer, and I am thus privileged to reveal the facts.

What I'm really hoping for now is that my old friend Joe Slobkin will see fit to give me another exclusive story. I'd like a scoop on the impending birth.

But up to this time, Joe Slobkin hasn't quite made up his mind whether they're going to have a boy or a girl.

Forever and Amen

FOREVER.

It's a nice way to live, if you can afford it.

And Seward Skinner could.

"One billion integral units," said Dr. Togol. "Maybe more."

Seward Skinner didn't even blink when he heard the estimate. Blinking, like every other bodily movement, involves painful effort when one is in a terminal stage. But Skinner summoned the strength to speak, even though his voice was no. more than a husky whisper.

"Go ahead with the plan. But hurry."

The plan had been ten years in the making and Skinner had been dying for the past two, so Dr. Togol hurried. Haste makes waste and in the end it probably cost Skinner closer to five billion IGUS than the price quoted. Nobody knew for sure. All they knew was that Seward Skinner was the one man in the entire galaxy—the known galaxy, that is—who could afford the expenditure.

That was the extent of their knowledge.

Seward Skinner had been the wealthiest man alive for a long, long time. There were still a few old-timers around who could remember the days when he was a public figure and a private joke—the Playboy of the Planets, as they called him. According to the rumors he had a woman on every world, or at least a female.

Other people, a trifle less elderly, recalled a more mature Seward Skinner —the Galactic Genius, fabulous inventor—entrepreneur of Interspace

Industries, the largest corporate combine ever known. During those days his business operations made the news, and the rumors.

But for the majority of the interplanetary public, the youngsters without personal memories of those far-off times, Seward Skinner was merely a name. In recent years he'd withdrawn completely from any contact with the outside worlds. And Interspace Industries had carefully and painstakingly tracked down and acquired every tape, every record of his past. Some said these had been destroyed, some said the data had been hidden away, but in the end it amounted to the same thing. Seward Skinner's privacy was protected, complete. And nobody saw the man himself any more. His business, his life itself, seemed to be run by remote control.

Actually, of course, it was run by Dr. Togol.

If Skinner was the richest man, Dr. Togol was surely the most brilliant scientist. Inevitably, the two men were drawn together by a common love—wealth.

What wealth represented to Skinner no one knew. What it meant to Dr. Togol was plainly apparent; it was the tool of research. Unlimited funds were the key to unlimited experimentation. And so a partnership came into being.

During the past decade Dr. Togol developed his plan and Seward Skinner developed incurable cancer.

Now the plan was ready to function, just as Skinner was ceasing to function.

So Skinner died.

And lived again.

It's great to be alive, particularly after you've been dead. Somehow the sun seems warmer, the world looks brighter, the birds sing more sweetly. Even though here on Eden the sun was artificial, the light was supplied by beaming devices, and the birdsong issued from mechanical throats.

But Skinner himself was alive.

He sat on the terrace of his big house on the hill and looked down over Eden and he was pleased at what he had wrought. The bleak little satellite of a barren and neglected world he'd purchased many years ago had been transformed into a miniature earth, a reminder of his original home. Below him was a city very similar to the one where he'd been born; here on the hilltop was a mansion duplicating the finest dwelling he'd ever owned. Yonder was Dr. Togol's laboratory complex, and deep in the vaults beneath it—

Skinner shut away the thought.

"Bring me a drink," he said.

Skinner, the waiter, nodded and went into the house and told Skinner, the butler, to mix the drink.

Nobody drank alcohol any more, and nobody had waiters or butlers, but that's the way Skinner wanted things; he remembered how he'd lived in the old days and he intended to live that way now. Now and forever.

So after Skinner had his drink he had Skinner, the chauffeur, drive him down into the city. He peered out of the minimobile, enjoying the spectacle. Skinner had always been a people watcher, and the activities of these people were of special and particular interest to him now.

Behind the wheels of other minimobiles, the Skinners nodded and smiled at him as he passed. At the intersection, Skinner, the security officer, waved him along. On the walks before the fabrication and food processing plants, other Skinners went about their errands. Skinner, the hydroponics engineer, Skinner, the waste-recycler, Skinner, the oxygenerator control man, Skinner, the transport dispatcher, Skinner, the media channeler. Each had his place and his function in this miniature world, keeping it running smoothly and efficiently, according to plan and program.

"One thing is definite," Skinner had told Dr. Togol. "There'll be no computerization. I don't want my people controlled by a machine. They're not robots—each and every one of them is a human being, and they're going to live like human beings. Full responsibility and full security, that's the secret of a full life. After all, they're just as important to the scheme of things as I am, and I want them to be happy. It may not matter to you, but you've got to remember that they're my family."

"More than your family," Dr. Togol said. "They are you."

And it was true. They were him—or part of him. Each and every one was actually Skinner, the product of a single cell, reproduced and evolved by the perfection of Dr. Togol's process.

The process was called cloning and it was very involved. Even the clone theory itself was involved and Skinner had never completely understood it. But then he didn't need to understand; that was Dr. Togol's task, to understand the theory and devise ways to bring it to reality. Skinner provided the financing, the laboratory, the equipment, the facilities. His means and Dr. Togol's ways. And in the end—when the end came—his body provided the living cell tissue out of which the clones were extracted, isolated, and bred. The clones, cycling through complicated growth into physical duplicates of Skinner himself. Not reproductions, not imitations, not copies, but truly himself.

Glancing ahead toward the rear-view mirror of the minimobile, Skinner saw the chauffeur, a mirror image of his own face and body. Gazing out of the window he saw himself again reflected in every form that passed. Each of the Skinners was a tall man, well past middle years, but with the youthful vigor born of a careful and painstaking regimen of advanced vitamin therapy and organ regeneration; the result of expensive medical attention that partially obliterated the ravages of metastasis. And, since the carcinoma was not hereditary, it had not been carried over into the clones. Like himself, all the Skinners were in good health. And, like himself, they carried within them the seeds—the actual cells—of immortality.

Forever.

They would live forever, as he did.

And they were him. Physically interchangeable, except for the clothing they wore—the uniforms designating their various occupations served to differentiate and identify them.

A world of Skinners on Skinner's world.

There had been problems, of course.

Long ago, before Dr. Togol began his work, they'd discussed the matter.

“One true clone,” Dr. Togol said. “That’s enough to aim for. One healthy facsimile of yourself is all you need.” Skinner shook his head. “Too risky. Suppose there’s an accident? That would be the end of me.”

“Very well. We’ll arrange to keep extra cellular tissue alive, in reserve. Carefully stored and guarded, of course.”

“Guarded?”

“But of course,” Dr. Togol nodded. “This Eden, this satellite of yours, will need protection. And since you seem to be determined not to run it by computer, you’re going to need personnel. Other people to do the work, keep things going, provide you with companionship. Surely you won’t want to live forever if you must spend eternity alone.” Skinner frowned. “I don’t trust people. Not as guards, not as employees, certainly not as friends.”

“No one at all?”

“I trust myself,” Skinner said. “So I want more clones. Enough to keep Eden going independently of any outsider.”

“The whole satellite populated by nothing but Skinners?”

“Exactly.”

“But you don’t seem to understand. If the process succeeds and I produce more than one Skinner, they’ll share everything. Not just bodies like yours, but minds—each personality will be identical. They’ll have the same memories, right up to the moment that the cells are excised from your body.”

“I understand that.”

“Do you?” Dr. Togol shook his head. “Let’s say I follow your instructions. Technically speaking, it’s possible—if a single cloning is successful, then the rest would be successful too. All that would be involved is the additional expense of the process.”

“Then there’s no problem, is there?”

“I told you what the problem is. A thousand Skinners, exactly alike. Looking alike, thinking alike, feeling alike. And you—the present you, reproduced by cloning—would just be one of the many. Have you decided what job you want to perform on your new world once you’ve become immortal? Do you want to tend the power banks—would you like to unload supplies—do you think you'd enjoy working in the kitchens of the big house forever?"

"Certainly not!" Skinner snapped. "I want to be just what I am now."

"The boss. Top man. Mr. Big." Dr. Togol smiled, then sighed. "That's just the point. So will all the others. Every one of your counterparts will have the same desire, the same goal, the same drive to dominate, to control. Because they'll all have your exact brain and nervous system."

"Up to the time they are reborn, you might say?"

"Right."

"Then from that moment on, you'll institute a new program. A program of conditioning." Skinner nodded quickly. "There are techniques for that, I know. Sleep learning, deep hypnosis machines—the sort of thing psychologists use to alter criminal behavior. You'll plant memory blocks selectively."

"But I'd need an entire psychomedical center, completely staffed—"

"You'll have it. I want the whole procedure carried out right here on earth, before anyone is transported to Eden."

"I'm not sure. You're asking for the creation of a new race, each with a new personality. A Skinner who'll remember his past life but is now content to be merely a hydroponic gardener, a Skinner who'll be satisfied to live forever as an accountant, a Skinner willing to devote his entire endless existence as a repairman."

Skinner shrugged. "A difficult and complicated job, I know. But then you'll be working with a difficult and complicated personality—mine." He cleared his throat painfully before continuing. "Not that I'm unique. We're all far more complicated than we appear to be on the surface, you know that. Each human being is a bundle of conflicting impulses, some expressed, some suppressed. I know that there's a part of me which has always been close to nature, to the soil, to the cultivation and growth of life. I've buried that facet of my personality away since childhood but the memories are there. Find them and you'll have your gardeners, your farmers—yes, and your medical staff assistants too!

"Another part of me is fascinated even consciously today by facts and figures, the minutiae of mathematics. Isolate that aspect, condition it to full expression, and you'll get your accountant, and all the help you need to keep Eden running smoothly and systematically.

"I don't need to tell you that a great share of my early career was devoted to scientific research and invention. You won't have any problem developing mechanical-minded Skinners to staff power units, or even to drive transport vehicles.

"The reaches of the mind are infinite, Doctor. Exploit them properly and you'll have a working world—with all the petty authority roles filled by Skinners who have the urge to play policeman or foreman or supervisor—and all the menial tasks performed by Skinners who long to serve. Resurrect those specific traits and tendencies, intensify them, blot out all the memories which might conflict with them, and the rest is easy."

"Easy?" Dr. Togol scowled. "To brainwash them all?"

"All but one." Skinner's voice was crisp. "One will remain untouched, reproduced exactly and entirely as is. And that will be me."

The gray-haired, potbellied little medical scientist stared at Skinner for a long moment.

"You don't admit the possibility of any changes in yourself? The desirability of modifying some of your own personality pattern?"

"I don't think I'm perfect, if that's what you mean. But I'm satisfied with myself as I am. And as I will be, once you've carried out the plan."

Dr. Togol continued to stare. "You say you have learned to trust no one. If that's true—and I'm inclined to believe you—then how do you know you can trust me?"

"What do you mean?"

"You're going to die. We both know that. It's only a matter of time. The power to regenerate you through cloning is entirely in my hands. Suppose I don't go through with it?" Skinner met Dr. Togol's stare. "You'll go through with it before I die. And long before I'm helpless and unable to issue orders, you'll be processing the clones as I've directed. I assure you I have every intention of staying alive until all the clones are ready for transportation to Eden."

"But you will die then," Togol insisted. "And there'll be the one clone you've chosen to represent yourself—the one you insist must remain unchanged. What makes you so sure I'll obey that directive after you're actually dead? I could use psychological techniques to modify your clone's personality then in any way I choose. What's to prevent me from making your clone my willing slave—so that I'd be the real master of this new world you created?"

"Curiosity," Skinner murmured. "You'll do exactly as I say because you're fanatically and completely curious about the outcome. No other man alive can provide you with the means and opportunity to carry through this cloning project. If the experiment succeeds you'll have made the greatest scientific breakthrough of all time—so you won't betray your trust by failure or refusal. And once you go that far, you won't be able to resist following through. Particularly when you come to realize that this is only the beginning."

"I don't understand."

"All my life I've moved forward from a position of strength, of self-confidence. And you know what I have achieved. I think I'm presently the wealthiest and most powerful individual in the galaxy.

"I'm a sick man now, but thanks to you I'm going to be well again. Not only well, but immortal. Consider the kind of confidence I'll possess once I'm free of illness, free forever from the fear of death. With my thrust we can go on to far greater concepts, for greater achievements—solve all the mysteries, shatter all the barriers, shake the stars!

"You can't afford to tamper with! my mind because you'll want to be a part of it all—to see and to share. Right, doctor?"

Togol's glance faltered. He had no answer, because he knew it was true.

And it had been true.

The cloning was carried out just as Seward Skinner had planned it. And the psychological conditioning project which followed was properly performed too, even though in the end it proved to be far more complicated than anyone had imagined.

The final step involved recruiting a staff of several hundred technicians, highly skilled and specially schooled, then divided into psychomedical teams assigned to the individual clones as they were nurtured to full growth and emerged as functioning adult specimens. Under Dr. Togol's supervision these specialists created the programs for memory blocking, for shaping the personalities of each separate Skinner to fit him for his life role when he reached Eden.

After that the shuttling began.

Space transports, manned exclusively by Skinners trained for the task, brought other Skinners to the stony surface of the secret satellite. Additional Skinner-piloted transports convoyed and conveyed the seemingly endless supply of materials needed to transform the empty expanse of Eden into the world of Seward Skinner's dream.

The miniature city rose on the plain, the house went up on the hillside, the laboratory complex grew over the great vault below. And all of this, every step of the operation, was carried out in such strict, security guarded secrecy that no outsider ever suspected its existence.

As time went on the steps became part of a race—a race with death.

Skinner was dying. Only an act of incredible will kept him alive long enough to supervise the total destruction of the earthsite where the work had taken place.

Then he himself went to Eden with Dr. Togol, but not until he'd made arrangements to send up the entire psychomedical staff, intact, to the new complex there.

For this a final transport was arranged.

Skinner vividly remembered the evening he lay on his deathbed in the hillside house with Dr. Togol, awaiting the arrival of the transport.

Flickering forth in the darkened room, the media transmitter screamed its shocking message. Pressure failure and implosion beyond Pluto—transport totally destroyed—no survivors.

“My God!” said Togol.

Then, in the dim light, he saw the smile on the face of the dying man. And heard the harsh, labored whisper.

“Did you really believe I’d ever allow any outsiders to come here—to pry, interfere—learn the secrets—carry the news back into other worlds?”

Togol stared at him. “Sabotaging a transport, murdering all those men! You can’t possibly get away with it!”

“Fait accompli.” Skinner grimaced. “No one on board knew the true destination—they thought it was Rigel. And what happened will be recorded as an accident.”

“Unless I choose to report it.”

The dying man’s features caricatured a smile. “You won’t. Because there is a single detailed account of the whole scheme hidden away in my files. It implicates you as my accomplice, so if you speak you’ll be signing your own death warrant.”

“You forget that I can sign yours,” Dr. Togol said. “Merely by letting nature take its course.”

“If you let me die now, everything in my files will come to light. So you have no choice. You’re going to go through with it—proceed with the final cloning that will reproduce me as I’ve ordered.”

Togol took a deep breath. “So that’s why you were so confident I’d never betray you! You weren’t relying on my scientific curiosity—you’d planned this all along, to have a permanent hold on me.”

“I told you I was a complex man.” Skinner winced with pain. “Now it is time to make me a whole and healthy one. You’ll start now—tonight.”

It wasn’t an order, merely a statement of fact.

And, factually, Dr. Togol had proceeded according to plan.

Seward Skinner was grateful for that, grateful that his new clone born self evolved before his old body had actually died. Because if Togol had waited until then, the clone would have held the memory of Skinner's death. And that is a memory no man can bear.

As it was, the living tissue that was now Skinner had begun its growth process in the laboratory complex safely before the pain racked, rotting tissue of the body in the house ceased to function. Skinner was not aware of just when he had died; he was too busy learning how to live.

Working without a team of technicians was a great handicap, but Dr. Togol had overcome it quickly and efficiently—with the aid of other Skinners to whom he was able to impart rudimentary medical skills. Since then, of course, he had cloned an entire staff of Skinners for that purpose—Dr. Skinner, the psychotherapy chief; Dr. Skinner, the head surgeon; Dr. Skinner, the diagnostic specialist; and a dozen others.

"You see, we didn't need outsiders after all," the new Skinner told Togol, after it was over. "We're totally self-sustaining here. And when these bodies start to show signs of deterioration and function failure, new clones will replace them. Everyone's dream of true immortality, realized at last."

"Everyone's?" Dr. Togol shook his head. "Not mine."

"Then you're a fool," Skinner said. "You have the opportunity to clone yourself, live forever, just as I intend to. I've granted you that privilege. What more could you ask?"

"Freedom."

"But you're free here. You have the resources of the galaxy at your disposal—you can expand the lab unit indefinitely, go on to major research in other fields, just as I promised you. That cure for cancer they've been talking about for the past hundred years—don't you want to find it? You've implemented some marvelous memory blocking techniques already, but this is only the beginning of a whole new psychotherapy. You can build new personalities, reshape the human condition as you will—"

"As you will." Togol's smile was bitter. "This is your world. I want my own. The old world, with ordinary people, men—and women—"

"You know very well why I decided against women here," Skinner said. "They're not necessary for reproduction. Fortunately, at my age, the sexual impulse is no longer an imperative. So females would only complicate our existence, without serving any true function."

"Tenderness, compassion, understanding, companionship," Togol murmured. "All nonfunctional by your definition."

"Stereotypy. Utter nonsense. Sentimentalization of a biological role which you and I have rendered obsolete."

"You've rendered everything obsolete," Togol told him. "Everything except the antlike activity of your clone colony—the warped and crippled partial personalities created to serve you."

"They're happy the way they are," Skinner said. "And it doesn't matter. What matters is that I haven't changed. I'm a whole man."

"Are you?" Dr. Togol's smile was mirthless. He nodded toward the house, gestured to include the terrace and the city below. "Everything you've built here, everything you've done, is a product of the most crippling defect of all—the fear of death."

"But all men are afraid to die."

"So afraid that they spend their entire lives just trying to avoid the realization of their own mortality?" Togol shook his head. "You know there's a vault underneath my laboratory. You know why it was built. You know what it contains. And yet your fear is so great that you won't even admit it exists."

"Take me there," Skinner said.

"You don't mean that."

"Come on. I'll show you I'm not frightened."

But he was.

Even before they reached the elevator Skinner started to tremble, and as they began their deep descent to the lower level he was shuddering uncontrollably.

"Cold down here," he muttered.

Dr. Togol nodded. "Temperature control," he said.

They left the elevator and walked along a dark corridor toward the steel sheathed chamber set in stone. Security guard Skinner stood sentinel at the door and smiled a greeting as they approached. At Togol’s order, he produced a key and opened the vault door.

Seward Skinner didn’t look at him and he didn’t want to look beyond the doorway.

But Dr. Togol had already entered and now there was no choice but to follow. Follow him into the dim light of the chill chamber—to the looming control banks that whined and whirred in the center of the room—to the tangled cluster of tubes and inputs which snaked down from all sides into a transparent glass cylinder.

Skinner stared through the shadows at the cylinder. It was shaped like a coffin, because it was a coffin; a coffin in which Seward Skinner saw—

Himself.

His own body; the wasted, shriveled body from which the clones had sprung, floating in the clear solution amid the coils and clamps and weblike wires tunneling through the glass covering to terminate in contact with frozen flesh.

“Not dead,” Dr. Togol murmured. “Frozen in solution. The cryogenic process, preserving you in suspended animation—indefinitely—”

Skinner shuddered again and turned away. “Why?” he whispered. “Why didn’t you let me die?”

“You wanted immortality.”

“But I have it. With this new body, all the others.”

“Flesh is vulnerable. Any accident can destroy it.”

“You’ve stored more cell tissue. If anything happened to me as I am now, you could repeat the cloning.”

“Only if your original body remains available for the process. It had to be preserved against such an emergency—alive.”

Skinner forced himself to glance again at the corpse-like creature congealed in cold behind its crystal confines.

And yet he knew it was, knew that the cryogenic process., had been developed for just that purpose. To maintain a minimum life force in hibernation against the time when medical science could arrest and eliminate its disease processes and develop techniques to thaw it out and successfully restore complete and conscious existence again.

Skinner realized this goal had never been achieved, but the possibility remained. Some day perhaps the methodology would be perfected and this thing might be resurrected—not as a clone, but as he had been. The original Skinner, alive once more and a rival to his present self.

“Destroy it,” he said.

Dr. Togol stared at him. “You don’t mean that. You can’t—”

“Destroy it!”

Skinner turned and walked out of the vault.

Dr. Togol remained behind, and it was a longtime before he returned to rejoin Skinner in his house on the surface. What he’d done there in the vault he did not say, and Skinner never inquired. The subject wasn’t discussed again.

But since that night Skinner’s relationship with Togol had never been quite the same. There was no more discussion of the future, of possible new projects and experiment. There was only a heightened awareness of tension, of waiting, an indefinable atmosphere of alienation. Dr. Togol spent more and more of his time within the laboratory complex, where he maintained separate living quarters of his own. And Skinner went his own way, alone.

Alone, yet not alone. For this was his world, and it was filled with his own people, created in his own image. Thou shalt have no God but Skinner. And Skinner is His prophet.

That was the commandment and the law. And if Dr. Togol chose not to abide by it—

Now Seward Skinner, walking the streets of his own city, came to the door of the museum.

Skinner, the chauffeur, waited outside, smiling in obedience at the order, and Skinner, the museum guard, nodded happily as Seward Skinner entered.

Skinner, the curator, greeted him, delighted at the sight of a visitor. No one ever came to the museum except his master—indeed, the whole notion of a museum was merely a quaint conceit, an archaicism from the distant past on earth.

But Seward Skinner had felt the need for such a place here; a storehouse and a showcase for the art and artifacts he'd accumulated in the past. And while he could have stocked it with the treasures and trophies gathered throughout the galaxy, he'd elected to exhibit only objects from earth. Obsolete objects at that—mementos and memorabilia representing ancient history. Here in the halls were the riches and relics of long ago and far away. Paintings from palaces, sculpture and statues from shrines; the jewels and jade and gorgeous gewgaws which had once represented royal tastes, rescued from regal tombs.

Skinner walked through the displays with scarcely a glance at its glories. Ordinarily he might have spent hours admiring the ancient television set, the library of printed books hermetically sealed in plexiglass, the slot machine, the reconstructed gas engine automobile in perfect running condition.

Today he went straight to remote room and indicated one of the items on display.

"Give me that."

The curator's polite smile masked perplexity, but he obeyed.

Then Skinner turned and retraced his steps. At the door the chauffeur waited to escort him back to the minimobile.

Driving back through the streets, Skinner smiled once more at the passersby and watched them as they went about their ways.

How could Togol call them crippled? They were happy in their work, their lives were fulfilled. Each had been conditioned to accept his lot without envy, competition or hostility. Thanks to their conditioning and the selective screening of memory patterns they seemed much more content than the Seward Skinner who surveyed them as he returned to his house on the hill.

But he too would be satisfied, and soon.

That evening he summoned Dr. Togol.

Seated on the terrace in the twilight, inhaling the synthetic scent of the simulated flowers, Skinner smiled a greeting at the scientist.

“Sit down,” he said. “It’s time we had a talk.”

Togol nodded and sank into a chair with an audible sigh of effort.

“Tired?”

Togol nodded. “I’ve been quite busy lately.”

“I know.” Skinner twirled his brandy snifter. “Assembling data on the project here must be quite exhausting.”

“You’ve put it all on microtape, haven’t you? A single spool, small enough to be carried in a man’s pocket. How very convenient.”

Dr. Togol stiffened and sat upright.

Skinner’s smile was serene. “Did you propose to smuggle it out? Or take it back yourself on the next transport shuttle to earth?”

“Who told you—”

Skinner shrugged. “It’s obvious enough. Now that you’ve achieved the goal you want the glory. A triumphant return—your name and fame echoing throughout the galaxy—”

Togol frowned. “It’s natural for you to think of it in terms of ego. But that’s not the reason. You told me yourself before we started—this can be the most significant achievement in all time. The discovery must be shared, put to use for the benefit of others.”

“I paid for the research. I funded the project. It’s my property.”

“No man has the right to withhold knowledge.”

“But I’m not.” Dr. Togol rose.

Skinner’s smile faded. “Suppose I refuse to let you go?”

“I wouldn’t advise it.”

“Threats?”

“A statement of fact.” Togol met Skinner’s stare. “Let me leave in peace. You have my word that your secret is safe. I’ll share my findings but preserve your privacy. No one will ever learn the location of Eden.”

"I'm not in the habit of making bargains."

"I realize that." Dr. Togol nodded. "So I've already taken certain precautions."

"What sort of precautions?" Skinner chuckled, enjoying the moment. "You forget—this is my world."

"You have no world." Togol faced him, frowning. "All this is merely a mirror maze. The ultimate end of the megalomaniac carried to its logical extreme. In the old days conquerors and kings surrounded themselves with portraits and paintings celebrating their triumphs, commissioned statues and raised pyramids as monuments to their vanity. Servants and slaves sung their praises, sycophants erected shrines to their divinity. You've done all that and more. But it won't last. No man is an island. The tallest temples topple, the most fawning followers go down into dust."

"Do you deny you've given me immortality?"

"I've given you what you want, what every man in search of power really wants—the illusion of his own omnipotence. And you're welcome to keep it." Dr. Togol nodded. "But if you try to stop me—"

"I intend to do just that." Seward Skinner's smile returned. "Now."

"Skinner! For God's sake—"

"Yes. For my sake."

Still smiling, Skinner reached into his jacket and brought forth the object he'd taken from the museum.

There was a flicker of flame in the twilight, a single sharp sound shattering the silence, and Dr. Togol fell with a bullet lodged between his eyes.

Skinner summoned Skinner, who scrubbed the tiny trickle of blood from the terrace. Two other Skinners removed the body.

And life went on.

It would always go on, now. Go on forever, free from outside interference. Skinner was safe on Skinner's world. Safe to make further plans.

Dr. Togol was right, of course. He was a megalomaniac, the fact must be faced. Skinner admitted that. Easy enough, because he wasn’t a madman, merely a realist, and the realist admits the truth, which is that one’s ego is all important. A simple fact to a complex man.

And even Togol hadn’t realized how complex Skinner was. Complex enough to make further plans. He’d been thinking about it for a long time now.

Being immortal and independent here in a world of his own was only the beginning. Suppose the infinite resources of Seward Skinner’s galactic complex were utilized now to the ultimate, inexorable end—the end of every other world?

It would take time, but he had eternity. It would take effort, but immortality never tires. There would be a way and a weapon, and eventually he would find both. Eventually the scheme would be implemented, and then in truth there would be nothing in the galaxy but God. Skinner, and only Skinner, forever and ever, amen.

Skinner sat on the terrace and stared out as darkness fell over the land. A vague plan was already taking shape in his mind—the keen, immortally conscious, eternally aware mind.

There was a way, a simple way. Skinner scientists would be pressed into service to carry out the details, and with his resources it was neither fantastic nor impossible. It could be in fact quite simple. Develop a mutant microorganism, an airborne virus impervious to immunization, then transmit it by shuttle to key points throughout the galaxy. Human life, animal life, vegetable life would perish forever in its wake. Forever and ever, amen.

To be the richest man in the world was nothing. To be the wisest, the strongest, the most powerful—this too was not enough. But to be the only man—forever—

Seward Skinner started to laugh.

And then, quite suddenly, his laughter shrilled into a scream.

All over his world, Skinner screamed. The sound echoed through the curator's quarters in the museum, rose from the streets where the security guards stood sentinel, burst from the chauffeur's sleeping lips, shrieked in chorus from each and every Skinner who found himself down there.

The Skinner on the terrace was down there, too. Down there where—a remnant of sanity recalled—Dr. Togol must have taken his precautions and his revenge. It was a simple thing he'd done, really.

He'd gone down there, to the vault where the original Seward Skinner floated in the icy solution which preserved him in hibernation. And all he'd done was to shut off the temperature controls.

Dr. Togol had lied about destroying the thing in the vault. He'd kept it alive, and now that it was thawing its consciousness returned—the original consciousness of the real Seward Skinner, waking in the black, bubbling vat to wheeze and gasp and choke its life away.

And because it was aware now, the clones were linked to that life and that awareness, sharing the shock and sensation as the artificial blocks vanished, so that all again were one.

In a moment the thing down there in the vault was dead. But not before all the Skinners felt its final agony—which would never be final for them. As clones, they were immortal.

Seward Skinner's scream blended with those of every other Skinner on Skinner's world. And they would continue.

Forever.

After I wrote "Ego Trip," the question of identity continued to plague me. And so did the various techniques and technologies which were currently being developed to preserve or prolong individual existence.

Some of these, like the process of cloning, were still in the realm of theory. But about this time a new concept, cryogenics, was very much in the news.

In fact, a medical team had just subjected a terminal-cancer victim to this process, and I happened to be one of the few laymen to hear a firsthand account of it.

For a number of years I'd been a member of a group of writers and friends who gathered for a monthly meeting to hear talks by people prominent in the arts and sciences. The "Pinckard Salon," as it was called, had been founded and hosted by Tom and Terri Pinckard for this purpose. After they moved out of the city, other members took over the arrangements and the gatherings continued. Just how and why we continued to luck out with such interesting speakers I'm not prepared to say. I can only tell you that within thirty-six hours following the first recorded cryogenic experiment on a human subject, the individuals who inaugurated it were addressing us in a private home, and explaining theory and practice in fascinating detail.

Naturally, I was interested. And when Roger Elwood called to ask for a story with a "religious theme" I at once determined to address myself to the question of eternal life and its implementation by future cloning and cryogenic methodology.

Hence "Forever and Amen," which appeared in Elwood's 1972 anthology for Chilton, And Walk Gently Through the Fire.

The hero, or anti-hero, is certainly not a saintly figure. But his eventual fate—eternal damnation in every sense of the word—is meted out to him on the basis of biblical precendent for his presumption.

So in this instance, upon evaluating the story, I can safely say, "Go with God."

Jon couldn't remember a time when he hadn't been in the Maze.

He must have been very young at first, because his earliest recollection was a confused impression of lying on his back and sucking greedily from a tube extended by a Feeder.

The Feeder, of course, was a servo-mechanism, but Jon didn't realize that until much later. At the time he was only aware of the tall tangle of moving metal hovering over him and extending a hollow tentacle toward his eager lips. There had been a Changer too, approaching him at regular intervals to remove soiled clothing, cleanse his body, and cover it with fresh garments.

Jon’s memories became more vivid as his areas of perception slowly extended. The first unit of the Maze was a vast enclosure in which hundreds of infants lay in their individual plastic life-support units while the Feeders and Changers moved among them. From time to time another type of servo-mechanism appeared without warning, disturbing the regular rhythm of eating, sleeping and elimination by superimposing its bulk upon his body.

Now Jon realized it must have been a Medi-mechanism, but he still thought of it as a spider—a gigantic insectoid creature straddling him on extended silvery legs as its myriad extra appendages poked and probed the organs and orifices of his body. It recorded pulse, respiration, brain-wave patterns, his entire metabolism, and corrected deficiencies by injection. Jon could still remember the sting of the needles and how he had writhed and screamed.

Naturally he’d feared and hated the process. Even now that he knew the whole procedure was impersonal, computer-directed for his welfare and well-being, he still resented it.

The other infants had screamed too. But not everything was that unpleasant. As time passed they began to move around more freely, aided by handgrips within their cubicles, and then they started to crawl. Jon crawled with them, eventually leaving the shelter of the life-support unit to seek the source of sounds and images beyond.

The sounds and images came from the walls, from the closed-circuit televisor screens. The screens sang soothingly to him at night and by day they showed images of other infants crawling and feeding happily. Watching the screens, Jon and his peer group began to imitate the actions of the images; soon they learned to take nourishment from little sterile containers deposited by the Feeders at regular intervals once the tubes were no longer offered. Some of Jon’s companions cried when the tubes disappeared, but in time they all began to eat what was set before them.

They began the educational process and that, of course, was the real function of the Learning Maze—to teach them how to live and grow.

In the antiseptic atmosphere of the chamber with its controlled temperature and humidity levels, they watched the infant-images on the screens as the figures crawled, then stood erect and took their first faltering steps.

Imitating them, Jon started to walk. Soon all the others were walking, exploring the chamber and one another. Touch, bodily contact, the discovery and awareness of differences and similarities, sexual awakening—all this was a part of learning.

The Maze guarded and waited, and when the time came its screens disappeared into the walls and there was only a doorway visible at the far end of the chamber. Through that doorway Jon could glimpse another chamber beyond, filled with other youngsters larger than himself who walked freely without falling and uttered complicated sounds as they pursued fascinating, glittering objects in bigger and brighter surroundings.

At first Jon merely watched, uncertain and afraid. Then, inevitably, came an urge to move through the doorway. There was no barrier, no impediment, and he entered easily into the adjoining section of the Maze.

Here the individual plastic cubicles were larger and the screens more sophisticated in their offerings. They still sang soothingly at night, but by day they talked to him.

Night was dark and day was light; that was one of the first things Jon learned. Even before he could comprehend the words, Jon learned many things. He learned to dispense with the Feeders and Changers because here the servomechanisms were different. Their metallic shapes roughly resembled his own on a larger scale; they had arms and legs and heads and they moved about almost in the same fashion that he did. Only of course mechanisms never seemed to tire or express emotion. Perhaps that's why they had no faces—merely a blank surface meshed over the front of their heads through which voices filtered instructions and commands. Gradually Jon began to understand the voices, whether they issued from the screens or from the servo-mechanisms, and presently he learned to respond and to answer in kind.

Soon Jon was established in a normal pattern of boyhood. He played with the glittering objects—the educational toys which tested and extended physical strength, improved his motor reflexes and co-ordination, taught him mechanical dexterity and skills. He talked to his companions, all of whom were males. He made friends and enemies, embarked upon the give-and-take of social relationships, rivalries and dependencies. Competition provided him with motivation; he wanted to excel in order to attract attention and approval.

Jon's orientation came from the screens. As he grew older he became aware of the world beyond—the real world outside the Learning Maze. The world which had once existed without Mazes of any sort and in which human beings had lived all their lives with only the crudest kind of servo-mechanisms to help them. History—or their story, as it was now correctly called—dealt with the quaint quality of this primitive culture in which the biological parents undertook the education of their offspring, assisted by crude instructional institutions.

The combined effects of emotional conflict and ignorance had their inevitable effect: the world had been plunged into endless warfare in which both the inhabitants and their natural environment were almost totally destroyed.

Then and only then, the Learning Maze concept came to the rescue. Once a mere toy for the study of animal behavior in old-fashioned "laboratories," then a simple experimental device developed for the psychological conditioning of children in a few "universities," the Learning Maze principle had been expanded to bring true sanity and civilization to mankind. The perfection of various types of servomechanisms, completely controlled by computerization, eliminated all error.

Gone was the outmoded human hierarchy of masters and servants which had created destruction. Today these roles were played by machines, and man was free to fulfill his true function—learning how to live.

Jon soon realized that his only problem was how to avoid pitfalls along the way. Because there were pitfalls in the Learning Maze. Although the surface beneath his feet seemed solid and substantial, it could give way. He'd seen it happen.

Not all his companions learned as quickly as he did. Some of them seemed uninterested in watching the screens and absorbing the information they provided. If this indifference persisted, the servo-mechanisms noted it and took action.

The action was simple and direct, but startlingly effective. The mechanism merely focused its blank-faced attention on a lazy or noncompetitive youngster and then, with a quick gesture, reached up and pulled a switch located at the side of its metal head. Suddenly, without warning, the ground directly under the child parted and he fell into the dark opening below. Sometimes there was a scream, but usually it happened too quickly for that—for in an instant the gaping hole was gone again as though it and the child it had swallowed no longer existed.

No one ever discovered what happened to those who disappeared and neither the screens nor the servomechanisms offered any explanation. Jon's companions couldn't find any physical evidence pointing to the exact location of the pitfalls; they seemed to be completely camouflaged and scattered at random all over the Maze, so there was no way in which to avoid them. There were all sorts of guesses, but no one really knew, and it was better not to think too much about it. The important thing was to realize the danger existed and could confront one at any time. For not learning, for being unable to learn, for being too sick or too weak or too helpless to learn—pulling the switch was the punishment.

But learning brought rewards. Because now, once again, another doorway appeared leading to an area beyond. Peering through it, Jon could see a new vista of the Maze, expanded and elaborate, filled with evidence of exciting activity.

The screens told him about that activity—about males and females and the pleasure of their relationships. The responses of his own body affirmed the truth of what he was told. Jon and his companions were anxious to enter that next section; enter into its activities, enter into its females. But when they attempted to move through, an invisible barrier prevented their progress.

Not yet, said the voices from the screens. You must learn more before you're ready.

Impatiently, Jon and the others looked and listened, but their inner awareness was concentrated on the delights beyond the doorway. From time to time someone would desert his learning post and steal away toward the other chamber, but always a servo-mechanism barred his path and uttered a warning. If ignored, the mechanism pulled its switch and the heedless one dropped down to disappear.

But there were moments when Jon and his fellows were unobserved and then they would steal up to the opening to stare at the scene beyond and to test the invisible force-field of the barrier.

Eventually they grew stronger or the barrier became weaker; finally, one by one, they broke through. And there, in the next segment of the Maze, Jon and the others found their females. Pairing off, they sought still larger cubicles to share with their partners and the pattern of existence changed.

Jon's partner was called Ava; it was she who now prepared the food left by the servo-mechanisms who ministered to the needs of this section. At first Jon was not too greatly interested in food, but as time passed and the novelty of physical contact waned, nourishment and comfort became more important again.

Once more Jon learned the pattern of rewards and punishments governing this area of the Maze. Food was distributed only to those who were willing to spend time watching the screens. Since Ava seemed completely absorbed in the day-to-day routine of life within their cubicle, Jon was forced to appear regularly before a screen as further lessons in living were presented.

The images were quite diversified and complex now; there were scenes of full-grown adults engaging in a great variety of activities. Some seemed to be fulltime screen-watchers, some appeared to ignore the screens and devote themselves to tests of strength with companions, rivaling them for the interest of many females besides their partners.

Jon was not tired of Ava, but he found himself studying various techniques of competition with increasing interest. It would appear that in the real world he was preparing to enter, the biggest and strongest acquired the best cubicles and the most attractive females. In addition they received the envy and admiration of their companions.

The more Jon learned the more interested he became in testing his own powers. Ava's simple responses began to bore him; she wasn't concerned with what he told her about the real world beyond and couldn't understand why he was dissatisfied to stay here forever.

But Jon was tired of the tedium of screen-watching and apprehensive about the fate of his fellows who balked. He'd seen them deprived of food by the servo-mechanisms for neglecting their daily duties. Some of those who were content to become completely absorbed in relationships with their partners had already disappeared. There seemed to be no penalty for the females; their limited interests didn't stamp them as inferior, for their previous conditioning had obviously been different. But the males were obligated to continue the learning process, and Jon knew he must comply.

Besides, a new opening had appeared in the far wall of the chamber and now he found himself moving forward to gaze into the next complex beyond.

Jon knew without being told that this must be the real world—the world for which he'd prepared to dwell in during all this period of study and growth.

What waited beyond the invisible barrier was not a simple chamber but a huge series of corridors, each with an opening which afforded a partial, tantalizing glimpse of activity within. Others like himself prowled these corridors, entering various compartments at will and exiting to move along into still other portions of the Maze. Jon could not see any screens on the corridor walls and that was good. Here men seemed to be living, not learning. They were coupling with many females, carrying huge accumulations of food and clothing from one place to another, trading and exchanging various articles, and fighting off others who attempted to take a portion for themselves without permission or barter agreements.

Jon couldn't wait to join them. And when he crowded up to the opening he found himself passing through without hindrance—and without a thought of Ava left behind him.

Ava, with her dull conversation, her duller caresses, and her swollen belly.

Once across the barrier, Jon forgot Ava completely. There was so much to see, so much to do, for this tangle of corridors stretched off endlessly in all directions, opening upon many types of rooms and rooms within rooms. But it was still a part of the Maze.

From what he'd seen on the outside, Jon had thought there would be no more screens; now he realized he was mistaken, for if anything, their numbers had increased. The difference was that there was no longer any uniformity to the images on the screens or the messages they imparted.

Pausing at a chamber doorway, Jon could hear some voices from the screens urging him to enter, promising him all sorts of rewards and describing the pleasures of participation in the activities within. Other voices, equally shrill and urgent, warned him to keep out, to seek still more distant rooms.

And the servo-mechanisms were here too, though less noticeable, for now they more closely resembled Jon's living companions. They moved naturally, their gestures less stiff and more assured, their voices ringing with confident authority. At first Jon wasn't even able to identify them as mechanisms because they were masked in faces simulating flesh; faces that smiled benevolently, grinned confidently, or frowned with stern wisdom. "Follow me," they said, and Jon joined the group obediently to be led into a bewildering array of vast, arenalike enclosures.

In one such place a leader gathered together all those with fair complexions while another leader assembled those with darker skins. And from the walls the screens screamed at both groups in turn, exciting them with alternate threats and promises, urging them to destroy their opposites.

The noise was ceaseless, the confusion incredible, and in the inevitable struggle that followed, the leaders stood aside observing. When one of Jon's companions slackened, the inevitable gesture was made—a hand went to the side of the head and one of the invisible seams opened to engulf the offender.

It was only then that Jon realized the leaders were servomechanisms, for when the switches operated, the masks sometimes slipped to one side and Jon could see the blank, featureless surface beneath, totally devoid of any semblance to humanity.

That was when Jon fought his way through the struggling throng and escaped into a corridor, only to be swept along into another area where the chief activity seemed to be the removal of metal discs affixed to the walls of the chamber.

Here the screens displayed glittering panoplies of such discs, while their voices extolled the glory of gathering them together and heaping them up into huge piles. According to the screens, great skill and intelligence were required to perform this feat, and there was no higher goal than the acquisition and arrangement of discs. As if to prove the point, large numbers of exotically dressed, youthful females prowled about inspecting the heaps and offering themselves to those who had managed to amass the largest portions.

But Jon observed that the females seldom stayed long with any one accumulator; always they seemed attracted by another collector with a still larger heap.

Jon also noted that obtaining the discs was not an easy procedure; prying them from their fastenings in the walls was a painful task that made the fingers bleed. Sometimes rival disc-gatherers fought with one another over the discovery of a fresh cluster of discs, and many times they resorted to stealing discs from the collections of their companions. Indeed, it seemed as if the most truly imposing amounts were gathered in just this way, by theft alone.

Wrenching discs free from the walls was more exhausting and a much slower process; sometimes it was necessary to stand on tiptoe for those beyond reach, or crouch to burrow at the very base of the walls. And yet there was a strange compulsive element involved; those who toiled eventually became so absorbed that they could not even be distracted by the young, nubile females, and even food and slumber seemed unimportant. Similarly, the thieves came to devote themselves solely to stealing, with equally tiring results.

And when the efforts slackened or ceased through utter exhaustion, the servo-mechanisms appeared, pushing aside their sober masks to pull the switch. Thus disc-gatherers and disc-stealers alike disappeared, leaving only a shining heap as a sole memento of existence—a heap which was immediately plundered by waiting rivals, so that even this evidence of achievement vanished.

But these were only two of the many areas which Jon discovered in the Maze. There was a shouting section—he could think of it in no other terms—in which every occupant was encouraged to drown out the voices of his fellows and reduce them to the status of listeners. Here the rivals emulated the voices from the screens, uttering promises, blandishments, flattery and exhortations, while at the same time denouncing the words of all the others in a continuous effort to attract the less articulate to support their stated purposes.

At first Jon tried to listen, but the more he heard the more confused he became. Some praised those who fought in the arena sections, some denounced them; some extolled the virtues of disc-accumulators and others derided. But in the end their voices hoarsened and failed and their audiences turned away to hear the same messages couched in slightly different phrases by younger and louder voices. And when this happened, a servo-mechanism appeared to seek out the speechless orator, deserted by all, and make the inevitable movement toward the side of the head.

In another area Jon found speakers equally dedicated to attracting followers but using softer and more persuasive tones. They spoke of the great secret of the Learning Maze, the secret which had been imparted to them as a special dispensation. Praising the voices from the screens, they explained that the commands and injunctions issuing from them were often cryptic and mysterious and had to be interpreted by speakers such as themselves in order that all might understand.

But each speaker seemed to have a different explanation of the meaning of the Maze—its creation, its purpose, and how one must conduct oneself within. And each speaker disputed the statements of his fellows, even to the minor points of words and phrases used by them, so that in the end the soft voices gave way to angry shouts, denunciations, threats of endless punishment and commands to destroy all those who refused to agree utterly and completely without question. And always the speaker would call upon the servomechanisms to punish and eliminate nonbelievers.

Some of the talk interested Jon at the beginning, for he had often tried to puzzle out the program of the Maze, but when talk gave place to outcry it became incoherent and bewildering. And Jon noted that the servomechanisms never seemed to come upon command to destroy the speakers' enemies—but when all the prayers for vengeance died, it was then that the mechanisms finally appeared to make the gesture which removed speakers and followers alike. In the end, none who stayed in this chamber were spared, whatever their beliefs.

Jon remembered a section where all occupants seemed to be engaged in an endless and complicated measurement process. Dedicated to observation, they gravely calculated the area of the room, analyzed and tabulated the components of the atmosphere within it, and even attempted to measure one another.

These observers took great pride in their efforts and loudly proclaimed their superiority to those in other sections of the Maze. Some day, they asserted, they would take their rightful place as rulers of the Maze, once they had mastered all its secrets by their methods of measurement.

What was not readily described in terms of size or mass or velocity of movement they theorized about—giving particular attention to the phenomena of the wall screens and servomechanisms and attempting to fully explain their functions and purposes. But no two theories were exactly alike and new measurements and methods of measurement constantly superseded the old, so that the end result was once again argument and anger. And with all the careful devotion to the accumulation of data and all the energy expanded in expounding theory, the room itself remained fixed and unchanged except in minor details. And its occupants never left it until one of the servo-mechanisms—its functions still unfathomable, despite all the hypotheses—made the final motion that put an end to further inquiry.

Again Jon refused to become completely involved in such activity and sought out other sections. There was a new arena where the young seemed to be pitted against the old, each denouncing the other for a greedy and self-centered attempt to take control. But as the young became older, they seemed to switch allegiance, and this confused Jon so that he was impelled to move on.

In another place, food and sex and accumulation alike appeared unimportant to the occupants. They lay in a drugged stupor, oblivious to their surroundings except for the times when the screens flickered wildly and projected flashes of unrecognizable imagery or assaulted them with screaming sounds. Occasionally a few of the group would rouse long enough to imitate what they vaguely saw or heard, painting weird squiggles upon canvas and even upon their own bodies, or plucking crude instruments to make loud noises to which they wailed accompaniment. What they sang and shouted made little sense to those who were not drugged like themselves. Eventually they relapsed into a mumbling preoccupation, gazing raptly at their own faces in tiny mirrors which distorted their features beyond recognition until they came to resemble hairy beasts. Servomechanisms moved to those sunk in the deepest stupor and their switches were swift.

Jon continued on, vaguely conscious that he was gradually coming to know the various routes and recesses of the Maze. Eventually he chanced upon a room that seemed more inviting than the others, even though the servomechanism posted at the doorway did not exhort him to enter. Perhaps it was this that attracted him, or the fact that the mechanism wore a different mask. In place of human features there was only a surface emblazoned with a symbol. Jon recognized the curlicue and dot as something he'd seen on a screen long ago—a question mark.

Intrigued, he glanced into the room of silence. A few men sat cross-legged upon the floor, gazing at screens that were utterly blank and from which issued only a faint, deep drone. The drone was somehow soothing, but those who listened did not seem drugged or sleeping, merely contemplative.

Weary of walking, weary of peering and puzzling, Jon moved into the chamber. Almost automatically he sank down and assumed the cross-legged position, staring up at a screen. For a moment it seemed that he could see into the emptiness to catch a fleeting glimpse of something beyond. And wasn't there a voice whispering within the drone?

Concentrating with all his being, Jon strained to see, to hear. But the more he tried, the less he perceived, for such exertion only made him conscious of himself.

Finally he relaxed, and then it came. Making no attempt to see, he saw. Making no effort to hear, he heard. But the vision and voice came from within, and suddenly they blended into revelation.

For the first time Jon understood the Learning Maze. Completely computerized, completely controlled, it was a reasoned reproduction of the past—mankind's past, in all its aspects, recapitulated in physical form. These were the life styles constructed by men in the real world long ago, and which they had followed to their own destruction.

Those who sought sensory stimulation to the exclusion of all else were doomed. Those who pursued power, those who concentrated upon accumulating meaningless tokens of ownership, those who fought one another over differences in appearance or belief, were destined for extinction. Preoccupation with data or theory for its own sake was self-defeating, the distortion of phenomena by means of theology, pharmacology or art was meaningless.

All activity, all inquiry, all self-scrutiny and self-indulgence had its place in the scheme of things, but only in moderation and only as means to an end. The purpose of the Maze was to teach by precept and example, to pinpoint the pitfalls endangering men in their ancestral past and their own individual futures. It illustrated the myriad facets of existence and illuminated the dangers of surrendering wholly to any one phase of behavior in its extreme. The whole man knew and experienced life as a whole, but never gave himself completely to a fraction—only to totality.

In its system of rewards and punishment, the Learning Maze eliminated the weak and unfit from among those seeking to journey through it and emerge into the real world beyond.

Even contemplation such as this could become a self-limiting and self-destructive thing; awareness was granted for a purpose—for use in actual living.

It was time now to leave the Maze, and at last Jon knew the way.

When he emerged from contemplation and left the quiet drone of the chamber he no longer hesitated. The method was so simple once one grasped it. These rooms were only blind alleys set to trap the unaware; it was the corridor itself that was important. All he had to do was concentrate upon its convolutions and follow the path to the outer portals.

There was no longer any need to pause or peer or participate—he'd experienced enough of the chambers so that his curiosity was no longer aroused by them. Now he was free to direct his footsteps toward the greater goal.

It was almost as though instinct had taken over, finding the proper route for him. Ignoring sham and semblance, he moved toward substance and reality. And he came to a point where the twisted passageways merged into a single continuous corridor leading straight upward.

Now, directly ahead of him, Jon could see the actual opening and the light beyond; not the artificial light of the caverns but the light of reality.

He hastened toward it, toiling up the steep slant with renewed resolution. There was no obstacle now, nothing to impede his progress.

A servo-mechanism loomed up before him at the very threshold, but Jon's pace didn't slacken. He pressed forward, purposeful and determined, his body weary but his voice firm with resolve.

"Let me pass," he commanded.

The mechanism stood motionless, featureless face staring, seeming to question without speaking.

Jon sensed the question, voiced his answer.

"Why? Because I've had enough of faceless authority, of artificial motivation, meaningless routine and still more meaningless change. I've learned all you can teach me here. Now I'm ready to live in the real world."

"But you have lived all your life in the real world," said the mechanism softly. "Try to understand."

Jon tried, but there wasn't much time.

Because the mechanism was already pulling the switch.

Space–Born

The probe-mission ship locked into orbit and began its sensor-scan of the planet Echo.

Seated at his post on the bridge, Mission Commander Richard Tasman, United States Navy, checked out the data processed by the technical teams of his crew. Beside him Lieutenant Ted Gilbey, his second in command, nodded approvingly.

“Looks good!” Gilbey said. “Looks very good.”

And it did.

According to the computerized data fed back through the tapes, Echo was indeed an earth-type planet, just as had been suspected. Photoscopes confirmed the presence of running water, surface soil, and abundant vegetation. The bacterial life analysis indicated nothing harmful or unfamiliar. Echo’s planetary profile was that of a miniature world—alive and unpolluted, unspoiled by the presence of man.

Then the tapes began running wild.

Tasman stared at Gilbey. Gilbey stared at Tasman. And both men turned to stare at the photoscope.

The confirming data coming in told the story, but one picture is always worth ten thousand words, even though for a moment this particular picture left them both speechless.

Clearly and unmistakably it showed the boulder-strewn hillside and what rested on the sloping surface—landing gear crumpled against the looming rocks. The scope moved in for a close shot, panning across the hull, picking up the insignia and legible lettering: U.S.S. Orion.

There on the face of a minor planet near the edge of the galaxy, unexplored and unvisited by man, was a spacecraft from earth.

Tasman took over the landing party himself, leaving Gilbey behind in command.

There were five members in the task force, counting Tasman, as the auxiliary launch settled safely on target. When the spacemen emerged from the hatch, they were less than a thousand yards from the hulk of the U.S.S. Orion on the hillside.

Even before they forced their way inside, all doubts had vanished. Weber, the chief petty officer of the party, spoke for them all. “This is it, sir. Kevin’s ship.”

Tasman shook his head grimly. “Our ship,” he said. “Kevin stole it.”

There was no answer to that, not from Weber or any of the others, because all of them knew Tasman spoke the truth.

Senior Commander Kevin Nichols, USN—veteran astronaut, hero of the space program, next in line for appointment to head the entire space project itself—had stolen the ship.

A year ago, almost to the day by earth calendar, Nichols and the Orion had vanished. No advance warning, no clearance, nothing. And no telltale traces left behind; even his wife had disappeared. It took almost six months of intensive investigation to unravel the tangle of red tape surrounding the flight, and even now there were a thousand loose ends. All the evidence added up to the fact that Kevin Nichols had moved swiftly and secretly, according to a well-prepared plan. Forged orders for a security-sealed mission had been used to get the Orion equipped and on the launching pad without a leak. One of the very latest miniaturized spacecraft, Orion required only the services of a pilot, with all flight functions self-powered, self-contained, and computer-directed. It was a top secret test model, designed for future exploration projects, and put through its trial runs by Kevin Nichols himself. So when he ordered it supplied and readied for takeoff, no one had questioned him or broken security regulations to reveal its departure.

Not until the Orion soared into space did the scandal rise in its wake—and even that was secret, hushed up by the space program itself before the news could break to the public. Then came the investigation, and the eventual discovery of Kevin's probable destination—not Echo itself, but Sector XXIII, the same area of the space chart.

It was then that Commander Tasman had been assigned to go after the missing ship and the missing man.

Tasman knew Kevin Nichols—they had been classmates at the Cape years ago—and perhaps that's why he was chosen for the mission. But knowing Kevin hadn't made the job of locating him any easier. They had touched down at a dozen points before the process of elimination zeroed them in on Echo. It was only now, months after the start of the expedition, that they had caught up with the fugitive.

Or had they?

Kevin wasn't on the ship.

Neither were its supplies and portable instruments.

"Now what?" Tasman muttered.

Weber, the CPO, suggested scouting the surrounding terrain, and it was he who discovered the cave set in the rocks.

Tasman was the first to enter, and what he found there in the dark depths brought the others to his side on the run.

Living in a cave is not an ideal existence at best, and when one's supplies are exhausted and the battery-powered light sources fail, there's nothing left but shadows—shadows looming up everywhere from the twisted tunnels which wind on down endlessly beyond the outer chamber. And when one cries out, the shadows do not answer—there is only the sound of echoes screaming through the darkness. Echo; the planet was well named.

Had Kevin Nichols thought of that while he screamed, or when he grew too weak for screaming? Had he stared at the shapeless shadows which seemed to seethe and stir in the tunnel mouths beyond?

It didn't matter now. The tunnel mouths were open, but Kevin's mouth was closed; closed and set in the grim grin of death. One look at the gaunt face and emaciated body brought one word to Weber's lips.

"Starvation."

Commander Tasman nodded without comment, then stooped to examine the other body.

For there was another body lying there, some little distance away—lying face downward, arms outstretched as though attempting to crawl toward the tunnels when death halted her.

Her.

Tasman turned the body over, staring in recognition at the wasted form.

"Kevin's wife," he murmured. "He took her with him."

Kevin took her with him, and death took them both. Here, in a remote cave on a distant planet, surrounded by shadows, the fugitives had died in darkness, and now only echoes lingered, wailing in the depths. If you listened closely, you could almost hear them now, faint and faraway.

And then they did hear the sound, all of them, and recognized it for what it was—issuing from the shadows beyond, impossibly but unmistakably.

A baby had cried.

There were problems, many problems.

The first was physical—how to transport a newborn infant back to earth on a probe-mission ship lacking the facilities and even the feeding formula necessary to sustain its fragile hold on life.

Surprisingly enough, the little one survived and even flourished on the hastily improvised diet of powdered milk and juices. The infant girl seemed to have inherited some of Kevin Nichols' toughness and tenacity as well as his features. Indeed, the resemblance was so close between father and daughter that it was decided to name her after him. They called her Keva.

It wasn't until after splashdown on earth that the other problems arose. Then Space Control took charge of Keva and inherited the dilemma she brought with her.

There was no publicity, of course, but that in itself solved nothing. Sooner or later the news would inevitably leak out. An honored and acclaimed astronaut had succeeded in violating top security, had foiled all interplanetary precautions, and had stolen the latest and most advanced spacecraft.

Waves of panic rose and spread behind the locked doors of Space Command. Top brass and top government officials floundered, engulfed in those waves, spluttering in confusion, choking in consternation.

“Do you know what this means? When the story gets out, the whole program will be discredited. Stealing a prototype ship right out from under our noses—we’re going to be the laughingstock of the world, the whole galaxy!”

Those words were shouted by a senior spokesman for the space project, and a senior spokesman for the government answered him.

“Then why not tell the truth? Tell them that we had our eye on Kevin Nichols all along, knew he was cracking up. Sure, he was next in line for the big promotion.

but he wasn’t going to make it. Not after what our investigation uncovered—the drug thing, the embezzlement of project funds. He must have realized we were going to blow the whistle on him and that’s why he got out, taking his wife with him. Let the public know what happened, that we were the victims of a conspiracy—”

“You’re crazy!” Psychiatrists usually disapprove of using such language, but it was a senior member of the psychiatric advisory staff who spoke. “We can’t afford to be laughed at, and we can’t afford to be pitied, either. Right now we can’t afford anything, period. I don’t need to remind you gentlemen that the vote on new appropriations for the entire space project is coming up next week. There couldn’t possibly be a worse time to tell the world that the largest and most important program in all history has been victimized by one man—and that the biggest hero of that program was a psychotic, a thief, and a traitor. There’s got to be another answer.”

There was.

Exactly who gave it is not known—probably some minor member of the staff. It is the fate of junior officers to come up with the right suggestion, and their reward is to be forgotten even while the suggestion is remembered.

“Keva is our answer,” said the nameless junior officer.

Everyone looked at him, everyone listened, and everyone understood.

“Don’t you realize what Nichols has done for the program? He’s given us the biggest public-relations hook anyone could wish for. His daughter, Keva. The first child ever to be born in outer space! Not on Mars or Venus or a colony, but on a new frontier, the farthermost outpost of all interplanetary exploration known to man!

“You don’t have to say that her father was flipping out, that the ship was stolen. Make the whole thing part of a top security mission, a secret program to test human survival on an earth-type world. Nichols and his wife volunteered to take the ship off to Echo and have their child there. A heroic experiment that turned into a heroic sacrifice when they emerged from the crash unharmed but unable to return or communicate with the project back on earth. Let it be known that Nichols kept a complete record of his stay on Echo, up to and including the actual birth of the infant, but that the data are still classified information. That should put an end to any further embarrassing questions about the affair. But there won’t be any trouble about the appropriation—not if you concentrate publicity where it belongs and keep it there. You’re sitting on the greatest story of all time, the greatest celebrity ever known—Keva, the spacechild!”

They didn’t sit much longer.

Within a matter of hours the well-oiled machinery of the space program’s Information Unit started to function. The wheels began to turn, and the end product of the manufacturing process appeared. Instant heroes.

Kevin Nichols, heroic astronaut who piloted an untested ship to an uncharted world. His wife, who risked her unborn baby in the unknown. The space program itself, bravely breaking through all barriers to prove, once and for all, that humanity could move forward without fear and perpetuate itself on other planets.

Nichols and his wife were dead, but the space program survived. Just as predicted, the appropriation passed.

And as for young Keva herself, she lived and thrived. Keva, the new symbol of the Age of Space. Publicized, photographed, promoted, praised; in a matter of days, her name was known throughout the solar system and beyond. Child of space, heir to the future.

And ward of the space program.

Jealously guarded, possessively protected, little Keva was withdrawn from public scrutiny shortly after she had served her primary purpose, and was placed in a private—very private—nursery. While Keva dolls and Keva toys flooded the market, and Keva songs and Keva pictures kept her image bright, the object of all this adulation was being carefully nursed and tended by a team of medical specialists. Pediatricians and psychologists alike agreed; Keva was a very special baby. Not just because of her value as a living symbol, but for what she was—exceptionally sturdy, bright, alert, healthy, and precocious.

Yet, in spite of security, rumors poured out of the nursery-laboratory where young Keva was hidden.

Standing alone at five months. Walking at seven months. Only nine months old and seems to understand everything you say to her. One year old and she’s already talking—complete sentences! Did you hear the latest about Keva? Two and a half, going on three, and they say she already is reading! Can you imagine that?

The public could imagine it very easily. As a matter of fact, they were beginning to imagine a little too much. No matter how much a genius was praised, nobody really loved one. A genius was too hard to understand. And the whole point of the plan was plain; Keva had to be loved.

So, after much consideration, Keva was placed in an exclusive private school—in first-phase classes, or what used to be called kindergarten. Good thinking, everyone said; give her a chance to grow up with other youngsters, learn to be like the rest of the kids.

But Keva wasn't like the rest of the kids. She grew faster and learned more quickly. She seemed immune to childhood diseases and she was never ill. Perhaps this was a result of the antiseptic care of the medical team, but even so it was highly unusual. The doctors took notes.

The psychologists took notes, too. Keva did not relate to her peer group—that was the way they phrased it. In plainer words, she didn't want to have anything to do with the other children. And tvhat she did not want to do she did not bother with. She read. She asked questions—intelligent, penetrating questions—and she was impatient with stupid answers.

Keva had no interest in nursery rhymes or fairy tales or bedtime stories. Facts and figures, those were the things that fascinated her. She never played with toys, and she refused to learn any games.

The other youngsters didn't understand her, and what children can't understand they usually dislike—a trait often carried over into adult life.

Two of the children never got to carry that or any other trait into adult life. They took to teasing Keva, calling her names, but only for a few days. Then they died.

One of them fell out of an upstairs window while walking in his sleep. The other went into convulsions—an epileptic seizure, the doctors decided.

Of course, Keva had nothing to do with it; she was nowhere near either of the youngsters at the time. But there was bound to be talk, so the medical team took her out of the school.

To put an end to any possible rumors, a thorough checkup was programmed for the prodigy. And prodigy she was—a beautiful, healthy child, without functional defect. The results of the battery of mental tests indicated genius.

What Keva needed, the medical team decided, was a chance to lead a normal existence, an opportunity to relate to ordinary people in ordinary surroundings. As a celebrity such a life was, of course, impossible.

So they changed her name, took her clear across the country, and put her up for adoption.

The world at large was told that Keva had been sent abroad for further education under governmental supervision. Even the couple who took her into their home didn't realize that their bright, good-looking new daughter was the famous spacechild.

To George and Elaine Rutherford, Keva was an orphan named Robin. A quiet girl but well-behaved, quick in her studies, sailing through high school and into college at fifteen. There were no problems.

At least, the security reports didn't indicate any. The space program had her under observation, of course, monitoring her progress in school.

Perhaps they should have spent more time monitoring her foster parents. As it was, they didn't seem to notice the change in Mr. and Mrs. Rutherford. Maybe the Rutherfords weren't even aware of it themselves. It wasn't anything dramatic.

But as Keva grew, they dwindled.

Keva's growth was physically apparent. At seventeen, already a senior in college, she seemed completely mature—enough of an adult, in fact, to enter into the management of her foster father's prosperous ranch during the summer months.

Rutherford, the bluff, hearty rancher with the booming voice, made no objection. It was as though he secretly welcomed the idea of taking things easy, of not having to bawl out orders, of sitting quietly on the big screened porch and rocking away. After a time people began to notice how he mumbled and muttered, talking to himself.

Elaine Rutherford didn't say anything—she gradually stopped entertaining or going out, and never saw any of their old friends. While the girl ran the ranch, she was content just to keep house and spend her spare time resting upstairs. Then she began to talk to herself, too.

It was just about a year later—after Keva had graduated and gone into advanced work in astrophysics—that the authorities came and took the Rutherfords away.

There was a hearing and the ranch hands testified. So did the girl. Everyone agreed there had been no violence, no real crisis. It was only that the Rutherfords had gone from talking to babbling, and from babbling to screaming.

Shadows were what they feared. Shadows, or a single shadow—apparently they never saw more than one at a given moment. A shadow moving at midnight in the corrals, making the cattle bellow in terror—but why should cattle be afraid of something that cannot be seen? A shadow creeping through the long dark ranch house hall, while the floorboards creaked—but how can there be sound without substance? A shadow glimpsed in the girl's room, stretched sleeping in the bed where the girl should be—but shadows do not sleep, and the girl testified she had seen nothing.

It was a sad affair, and the ending was inevitable. The Rutherfords were obviously incompetent and they had to be committed. Both of them died within a matter of months.

The space program people stayed out of the affair, of course; at least, they didn't interfere publicly. But they followed the hearing and they had the data and they took charge of Keva once more.

Taking charge was a mere formality now, for they weren't dealing with a child any longer. Keva was physically adult and mentally she was—

Worthy of further study.

That's what the medical team decided.

Keva was happy to cooperate, even though it meant temporarily abandoning her research project on methods of communicating with distant planetary bodies through the use of ultrasonic frequencies.

On the appointed day she appeared before an international panel of scientific authorities at Space Command headquarters, prepared to submit to a thorough examination and checkup. But she was not prepared to meet the head of that panel—an elderly, stoop-shouldered man who was introduced to her as Mission Commander Richard Tasman, USN, Ret.

The foreign scientists noted that Keva didn’t seem to react to the introduction. Perhaps she didn’t recognize the name, but, of course, there was no reason that she should.

At least, there was no reason until Tasman began asking questions. The questions were polite, formally phrased, and simple. But their content was disturbing.

Tasman wanted Keva to tell him about the shadows.

Keva frowned, and then sighed. “Surely you’ve read the reports of the hearing. The shadows my poor foster parents claim to have seen were nonexistent—paranoid delusions—”

Commander Tasman nodded. “But it’s the other shadows I’m interested in. The shadows that I saw with my own eyes twenty years ago when I found you in that cave on Echo.”

The listening scientists leaned forward as Keva shook her head. They turned up the earphones to hear what their translators were reporting as the conversation continued.

Keva shrugged. “I was a baby. How do you expect me to remember anything? And if I could, why should I notice shadows?”

“Why, indeed?” Tasman smiled. “I saw them plainly enough but at the time I had no reason to pay attention to them. Now I’m not so sure.”

“What do you mean?”

Tasman smiled again. “I’m not so sure of that, either. In fact, I’m not sure of anything anymore. It occurs to me that we should have followed up our findings on Echo. Somehow, in all the excitement of your discovery and rescue, certain unusual bits of data were neglected. An earth-type planet exists within a certain range of prescribed conditions—this we know because we’ve located and studied others within the galaxy. Like Echo, they all contain life-forms. Microorganisms, algae, plant life in infinite variety. And all of them, in this phase of evolution, contain animal life, too. All except Echo.”

Tasman fixed his eyes on Leva. “I understand you have a background in space research.”

“Em only a novice—”

“But you have studied available information?”

“Yes.”

“Then let me ask this: doesn’t it seem strange to you that Echo, and Echo alone, is the only earth-type body ever discovered that is capable of supporting higher and more complicated life-forms, yet contains none?”

“Perhaps there were such forms at one time, and they failed to survive.”

“For what reason? There’s no indication of natural disaster or recent geologic upheaval.”

“Maybe the evolutionary cycle came to a natural end. Whatever might have existed there merely died out,” Keva said.

“Suppose it didn’t die out? Suppose it merely developed along different lines, advanced to a point where life was no longer dependent upon a physical body of the type we’re familiar with.”

“You mean something like pure thought?” It was Keva’s turn to smile.

Tasman shook his head and he wasn’t smiling. “Something like shadows,” he said.

Keva stared. They were all staring now.

“Shadows,” Tasman repeated. “Consider a life-form that may once have been human like ourselves—very much like ourselves in many ways—but had reached a turning point in the evolutionary road. Instead of continuing to evolve in terms of brawn, the emphasis became spiritual.”

“Pure thought again?” Keva gestured. “Impossible.”

“Of course, it’s impossible,” Tasman said. “Life is energy, and energy has form. But on Echo, which seems to have existed for countless years in an idyllic state, there was no need for a sturdy body to withstand the elements. And who knows—upon reaching a certain stage of mental development, there may no longer be any dependency upon ordinary nourishment.”

“You’re saying these creatures turned into shadows?”

“Creatures? Hardly the term I’d use to describe so advanced an organism. As for shadows, how do we know what they really are? Possibly what we saw as shadows are merely visual projections of mental energy contained in the minimum possible shape. A shape that no longer requires sensory organs for perception or communication. A shape that doesn't need the complex of mechanical aids we call civilization, that can live without our concept of comfort and shelter—"

"In caves?"

Keva rose as she spoke, and faced the assemblage around the long table. She talked and the others listened. Exactly what she said is a matter of debate—afterward, opinions seemed to differ. But her words made sense, and everyone got the point.

Carefully, courteously, but concisely, she took Tasman's theories apart, demolishing each premise in turn. There was no precedent, not in biology or physics or the most advanced observations of science, for sentient shadows. One might as well argue the reality of ghosts. A shadow, by definition, is merely a shade cast upon a surface by a body that intercepts rays of light. It is the body that exists. Shadows are merely illusions—like the apparitions Keva's foster parents had babbled about, or like Commander Tasman's strange beliefs.

The speech was effective. And after Tasman, cold but controlled, excused Keva from the hearing and had her escorted from the room, there was a general buzz of conversation from the scientists gathered there.

Obviously they were impressed by what they had heard. They were even more impressed when an apologetic sound engineer buzzed the chamber on intercom to report the sudden power failure that had cut off the mikes and had made translation of Keva's speech impossible.

"Amazing, the young woman!" The Italian scientist groped for words in his heavily accented English. "Such presence, to realize this—and continue speaking in Italian."

"Nein." The guttural rejoinder came swiftly. "It was in German she spoke."

"Français!"

Dissension rose in Japanese, Russian, Spanish, and Mandarin. All had heard Keva and all had understood.

Tasman understood, too.

He raced out the door and down the corridor. At the entrance to a small side office he found Keva's security guards stationed and waiting.

"Keva—where is she?"

The senior officer blinked and gestured. "Inside."

Tasman brushed past him and opened the door.

The room beyond had no windows, no other exit.

But it was empty.

There was no official report of Keva's disappearance. Even the medical team wasn't informed. But Tasman knew, and went straight to Top Security. A directive was issued.

Find Keva.

"She's bound to slip up," Tasman said. "What happened at the hearing proves she's not infallible. When the mikes went dead she unconsciously continued to communicate by means of direct-thought transmission. That explains why each foreign delegate believed he was hearing Keva speak to him in his own language. When Keva realized she was giving herself away, it was too late. She had to flee."

The security officers nodded uneasily. How do you find a person who can transmit thoughts at will, hypnotize guards, and pass them by without being seen or remembered?

"If she made one mistake she'll make others," Tasman assured them.

But Tasman himself didn't wait for mistakes. While security personnel searched for Keva in the present, Tasman sought her in the past. He talked to people who had known her at the ranch, to schoolmates, to the surviving members of the original relief mission, men such as Gilbey and Weber. What he learned he kept to himself, but the word spread.

Eventually, it reached back to a man who had known Keva's true parents.

Dr. Hans Diedrich, living in retirement in the Virgin Islands, contacted Space Command with an urgent message. He had, he said, certain information which might be of vital importance in this affair.

Within twenty-four hours Diedrich was visited at his cottage home by an elderly, stoop-shouldered man who identified himself as Mission Commander Richard Tasman, USN, Ret.

"I'm glad you came," Diedrich said. "I have followed the reports with great interest—my nephew is in the space program and it was he who informed me of what happened."

His visitor frowned. "A security leak?"

"Do not be alarmed. It is for the best that I was told, and in a moment you will understand why I say that. You see, I know what you are thinking."

"You do?"

Diedrich frowned. "You have a theory, haven't you? That Kevin Nichols' child was left alone in that cave on Echo when her parents died, left alone with the shadow creatures. And that somehow, before your relief expedition arrived, these beings took possession of her, so that when she was rescued she was no longer an ordinary infant but something more. Because they infused her with their powers, established a mental contact, a link with themselves which was not broken when she returned to earth. And that all through her childhood and youth, she was really acting as their pawn. A human being under alien control. Is that it?"

His visitor nodded.

"Well, you are wrong," said Dr. Diedrich. "I was the Nichols' family physician. I have their medical records. Two years before the journey to Echo, I had to perform surgery on Mrs. Nichols."

"So?"

"That is what I wanted to tell you. The surgery made it impossible for Mrs. Nichols to have a child. The infant you found in the cave was not their daughter."

Dr. Diedrich leaned forward. "These beings must have the power to receive thoughts as well as to transmit them. They absorbed the contents of Nichols' mind as he lay dying in the cave—his wife's mind, too. And using what they learned, they created the illusion of an infant, one of their own kind disguised in a mental projection, programmed to live and grow as a child."

"Why send it back to earth?"

Diedrich shrugged. "I cannot say."

"And you have no proof."

"Only of the surgery. Here, my own medical records—"

He handed a bulky envelope to his visitor.

His visitor smiled, thanked him, pulled out a revolver, and shot Dr. Diedrich through the head.

"I told you she'd make a mistake," Tasman muttered.

"Going down there, getting the information, then deliberately using a clumsy, old-fashioned weapon to kill Diedrich—it was a clever idea. And there are half a dozen people who can testify to seeing me escape from the cottage.

"Fortunately, you know I was here at headquarters all the time. Keva didn't anticipate I'd have such an airtight alibi. And she didn't anticipate that Diedrich had taken the precaution of taping a statement of his beliefs beforehand and sending it here to Space Command. So, we understand how all this happened—and why."

"We know something else now, too." The Chief of Operations himself answered Tasman, and his voice was grim. "The life-form we're dealing with has greater powers than we imagined. The ability to transmit thought and to receive it. The ability to appear in the form we identify as Keva, or to change that form at will.

"Do you realize what we're up against? A creature that can read our minds, walk unseen among us as a shadow, and alter its appearance whenever it chooses."

“Mimicry,” Tasman said. “Insects use it for protection, taking on the look of the plant or tree branch where they rest. The being we know as Keva has this same faculty, developed to its ultimate extent.”

The Chief of Operations frowned. “Then why did it even bother to appear as Keva in the first place?”

“Again we can look to the insect world for a parallel,” Tasman said. “Some insects begin in a larval state. It’s only later that they emerge in new forms, with the power of disguising their shapes. Perhaps it was necessary for Keva to go through certain stages in a single body while she grew to maturity and learned our ways. Only now, as an adult, is she capable of functioning fully.”

“And just what is her function? Why did a shadow creature come to earth in human disguise?”

Tasman shrugged. “Maybe the shadows grew tired of being shadows. Perhaps an existence of pure thought was no longer enough for them and they yearned for the sensations and satisfactions of solid physical shapes. In which case Keva was sent here as a scout, to study our ways and see if we could be taken over.”

The Chief of Operations shook his head. “You think that is a possibility?”

“I think that is what actually happened.”

“Then what do you propose?”

“Another expedition to Echo. Give me the command, and a task force. Keep it under sealed orders, call it an exploratory operation if you like. But you and I know the real purpose of the mission.”

“Seek and destroy?”

Tasman nodded. “It’s our only chance. And we’ve got to move fast, before Keva suspects.”

Commander Tasman lifted off for Echo under top security, but that didn’t stop the rumors.

Whether or not Keva suspected was no longer the problem. The search for her went on, but how do you find a shadow? It could be anywhere now.

It was the spread of the rumors that really caused the trouble—and the panic.

Somehow the word was out, and the world trembled. People had forgotten about the spacechild through the years, but now they remembered as the whispers grew.

There was a monster in our midst, the rumormongers said. An alien unlike any humanoid form on planets known to man—an invisible creature, murdering at will. True, a mission had been mounted against Echo, but it would never return.

The whispers rose to angry shouts, and there was only one way to silence them.

The President of the United States went on Emergency Band and addressed the world. Standing before the cameras and microphones in the tower at Communications Center, he delivered his message.

The rumors were partially true, the President admitted. The spacechild was indeed an alien, but there was no longer any reason to fear her. Because Keva was dead. She had been discovered and trapped only this afternoon in a secret hideaway—a mountain cave near Pocatello, Idaho. Full details would be available on an international newscast following the President's message.

Meanwhile, it was time to put an end to the vicious falsehoods spread by our enemies, the President declared. All this wild talk of alien invasion was part of a plot, designed to prevent the opening up of free space travel and communication—but the plot had failed. After all, Commander Tasman had been sent into space for exploratory purposes and had not encountered any resistance.

It was his privilege, the President said, to announce the final expansion of the space program. From this time forward there would be no restrictions on further flights. Every area of the galaxy was now officially declared to be open to the ships of any government or any private concern or individual. No more secrecy, no more security, no more fear. If new alien life-forms were encountered, they would be met with friendship. If they chose to visit our solar system or even our own earth, let them be welcomed. For this was the start of the true Age of Space—founded firmly in freedom and in friendship.

The world listened to its leader and breathed a collective sigh of relief.

The President joined in that sigh as the broadcast ended. He watched the technical crews gather up their equipment and depart, leaving him alone in the tower room with its single window opening on the night sky and the stars.

Then the President of the United States melted into a shadow and slithered across the floor to the window, as she waited for her alien brothers to arrive.

See How They Run

The phrase "crime story" means something different to Robert Block—something different from what it means to every other writer of crime stories. You'll see what we mean when you read "See How They Run". . .

We've often wondered: has Robert Block ever written a story that doesn't have sometking special about it? . . .

April 2nd

Okay, Doc, you win.

I'll keep my promise and make regular entries, but damned if I'll start out with a heading like Dear Diary. Or Dear Doctor, either. You want me to tell it like it is? Okay, but the way it is right now, Doc, beware. If you've got any ideas about wading in my stream of consciousness, just watch out for the alligators.

I know what you're thinking. "Here's a professional writer who claims he has a writer's block. Get him to keep a diary and he'll be writing in spite of himself. Then he'll see how wrong he is." Right, Doc? Write, Doc?

Only that's not my real problem. My hangup is the exact opposite—antithetical, if you're looking for something fancy. Logorrhea. Verbosity. Two-bit words from a dime-a-dozen writer? But that's what they always say at the studio: writers are a dime a dozen.

Okay, so here's your dime. Run out and buy me a dozen writers. Let's see—I'll have two Hemingways, one Thomas Wolfe, a James Joyce, a couple of Homers if they're fresh, and six William Shakespeares.

I almost said it to Gerber when he dropped me from the show. But what's the use? Those producers have only one idea. They point at the parking lot and say, "I'm driving the Caddy and you're driving the Volks." Sure. If you're so smart, why aren't you rich?

Call it a rationalization if you like. You shrinks are great at pinning labels on everything. Pin the tail on the donkey, that's the name of the game, and the patient is always the jackass. Pardon me, it's not "patient," it's "analysand." For fifty bucks an hour you can afford to dream up a fancy word. And for fifty bucks an hour I can't afford not to word up some fancy dreams.

If that's what you want from me, forget it. There are no dreams. Not any more. Once upon a time (as we writers say) there was a dream. A dream about coming out to Hollywood and cracking the television market. Write for comedy shows, make big money in your spare time this new easy way, buy a fancy pad with a big swimming pool, and live it up until you settle down with a cute little chick.

Dreams are nothing to worry about. It's only when they come true that you've got trouble. Then you find out that the comedy isn't funny any more, the big money disappears, and the swimming pool turns into a stream of consciousness. Even a cute little chick like Jean changes to something else. It's not a dream any more, it's a nightmare, and it's real.

There's a problem for you, Doc. Cure me of reality.

April 5th

A little-known historical fact. Shortly after being wounded in Peru, Pizarro, always a master of understatement, wrote that he was Incapacitated.

Damn it, Doc, I say it's funny! I don't buy your theory about puns being a form of oral aggression. Because I'm not the aggressive type.

Hostile, yes. Why shouldn't I be? Fired off the show after three seasons of sweating blood for Gerber and that lousy no-talent comic of his. Lou Lane couldn't get a job as M.C. in a laundromat until I started writing his material and now he's Mr. Neilsen himself, to hear him tell it.

But that's not going to trigger me into doing anything foolish. I don't have to. One season without me and he'll be back where he belongs—a parking attendant in a Drive-In Mortuary. Curb Service. We Pick Up and Deliver. Ha, ha.

Gerber gave me the same pitch; my stuff is getting sour. We don't want black comedy. It's nasty, and this is a family-type show. Okay, so maybe it was my way of releasing tension, getting it out of my system—catharsis, isn't that the term? And it made me come on a little too strong. Which is where you get into the act. Blow my mind for me, put me back on the track, and I'll get myself another assignment and make the family-type funnies again.

Meanwhile, no problems. Jean is bringing in the bread. I never figured it that way when we got married. At first I thought her singing was a gag and I went along with it. Let the voice coach keep her busy while I was working on the show—give her something to do for a hobby. Even when she took the first few club dates it was still Amateur Night as far as I was concerned. But then they hit her with the recording contract, and after the singles came the album, etc. My little chick turned into a canary.

Funny about Jean. Such a nothing when I met her. Very good in the looks department but aside from that, nothing. It's the singing that made the difference. Finding her voice was like finding herself. All of a sudden, confidence.

Of course I'm proud of her but it still shakes me up a little. The way she takes over, like insisting I see a psychiatrist. Not that I'm hacked about it, I know she's only doing it for my own good, but it's hard to get used to. Like last night at the Guild screening, her agent introduced us to some friends of his—"I want you meet Jean Norman and her husband."

Second billing. That's not for me, Doc. I'm a big boy now. The last thing I need is an identity crisis, right? And as long as we're playing true confessions, I might as well admit Jean has one point—I've been hitting the bottle a little too hard lately, since I got canned.

I didn't mention it at our last session, but this is the main reason she made me come to you. She says alcohol is my security blanket. Maybe taking it away would fix things. Or would it?

One man's security blanket is another man's shroud.

April 7th

You stupid jerk. What do you mean, alcoholism is only a symptom?

First of all, I'm not an alcoholic. Sure I drink, maybe drink a lot, everybody drinks in this business. It's either that or pot or hard drugs and I'm not going to freak out and mess up my life. But you've got to have something to keep your head together and just because I belt a few doesn't mean I'm an alcoholic.

But for the sake of argument, suppose it does? You call it a symptom. A symptom of what?

Suppose you tell me that little thing. Sitting back in that overstuffed chair with your hands folded on your overstuffed gut and letting me do all the talking—let's hear you spill something for a change. What is it you suspect, Mr. Judge, Mr. Jury, Mr. Prosecuting Attorney, Mr. Executioner? What's the charge—heterosexuality in the first degree?

I'm not asking for sympathy. I get plenty of that from Jean. Too much. I'm up to here on the oh-you-poor-baby routine. I don't want tolerance or understanding or any of that phony jive. Just give me a few facts for a change. I'm tired of Jean playing Mommy and I'm tired of you playing Big Daddy. What I want is some real help, you've got to help me help me please please help me.

April 9th

Two resolutions.

Number one, I'm not going to drink any more. I'm quitting as of now, flat-out. I was stoned when I wrote that last entry and all I had to do was read it today when I'm sober to see what I've been doing to myself. So no more drinking. Not now or ever.

Number two. From now on I'm not showing this to Dr. Moss. I'll cooperate with him completely during therapy sessions but that's it. There's such a thing as invasion of privacy. And after what happened today I'm not going to lay myself wide open again. Particularly without an anesthetic, and I've just given that up.

If I keep on writing everything down it will be for my own information, a matter of personal record. Of course I won't tell him that. He'd come up with some fancy psychiatric zinger, meaning I'm talking to myself. I've got it figured out—the shrinks are all authority figures and they use their labels as putdowns. Who needs it?

All I need is to keep track of what's happening, when things start to get confused. Like they did at the session today.

First of all, this hypnotherapy bit.

As long as this is just between me and myself I'll admit the whole idea of being hypnotized always scared me. And if I had any suspicion the old creep was trying to put me under I'd have cut out of there in two seconds flat.

But he caught me off guard. I was on the couch and supposed to say whatever came into my head. Only I drew a blank, couldn't think of anything. Emotional exhaustion, he said, and turned down the lights. Why not close my eyes and relax? Not go to sleep, just daydream a little. Daydreams are sometimes more important than those that come in sleep. In fact he didn't want me to fall asleep, so if I'd concentrate on his voice and let everything hang loose—

He got to me. I didn't feel I was losing control, no panic, I knew where I was and everything, but he got to me. He must have, because he kept talking about memory. How memory is our own personal form of time travel, a vehicle to carry us back, way back to earliest childhood, didn't I agree? And I said yes, it can carry us back, carry me back, back to old Virginny.

Then I started to hum something I hadn't thought about in years. And he said what's that, it sounds like a nursery rhyme, and I said that's right, Doc, don't you know it, Three Blind Mice.

Why don't you sing the words for me, he said. So I started.

Three blind mice, three blind mice,
See how they run, see how they run!
They all ran after the farmer's wife,
Did you ever see such a sight in your life
As three blind mice, three blind mice?

"Very nice," he said. "But didn't you leave out a line?"

"What line?" I said. All at once, for no reason at all, I could feel myself getting very uptight. "That's the song. My old lady sang that to me when I was a baby. I wouldn't forget a thing like that. What line?"

He started to sing it to me.

They all ran after the farmer's wife.
She cut off their heads with a carving knife.

Then it happened.

It wasn't like remembering. It was happening. Right now, all over again.

Late at night. Cold. Wind blowing. I wake up. I want a drink of water. Everyone asleep. Dark. I go into the kitchen.

Then I hear the noise. Like a tapping on the floor. It scares me. I turn on the light and I see it. In the corner behind the door. The trap. Something moving in it. All gray and furry and flopping up and down.

The mouse. Its paw is caught in the trap and it can't get loose. Maybe I can help. I pick up the trap and push the spring back. I hold the mouse. It wiggles and squeaks and that scares me more. I don't want to hurt it, just put it outside so it can run away. But it wiggles and squeaks and then it bites me.

When I see the blood on my finger I'm not scared any more. I get mad. All I want to do is help and it bites me. Dirty little thing. Squeaking at me with its eyes shut. Blind. Three Blind Mice. Farmer's Wife.

There. On the sink. The carving knife.

It tries to bite me again. I'll fix it. I take the knife. And I cut, I drop the knife, and I start to scream.

I was screaming again, thirty years later, and I opened my eyes and there I was in Dr. Moss's office, bawling like a kid.

"How old were you?" Dr. Moss said.

"Seven."

It just popped out. I hadn't remembered how old I was, hadn't remembered what happened—it was all blacked out of my mind, just like the line in the nursery rhyme.

But I remember now. I remember everything. My old lady finding the mouse head in the trash can and then beating the hell out of me. I think that's what made me sick, not the bite, even though the doctor who came and gave me the shot said it was infection that caused the fever. I was laid up in bed for two weeks. When I'd wake up screaming from the nightmares, my old lady used to come in and hold me and tell me how sorry she was. She always told me how sorry she was—after she did something to me.

I guess that's when I really started to hate her. No wonder I built so many of Lou Lane's routines on mother and mother-in-law gags. Oral aggression? Could be. All these years and I never knew it, never realized how I hated her. I still hate her now, hate her—

What I need is a drink.

April 23rd

Two weeks since I wrote the last entry. I told Dr. Moss I quit keeping a diary and he believed me. I told Dr. Moss a lot of things besides that, and whether he believed me or not I don't know. Not that I care one way or the other. I don't believe everything he tells me either.

Hebephrenic schizophrenia. Now there's a real grabber.

Meaning certain personality types, confronted with a stress situation they can't handle, revert to childhood or infantile behavior levels.

I looked it up the other day after I got a peek at Moss's notes, but if that's what he thinks, then he's the one who's flipped.

Dr. Moss has a thing about words like flipped, nuts, crazy. Mental disturbance, that's his speed.

That and regression. He's hung up on regression. No more hypnosis—I told him that was out, absolutely—and he got the message. But he uses other techniques like free association, and they seem to work. What really happens is that I talk myself into remembering, talk my way back into the past.

I've come up with some weirdies. Like not drinking a glass of milk until I was five years old—my old lady let me drink that formula stuff out of the bottle and there was a big hassle over it when I went to kindergarten and wouldn't touch my milk any other way. Then she clouted me one and said I made her ashamed when she had to explain to the teacher, and she took the bottle away. But it was her fault in the first place. I'm beginning to understand why I hated her.

My old man wasn't any prize, either. Whenever we had company over for dinner he'd come out with things I'd said to him, all the dumb kid stuff you say when you don't know any better, and everybody would laugh. Hard to realize kids get embarrassed, too, until you remember the way it was. The old man kept needling me to make stupid cracks just so he could take bows for repeating them to his buddies. No wonder you forget things like that—it hurts too much to remember.

It still hurts.

Of course there were good memories, too. When you're a kid, most of the time you don't give a damn about anything, you don't worry about the future, you don't even understand the real meaning of things like pain and death—and that's worth remembering.

I always seem to start out that way in our sessions but then Moss steers me into the other stuff. Catharsis, he says, it's good for you. Let it all hang out. Okay, I'm cooperating, but when we finish up with one of those children's hours I'm ready to go home and have a nice, big drink.

Jean is starting to bug me about it again. We had another hassle last night when she came home from the club date. Singing, that's all she's really interested in nowadays, never has any time for me.

Okay, so that's her business, why doesn't she mind it and let me alone? So I was stoned, so what? I tried to tell her about the therapy, how I was hurting and how a drink helped. "Why don't you grow up?" she said. "A little pain never hurt anyone."

Sometimes I think they're all crazy.

April 25th

They're crazy, all right.

Jean calling Dr. Moss and telling him I was back on the bottle again.

"On the bottle," I said, when he told me about it. "What kind of talk is that? You'd think she was my mother and I was her baby."

"Isn't that what you think?" Moss said.

I just looked at him. I didn't know what to say. This was one time when he did all the talking.

He started out very quietly, about how he'd hoped therapy would help us make certain discoveries together. And over a period of time I'd begin to understand the meaning of the pattern I'd established in my life. Only it hadn't seemed to work out that way, and while as a general thing he didn't care to run the risk of inducing psychic trauma, in this case it seemed indicated that he clarify the situation for me.

That part I can remember, almost word for word, because it made sense. But what he told me after that is all mixed up.

Like saying I have an oral fixation on the bottle because it represents the formula bottle my mother took away from me when I was a kid. And the reason I got into comedy writing was to reproduce the situation where my father used to tell people all my funny remarks—because even if they laughed it meant I was getting attention, and I wanted attention. But at the same time I resented my father taking the credit for amusing them, just like I resented Lou Lane making it big because of what I wrote for him. That's why I blew the job, writing material he couldn't use. I wanted him to use it and bomb out, because I hated him. Lou Lane had become a father image and I hated my father.

I remember looking at Dr. Moss and thinking he has to be crazy. Only a crazy shrink could come up with things like that.

He was really wild. Talking about my old lady. How I hated her so much when I was a kid I had to displace my feelings—transfer them to something else so I wouldn't feel so guilty about it.

Like the time I got up for a drink of water. I really wanted my bottle back, but my mother wouldn't give it to me. And maybe the bottle was a symbol of something she gave my father. Hearing them was what really woke me up and I hated her for that most of all.

Then I went into the kitchen and saw the mouse. The mouse reminded me of the nursery rhyme and the nursery rhyme reminded me of my mother. I took the knife, but I didn't want to kill the mouse. In my mind I was really killing my mother—

That's when I hit him. Right in his dirty mouth.

Nobody talks about my mother that way.

Apr 29

Better this way. Don't need Moss. Don't need therapy. Do it myself.

Been doing it. Regression. Take a little drink, take a little trip. Little trip down memory lane.

Not to the bad things. Good things. All the warm soft memories. The time I was in bed with the fever and mother came in with the ice cream on the tray. And my father bringing me that toy.

That's what's nice about remembering. Best thing in the world. There was a poem we used to read in school. I still remember it. "Backward, turn backward, O time in your flight, make me a child again just for tonight!" Well, no problem. A few drinks and away you go. Little oil for the old time machine.

When Jean found out about Dr. Moss she blew her stack. I had to call him up right away and apologize, she screamed.

"To hell with that," I said. "I don't need him any more. I can work this thing out for myself."

"Maybe you'll have to," Jean said.

Then she told me about Vegas. Lounge date, three weeks on the Strip. All excited because this means she's really made it—the big time. Lou Lane is playing the big room and he called her agent and told her it was all set.

"Wait a minute," I said. "Lou Lane set this up for you?"

"He's been a good friend," Jean told me. "All through this he's kept in touch, because he's worried about you. He'd be your friend, too, if you'd only let him."

Sure he would. With friends like that you don't need enemies. My eyes were opening fast. No wonder he squawked to Gerber and got me off the show. So he could move in on Jean. He had it set up, all right. The two of them, playing Vegas together. Jean in the lounge, him in the big room, and then, after the show—

For a moment there I was so shook up I couldn't see straight and I don't know what I would have done if I could. But I mean I really couldn't see straight because I started to cry. And then she was holding me and it was all right again. She'd cancel the Vegas date and stay here with me, we'd work this out together. But I had to promise her one thing—no more drinking.

I promised. The way she got to me I would have promised her anything.

So I watched her clean out the bar and then she went into town to see her agent.

It's a lie, of course. She could have picked up the phone and called him from here. So she's doing something else.

Like going straight to Lou Lane and spilling everything to him. I can just hear her. “Don’t worry, darling, I had to beg off this time or he’d get too suspicious. But what’s three weeks in Vegas when we’ve got a whole lifetime ahead of us?” And then the two of them get together—

No. I’m not going to think about it. I don’t have to think about it, there are other things, better things.

That’s why I took the bottle. The one she didn’t know about when she cleaned out the bar, the one I had stashed away in the basement.

I’m not going to worry any more. She can’t tell me what to do. Take a little drink, take a little trip. That’s all there is to it. I’m home free.

Later

She broke the bottle.

She came in and saw me and grabbed the bottle away from me and she broke it. I know she’s mad because she ran into the kitchen and slammed the door. Why the kitchen? Extension phone there.

Wonder if she’ll try to call Dr. Moss.

Aprel 30

I was a bad boy.

The Dr. come, he sed what did you do.

I sed she took the bottel away.

He saw it on the floor the knive I had to do it I sed.

He saw blood.

Like the mouse he sed.

No not a mouse. A canarry. dont look in the trash can I sed But he did.

The Learning Maze

Before I begin this story, I must tell you that I don’t believe a word of it.

If I did, I’d be just as crazy as the man who told it to me, and he’s in the asylum.

There are times, though, when I wonder. But that’s something you’ll have to decide for yourself.

About the man in the asylum—let’s call him George Milbank. Age thirty-two, according to the records, but he looked older; balding, running to fat, with a reedy voice and a facial tic that made me a little uptight watching him. But he didn’t act or sound like a weirdo.

“And I’m not,” he said, as we sat there in his room on the afternoon of my visit. “That’s why Dr. Stern wanted you to see me, isn’t it?”

“What do you mean?” I was playing it cool.

“Doc told me who you were, and I know the kind of stuff you write. If you’re looking for material—”

“I didn’t say that.”

“Don’t worry, I’m glad to talk to you. I’ve been wanting to talk to someone for a long time. Someone who’ll do more than just put down what I say in a case history and file it away. They’ve got me filed away now and they’re never going to let me out of here, but somebody should know the truth. I don’t care if you write it up as a story, just so you don’t make it long.

Before I begin this story, I must tell you that I don’t believe a word of it.

If I did, I’d be just as crazy as the man who told it to me, and he’s in the asylum.

There are times, though, when I wonder. But that's something you'll have to decide for yourself.

About the man in the asylum—let's call him George Milbank. Age thirty-two, according to the records, but he looked older; balding, running to fat, with a reedy voice and a facial tic that made me a little uptight watching him. But he didn't act or sound like a weirdo.

"And I'm not," he said, as we sat there in his room on the afternoon of my visit. "That's why Dr. Stern wanted you to see me, isn't it?"

"What do you mean?" I was playing it cool.

"Doc told me who you were, and I know the kind of stuff you write. If you're looking for material—"

"I didn't say that."

"Don't worry, I'm glad to talk to you. I've been wanting to talk to someone for a long time. Someone who'll do more than just put down what I say in a case history and file it away. They've got me filed away now and they're never going to let me out of here, but somebody should know the truth. I don't care if you write it up as a story, just so you don't make me out bananas. Because I'm going to tell it like it is, so help me God. If there is a God. That's what worries me—I mean, what kind of a God would create someone like Vilma?"

That's when I became conscious of his facial tic, and it disturbed me. He noticed my reaction and shook his head. "Don't take my word for it," he said. "Just look at the women in the magazine ads. High-fashion models, you know the type? Tall, thin, all arms and legs, with no bust. And those high cheekbones, the big eyes, the face frozen in that snotty don't-touch-me-look.

"I guess that's what got to me. Just as it was supposed to. I took Vilma's look as a challenge." His face twitched again.

"You don't like women, do you?" I said.

"You're putting me on." For the first and only time he grinned. "Man, you're talking to one of the biggest womanizers in the business!" Then the grin faded. "At least I was, until I met Vilma.

"It all came together on a cruise ship—the Morland, one of those big new Scandinavian jobs built for the Caribbean package tours. Nine ports in two weeks, conducted shore trips to all the exotic native clipjoints.

"But I was aboard for business not pleasure. McKay-Phipps, the ad agency I worked for, pitched Apex Camera a campaign featuring full-page color spreads in the fashion magazines. You know the setup—big, arty shots of a model posed against tropical resort backgrounds with just a few lines of snob-appeal copy below. She travels in style. Her outfit—a Countess D'Or original. Her camera—an Apex. That kind of crud, right?

"Okay, it was their money and who the hell am I to say how they throw it around? Besides, it wasn't even one of my accounts. But Ben Sanders, the exec who handled it, went down the tube with a heart attack just three days before sailing, and I got nailed for the assignment.

"I didn't know diddly about the high-fashion rag business or cameras either, but no problem. The D'Or people sent along Pat Grigsby, their top design consultant, to take charge of the wardrobe end. And I had Smitty Lane handling the actual shooting. He's one of the best in the business, and he got everything lined up before we left—worked out a complete schedule of what shots we'd take and where, checked out times and locations, wired ahead for clearances and firmed-up the arrangements. All I had to do was come along for the ride and see that everyone showed up at the right place at the right time.

"So on the face of it I was home free. Or away from home free. There are worse things than two weeks on a West Indies cruise in February with all expenses paid. The ship was brand new, with a dozen top-deck staterooms, and they'd booked one for each of us. None of those converted broom-closet cabins, and if we wanted we could have our meals served in and skip the first-sitting hassle in the dining room.

"But you don't give a damn about my vacation, and neither did I. Because it turned out to be a real downer.

"Like I said, the Morland hit nine ports in two weeks, and we were scheduled to do our thing in every one of them. Smitty wanted to shoot with natural light, so that meant we had to be on location and ready for action by 11 a.m. Since most of the spots he'd picked out were resorts halfway across the various islands, we had to haul out of the sack before seven, grab a fast continental breakfast, and drag all the wardrobe and equipment onto a chartered bus by eight. You ever ride a 1959 VW minibus over a stretch of rough back country road in steambath temperatures and humidity? It's the original bad trip.

"Then there was the business of setting up. Smitty was good but a real nitpicker, you know? And by the time Pat Grigsby was satisfied with the looks of the outfits and the way they lined up in the viewfinder and we got all those extra-protection shots, it was generally two o'clock. We had our pics but no lunch. So off we'd go, laughing and scratching, in the VW that had been baking in the sun all day, and if we boarded the ship again by four-thirty we were just in time for Afternoon Bingo.

"About the rest of the cruise, I've got good news and bad news.

"First the bad news. Smitty didn't play Afternoon Bingo. He played the bar—morning, afternoon, and night. And Pat Grigsby was butch. She must have made her move with Vilma early on and gotten thanks-but-no-thanks, because by the third day out the two of them weren't speaking except in line of duty. So that left Vilma and me.

"This was the good news."

"I've already told you what those high-fashion models look like, and I guess I made it sound like a grunt from a male chauvinist pig, but that's because of what I know now. At the time, Vilma Loring was something else. One thing about models—they know how to dress, how to move, what to do with makeup and perfume. What it adds up to is poise. Poise, and what they used to call femininity. And Vilma was all female.

"Maybe Women's Lib is a good thing, but those intellectual types, psychology majors with the stringy hair and the blue-jeans always turned me off.

"Vilma turned me on just looking at her. And I looked at her a lot. The way she handled herself when we were shooting—a real pro. While the rest of us were frying and dying under the noon sun, she stayed calm, cool and collected. No sweat, not a hair out of place, never any complaints. The lady had it.

"She had it, and I wanted it. That's why I made the scene with her as often as I could, which wasn't very much on the days we were in port. She always sacked out after we got back from a location and I couldn't get her to eat with me; she liked to have meals in the stateroom so she wouldn't have to bother with clothes and make-up. Naturally that was my cue to go into the my-stateroom-or-yours routine, but she wasn't buying it. So during our working schedule I had to settle for evenings.

"You know the kind of fun and games they have on shipboard. Second-run movies for the old ladies with blue hair, dancing on a dime-size floor to the music of a combo that would make Lawrence Welk turn in his baton. And the floor shows—tap dancers, magic acts, overage vocalists direct from a two-year engagement at Caesar's Palace—in the men's room.

"So we did a lot of time together just walking the deck. With me suggesting my room for a nightcap and she giving me that it's-so-lovely-out-here-why-don't-we-look-at-the-dolphins routine.

"I got the message, but I wasn't about to scrub the mission. And on the days we spent at sea I stayed in there. I used to call Vilma every morning after breakfast and when she wasn't resting or doing her nails I lucked out. She was definitely the quiet type and dummied up whenever I asked a personal question, but she was a good listener. As long as I didn't pressure her she stayed happy. I picked up my cue from that and played the waiting game.

"She didn't want to swim? Okay, so we sat in deck chairs and watched the action at the pool. No shuffleboard or deck tennis because the sun was bad for her complexion? Right on, we'd hit the lounge for the cocktail hour, even though she didn't drink. I kept a low profile, but as time went on I had to admit it was getting to me.

"Maybe it was the cruise itself that wore me down. The atmosphere, with everybody making out. Not just the couples, married or otherwise; there was plenty going for singles, too. Secretaries and schoolteachers who'd saved up for the annual orgy, getting it all together with used-car salesmen and post-graduate beach bums. Divorcees with silicone implants and new dye jobs were balling the gray-sideburn types who checked out Dow-Jones every morning before they went ashore. By the second week, even the little old ladies with the blue hair had paired off with the young stewards who'd hired on for stud duty. The final leg, two days at sea from Puerto Rico to Miami, was like something out of a porno flick, with everybody getting it on. Everybody but me, sitting there watching with a newspaper over my lap.

"That's when I had a little Dear Abby talk with myself. Here I was, wasting my time with an entry who wouldn't dance, wouldn't drink, wouldn't even have dinner with me. She wasn't playing it cool, she was playing it frigid.

"Okay, she was maybe the most beautiful broad I've ever laid eyes on, but you can't look forever when you're not allowed to touch. She had this deep, husky voice that seemed to come from her chest instead of her throat, but she never used it for anything but small talk. She had a way of staring at you without blinking, but you want someone to look at you, not through you. She moved and walked like a dream, but there comes a time when you have to wake up.

"By the time I woke up it was our last night out and too late. But not too late to hit the bar. There was the usual ship's party and I'd made a date to take Vilma to the floor show. I didn't cancel it—I just stood her up.

"Maybe I was a slow learner or a sore loser. I didn't give a damn which it was, I'd just had it up to here. No more climbing the walls; I was going to tie one on, and I did.

"I went up aft to a little deck bar away from the action, and got to work. Everybody was making the party scene so I was the only customer. The bartender wanted to talk but I turned him off. I wasn't in the mood for conversation; I had too much to think about. Such as, what the hell had come over me these past two weeks? Running after a phony teaser like some goddamn kid with the hots—it made no sense. Not after the first drink, or the second. By the time I ordered the third, which was a double, I was ready to go after Vilma and hit her right in the mouth.

"But I didn't have to. Because she was there. Standing next to me, with that way-out tropical moon shining through the light blue evening gown and shimmering over her hair.

"She gave me a big smile. 'I've been looking for you everywhere,' she said. 'We've got to talk.'

"I told her to forget it, we had nothing to discuss. She just stood there looking at me, and now the moonlight was sparkling in her eyes. I told her to get lost, I never wanted to see her again. And she put her hand on my arm and said, 'You're in love with me, aren't you?'

"I didn't answer. 'I couldn't answer, because it all came together and it was true. I was in love with Vilma. That's why I wanted to hit her, to grab hold of her and tear that dress right off and—

"Vilma took my hand. 'Let's go to my room,' she said.

"Now there's a switch for you. Two weeks in the deepfreeze and now this. On the last night, too—we'd be docking in a few hours and I still had to pack and be ready to leave the ship early next morning.

"But it didn't matter. What mattered is that we went right to her stateroom and locked the door and it was all ready and waiting. The lights were low, the bed was turned down and the champagne was chilling in the ice bucket.

"Vilma poured me a glass, but none for herself. 'Go ahead,' she said. 'I don't mind.'

"But I did, and I told her so. There was something about the setup that didn't make sense. If this was what she wanted, why wait until the last minute?

"She gave me a look I've never forgotten. 'Because I had to be sure first.'

"I took a big gulp of my drink. It hit me hard on top of what I'd already had, and I was all through playing games. 'Sure of what?' I said. 'What's the matter, you think I can't get it up?'

"Vilma's expression didn't change. 'You don't understand. I had to get to know you and decide if you were suitable.'

"I put down my empty glass. 'To go to bed with?' " Vilma shook her head. 'To be the father of my child.' " I stared at her. 'Now wait a minute —'

"She gave me that look again. 'I have waited. For two weeks I've been waiting, watching you and making up my mind. You seem to be healthy, and there's no reason why our offspring wouldn't be genetically sound.'

"I could feel that last drink but I knew I wasn't stoned. I'd heard her loud and clear. 'You can stop right there,' I told her. 'I'm not into marriage, or supporting a kid.'

"She shrugged. 'I'm not asking you to marry me, and I don't need any financial help. If I conceive tonight, you won't even know about it. Tomorrow we go our separate ways—I promise you'll never even have to see me again.' " She moved close, too close, close enough so that I could feel the heat pouring off her in waves. Heat, and perfume, and a kind of vibration that echoed in her husky voice. 'I need a child,' she said.

"All kinds of thoughts flashed through my head. She was high on acid, she was on a freak sex-trip, some kind of a nut case. 'Look,' I said. 'I don't even know you, not really—'

"She laughed then, and her laugh was husky too. 'What does it matter? You want me.'

"I wanted her, all right. The thoughts blurred together, blended with the alcohol and the anger, and the only thing left was wanting her. Wanting this big beautiful blond babe, wanting her heat, her need.

"I reached for her and she stepped back, turning her head when I tried to kiss her. 'Get undressed first,' she said. 'Oh, hurry—please—'

"I hurried. Maybe she'd slipped something into my drink, because I had trouble unbuttoning my shirt and in the end I ripped it off, along with everything else. But whatever she'd given me I was turned on, turned on like I've never been before.

“I hit the bed, lying on my back, and everything froze; I couldn’t move, my arms and legs felt numb because all the sensation was centered in one place. I was ready, so ready I couldn’t turn off if I tried.

“I know because I kept watching her, and there was no change when she lifted her arms to her neck and removed her head.

“She put her head down on the table and the long blond hair hung over the side and the glassy blue eyes went dead in the rubbery face. But I couldn’t stir, I was still turned on, and all I remember is thinking to myself, without a head how can she see?

“Then the dress fell and there was my answer, moving toward me. Bending over me on the bed, with her tiny breasts almost directly above my face so that I could see the hard tips budding. Budding and opening until the eyes peered out—the real eyes, green and glittering deep within the nipples.

“And she bent closer; I watched her belly ride and fall, felt the warm, panting breath from her navel. The last thing I saw was what lay below—the pink-lipped, bearded mouth, opening to engulf me. I screamed once, and then I passed out.

“Do you understand now? Vilma had told me the truth, or part of the truth. She was a high-fashion model, all right—but a model for what?

“Who made her, and how many more did they make? How many hundreds or thousands are there, all over the world? Models—you ever notice how they all seem to look alike? They could be sisters, and maybe they are. A family, a race from somewhere outside, swarming across the world, breeding with men when the need is upon them, breeding in their own special way. The way she bred with me—”

I ran out then, when he lost control and started to scream. The attendants went in and I guess they quieted him down, because by the time I got to Dr. Stern’s office down the hall I couldn’t hear him any more.

“Well?” Stern said. “What do you make of it?”

I shook my head. “You’re the doctor. Suppose you tell me.”

“There isn’t much. This Vilma—Vilma Loring, she called herself—really existed. She was a working professional model for about two years, registered with a New York agency, living in a leased apartment on Central Park South. Lots of people remember seeing her, talking to her—”

“You’re using the past tense,” I said.

Stern nodded. “That’s because she disappeared. She must have left her stateroom, left the ship as soon as it docked that night in Miami. No one’s managed to locate her since, though God knows they’ve tried, in view of what happened.”

“Just what did happen?”

“You heard the story.”

“But he’s crazy—isn’t he?”

“Greatly disturbed. That’s why they brought him here after they found him the next morning, lying there on the bed in a pool of blood.” Stern shrugged. “You see, that’s the one thing nobody can explain. To this day, we don’t know what became of his genitals.”

The Model

Before I begin this story, I must tell you that I don't believe a word of it.

If I did, I'd be just as crazy as the man who told it to me, and he's in the asylum.

There are times, though, when I wonder. But that's something you'll have to decide for yourself.

About the man in the asylum—let's call him George Milbank. Age thirty-two, according to the records, but he looked older; balding, running to fat, with a reedy voice and a facial tic that made me a little uptight watching him. But he didn't act or sound like a weirdo.

"And I'm not," he said, as we sat there in his room on the afternoon of my visit. "That's why Dr. Stern wanted you to see me, isn't it?"

"What do you mean?" I was playing it cool.

"Doc told me who you were, and I know the kind of stuff you write. If you're looking for material—"

"I didn't say that."

"Don't worry, I'm glad to talk to you. I've been wanting to talk to someone for a long time. Someone who'll do more than just put down what I say in a case history and file it away. They've got me filed away now and they're never going to let me out of here, but somebody should know the truth. I don't care if you write it up as a story, just so you don't make me out bananas. Because I'm going to tell it like it is, so help me God. If there is a God. That's what worries me—I mean, what kind of a God would create someone like Vilma?"

That's when I became conscious of his facial tic, and it disturbed me. He noticed my reaction and shook his head. "Don't take my word for it," he said. "Just look at the women in the magazine ads. High-fashion models, you know the type? Tall, thin, all arms and legs, with no bust. And those high cheekbones, the big eyes, the face frozen in that snotty don't-touch-me-look.

"I guess that's what got to me. Just as it was supposed to. I took Vilma's look as a challenge." His face twitched again.

"You don't like women, do you?" I said.

"You're putting me on." For the first and only time he grinned. "Man, you're talking to one of the biggest womanizers in the business!" Then the grin faded. "At least I was, until I met Vilma.

"It all came together on a cruise ship—the Morland, one of those big new Scandinavian jobs built for the Caribbean package tours. Nine ports in two weeks, conducted shore trips to all the exotic native clipjoints.

"But I was aboard for business, not pleasure. McKay-Phipps, the ad agency I worked for, pitched Apex Camera a campaign featuring full-page color spreads in the fashion magazines. You know the setup—big, arty shots of a model posed against tropical resort backgrounds with just a few lines of snob-appeal copy below. *She travels in style. Her outfit—a Countess D*Or original Her camera—an Apex*. That kind of crud, right?

"Okay, it was their money and who the hell am I to say how they throw it around? Besides, it wasn't even one of my accounts. But Ben Sanders, the exec who handled it, went down the tube with a heart attack just three days before sailing, and I got nailed for the assignment.

"I didn't know diddly about the high-fashion rag business or cameras either, but no problem. The D'Or people sent along Pat Grigsby, their top design consultant, to take charge of the wardrobe end. And I had Smitty Lane handling the actual shooting. He's one of the best in the business, and he got everything lined up before we left—worked out a complete schedule of what shots we'd take and where, checked out times and locations, wired ahead for clearances and firmed-up the arrangements. All I had to do was come along for the ride and see that everyone showed up at the right place at the right time.

"So on the face of it I was home free. Or away from home free. There are worse things than two weeks on a West Indies cruise in February with all expenses paid. The ship was brand new, with a dozen top-deck staterooms, and they'd booked one for each of us. None of those converted broom-closet cabins, and if we wanted we could have our meals served in and skip the first-sitting hassle in the dining room.

"But you don't give a damn about my vacation, and neither did I. Because it turned out to be a real downer.

"Like I said, the Morland hit nine ports in two weeks, and we were scheduled to do our thing in every one of them. Smitty wanted to shoot with natural light, so that meant we had to be on location and ready for action by 11 a.m. Since most of the spots he'd picked out were resorts halfway across the various islands, we had to haul out of the sack before seven, grab a fast continental breakfast, and drag all the wardrobe and equipment onto a chartered bus by eight. You ever ride a 1959 VW minibus over a stretch of rough back country road in steambath temperatures and humidity? It's the original bad trip.

"Then there was the business of setting up. Smitty was good but a real nitpicker, you know? And by the time Pat Grigsby was satisfied with the looks of the outfits and the way they lined up in the viewfinder and we got all those extra-protection shots, it was generally two o'clock. We had our pics but no lunch. So off we'd go, laughing and scratching, in the VW that had been baking in the sun all day, and if we boarded the ship again by four-thirty we were just in time for Afternoon Bingo.

"About the rest of the cruise, I've got good news and bad news.

"First the bad news. Smitty didn't play Afternoon Bingo. He played the bar—morning, afternoon, and night. And Pat Grigsby was butch. She must have made her move with Vilma early on and gotten thanks-but-no-thanks, because by the third day out the two of them weren't speaking except in line of duty. So that left Vilma and me.

"This was the good news."

"I've already told you what those high-fashion models look like, and I guess I made it sound like a grunt from a male chauvinist pig, but that's because of what I know now. At the time, Vilma Loring was something else. One thing about models—they know how to dress, how to move, what to do with makeup and perfume. What it adds up to is poise. "Vilma turned me on just looking at her. And I looked at her a lot. The way she handled herself when we were shooting—a real pro. While the rest of us were frying and dying under the noon sun, she stayed calm, cool and collected. No sweat, not a hair out of place, never any complaints. The lady had it.

"She had it, and I wanted it. That's why I made the scene with her as often as I could, which wasn't very much on the days we were in port. She always sacked out after we got back from a location and 1 couldn't get her to eat with me; she liked to have meals in the stateroom so she wouldn't have to bother with clothes and make-up. "So we did a lot of time together just walking the deck. With me suggesting my room for a nightcap and she giving me that it's-so-lovely-out-here-why-don't-we-look-at-the-dolphins routine.

"I got the message, but I wasn't about to scrub the mission. And on the days we spent at sea I stayed in there. I used to call Vilma every morning after breakfast and when she wasn't resting or doing her nails I lucked out. She was definitely the quiet type and dummied up whenever I asked a personal question, but she was a good listener. As long as I didn't pressure her she stayed happy. I picked up my cue from that and played the waiting game.

Divorcees with silicone implants and new dye jobs were balling the gray-sideburn types who checked out Dow-Jones every morning before they went ashore. By the second week, even the little old ladies with the blue hair had paired off with the young stewards who'd hired on for stud duty. The final leg, two days at sea from Puerto Rico to Miami, was like something out of a porno flick, with everybody getting it on. So there you are.

Presumably you've read them all—the fourteen stories and the appended comments—including "The Model," which was published in the November 1975 issue of Gallery.

And you're saying to yourself—well, what are you saying?

That Bloch is going trendy with this last item, writing raunchy for the rabble?

Or that he has dramatized one of the oldest of mankind's sexual fantasies and/or phobias?

Or are you merely thanking God that the book is finally finished?

If God happens to be your thing, that is.

For all I know, you may have been rooting for the Devil. As I tote up the score, it seems to come out to a rather close tie for honors or dishonors.

On the other hand, if you happen to be primarily a hardcore science fiction buff, then all this talk about divine or diabolical inspiration may have turned you off completely. In which case you are at liberty to substitute the superego for God and the id for Satan.

But I doubt if that will tell you any more about where these stories actually came from.

I've been writing for most of my life now, and I still don't know the answer.

And I'll tell you a little secret.

I really don't care where they came from—as long as they keep coming—and you keep reading.

The Warm Farewell

Although R*OBERT* B*LOCH has written hundreds of short stories in a long and distinguished career that spans four decades—beginning as a colleague of the late H. P. Lovecraft—he has only produced a moderate number in recent years, turning his hand chiefly to novels and scenarios. Which is a great loss, for at his best he's one of the consummate practitioners of the terror tale, his style incorporating cutting irony and character studies meshed with the experience of horror and the supernatural. This suspenseful tale might be called a social fright, operating admirably, as it does, on more than one level of terror simultaneously, and winding up in fine Blochian fashion.*

It must have been around ten o'clock when the cars arrived.

Rena could see them coming down the side road as they turned off the highway from Freedom—there must have been more than a dozen of them. They crawled slowly in a weaving line, like a long black snake inching closer and closer along the gravel.

None of the cars had their headlights turned on, and all of them had little pieces of cardboard stuck over the license plates. They came very slowly and very quietly.

Mrs. Endicott didn't notice them because she was busy making a last-minute tour of the house. Since they'd sold the furnishings along with the place, there wasn't too much to pack, but she wanted to make sure.

Mr. Endicott didn't notice them either, at first. He was closing the car trunk and arranging the extra suitcases in the back seat.

But Rena saw them coming, and she tried to keep the panic out of her voice when she called, “Dad!”

He looked up and then he must have heard the sound of their motors chugging along in low, because he came inside fast.

“Looks like we’re going to have visitors,” he said, trying to smile.

Mrs. Endicott went over to the window.

“Don’t pull the blinds,” her husband told her. “They know we re here.”

“Aren’t you even going to lock the door?” she asked.

Mr. Endicott shrugged. “What’s the use?” he answered.

Now don’t worry. There won’t be any trouble. They probably just want to make sure we re going.”

Mrs. Endicott looked at Rena. “You better go in the bedroom,” she said.

The girl bit her lip but did not move. “I’m not afraid,” she told her mother. Those White Hopes can’t frighten me.”

Mr. Endicott looked at her. “Your mother’s right,” he sighed. “You better go in the bedroom. No sense taking chances.”

His wife sniffed. “I wish you’d thought of that yourself, in the first place. Then maybe we wouldn’t be running away like this. We had a nice home here. The paper was doing well. But you had to go to work and write those editorials. You had to bring Scotty down—”

Stop that, said Mr. Endicott. No sense crying over spilt milk. I had to write those editorials. You know I did. Now be quiet, both of you, and let me handle this.”

Father, mother, and daughter fell silent as the cars drove into the yard. They angle-parked in a wide circle, blocking both driveway exits. Now car doors slammed and the white figures emerged—the hooded, sheeted figures of thirty men. As if by signal they converged on the doorstep, forming a smaller circle.

For another moment there was no sound; then a buzz of voices rose from just outside the door. Presently the knocking began.

Mrs. Endicott put her hand on Rena’s shoulder. She reached out to touch Mr. Endicott, but he shrugged free and went to the door.

Just as he was about to open it, Rena gasped.

Her father turned. What is it?” he whispered.

I just happened to think, she said. “I know why they’ve come. They want to know about Scotty.”

“Oh, no! Mrs. Endicott fluttered her hands. “Lock the door,” she gasped. “Please, lock the door!”

Mr. Endicott made a helpless gesture as the knocking sounded again. “Leave this to me,” he warned quietly.

Then he opened the door wide.

The man standing in the doorway might have been six feet tall, at the very most. But in the long white robe and the tall hood he was a giant. A ghost-giant, with hidden eyes and a voice that came forth in a croaking whisper.

“Greetings,” he said.

Mr. Endicott didn’t answer.

The ghost-giant snickered. “What’s the matter, cat got your tongue? Or you just plain too scared to talk?” The figure moved forward. “Well, we ain’t gonna make trouble. Not if you cooperate.”

He turned and addressed the hooded man directly behind him. “Come on in,” he said.

White sheets rustled.

“No, the rest of you wait there,” the ghost-giant called. “Just the four of us, like I said. Guess that’ll be enough to handle our business. If we need help, we’ll holler.” He snickered again, and an answering chuckle arose from the sheeted circle.

Four hooded figures entered the parlor. The ghost-giant closed the door.

“Well, now,” he said. “Looks like you folks was all set to pull out. Is that right?”

Mr. Endicott nodded.

“Guess you packed in pretty much of a hurry, way it looks. Reckon you wasn’t expecting visitors. Or did you have a notion you could hightail it before any visitors arrived?”

Mr. Endicott shrugged.

The hooded giant gazed at his three companions and chuckled again. “See what I mean, boys? This is your Yankee hospitality. Come to pay a friendly farewell call, and what happens? They offer you any dopes, or maybe even a little jolt of corn? Not likely. Don’t even ask a feller if he’d like to set down. And after all the ways we traveled just to get here.

His chuckle mingled with the answering sounds from under the hoods of the others. Then he moved over to Mr. Endicott and rubbed his white-gloved hands together briskly.

“Gonna have to ask you to speak up,” he said. “Guess you all don’t realize you got distinguished visitors here.”

Mr. Endicott glanced down at the feet of the sheeted men. His eyes traveled over shoes and protruding trouser cuffs.

I realize it, he said, quietly. “You’d never make much of an actor, Jess. And as for Race and Pud, here, they’ll have to invest in a second pair of shoes if they want to sneak around in disguise.”

Ain’t nobody sneaking around in disguise,” the hooded giant rumbled, abandoning the whisper. “This here’s the White Hopes, and don’t forget it. No names among the Brothers.”

“Brothers!” said Mr. Endicott.

Now that’s enough of that, the man identified as Jess said. “We’ve had all the sass we need out of you, Endicott. You and your stinking editorials. You been asking the good citizens of Freedom enough questions. Now it’s our turn to do the talking. And all we want out of you is a few answers.”

He walked over to the fourth hooded figure, whose shiny black patent-leather shoes and creased seersucker trousers offered a striking contrast to the sandals and work pants of the others.

“You want to take charge, Brother Hood?” he asked.

The sheeted head shook slowly.

All right,” said Jess. He turned to Endicott once again. “I told you about distinguished visitors,” he went on. “This here’s our Brother Hood. I guess you heard about him. Head of the whole organization in this territory. He come all the way from headquarters in Atlanta, just to help us say goodbye. Just got in tonight."

Mr. Endicott ran a hand across his bald spot. "Look here, Jess, he murmured. We're all ready to go. Say what you have to say and get out."

Now wait a minute. Wait—a—minute." Jess walked up to the small man and gazed down at him through the slits in his hood. "I guess you ain't really learned your lesson after all."

"I've learned enough," Mr. Endicott answered wearily. "I've learned you can't hope to sell freedom here in Freedom. I've learned enough to get rid of the paper and the house and leave town. What more do you want of me?"

"Not much." Jess turned to the silent Brother Hood. "See? Spunky little cuss, just like I told you. But we showed him a thing or two. Just like he said now. He's shut up shop for good. Had to dump the paper for a song. The bank squeezed him on the mortgage here and he was lucky to get half what he paid for the house and throw his furniture in on the deal. Beckon he'll think twice before he pulls any more smart-aleck stunts again."

"I know when I'm licked," Endicott said. "Does that satisfy you?"

Jess didn't answer him. He talked to Brother Hood. And it was all done peaceable, too. No rough stuff. Everything clean and legal-like."

"What about those bricks through the window?" Mr. Endicott asked. "What about those notes, and the phone calls, and expelling my daughter here from school?"

"We was just protecting our own youngsters," said Jess. "We got decent girls in this town. We don't aim to have them spoiled and corrupted by any Northern nigra-lovers—"

Mrs. Endicott put her arm around Rena. "Shut up!" she cried. "Shut up and get out of here!"

"You really want us to go, Mizz Endicott? Jess bowed, his hooded head bobbing grotesquely. "Well, seeing as how you feel like that, ma'm, we're on our way. Sorry we troubled you. But just one thing before we clear out."

"What's that?" Mr. Endicott answered for her.

“We come here for information,” Jess said. “That’s all we’re after. Just information.” He paused and moved closer. “Where’s the nigra?” he rumbled. “Where’s Scotty?

“Mr. Scott has left town,” Endicott answered. “I thought everyone knew that. You mean you told everyone that,” Jess corrected him. But the White Hopes know different. We got eyes that see in the dark. The hooded head shook. “Oh, I admit we was fooled at first. That was a pretty slick trick of yours—bringing down a nigra from up North, an educated nigra if you please, that looks and acts like a white man. I bet you laughed aplenty when you put him on the paper and started him writing those highfalutin stories about segregation and what-all. Oh, you fooled us good, you did! Until he up and wrote that dirty lying piece for the magazines about the White Hopes.”

That was a mistake, Mr. Endicott said. “I didn’t know he was going to write that article. I’d never have authorized it.”

“I’ll bet you wouldn’t, Jess chuckled. Like you say, it was a mistake. A real mistake. And you made another—quartering him here at your own house, a lousy nigra living right here in a white man’s home. Passing for white, and you helping him!”

That was my business.”

“That’s our business, mister. That’s the business of every decent, respectable white man in these parts. And when anyone forgets it, the White Hopes are here to remind them.”

“Why can’t you forget it?” Mr. Endicott asked, wearily. “It’s all over and done with. Mr. Scott left town last weekend.”

“Oh did he?” Jess glanced at the others. “Did he really? We happen to think different. If he left town, how’d he get outwalk? We been watching the buses, Endicott. We been watching the train. Ain’t no nigra comes in or goes out without us knowing it, anytime. And we been watching sort of special for Scotty. On account of we didn’t want him to leave without us saying goodbye. Right, boys?”

Race and Pud guffawed.

“He’s not here, if that’s what you’re thinking,” Mrs. Endicott said.

We know that, Jess assured her. “But we got a pretty good idea you folks can tell us where he’s hiding out.”

I don’t know, Mr. Endicott said. That’s the truth, so help me. I don’t know where he went. He came to me Saturday and said he was leaving—said he wanted to leave so there wouldn’t be any trouble. And he made a point of not telling me where he was going.”

“You’ve got to believe us,” Mrs. Endicott said. “He told us nothing.”

“But he didn’t go,” Jess said. “We would of seen him if he did. So he’s got to be around these parts, someplace. And if he’s around these parts, he’s got to eat. Somebody’s looking after him. Somebody’s feeding him.”

“We have nothing to do with it,” sighed Mr. Endicott.

“Who else could it be?” Jess asked. “There ain’t a white man in the county that’d touch that nigra with a ten-foot pole. Ain’t a darky that would dare lift a hand for him. They know how the White Hopes feel about a bad nigra like Scotty. The word’s out we re gonna give him a little farewell celebration.”

“I tell you, we don’t know anything!”

“And I tell you you’re lying.” The white-gloved hands fumbled under Jess’s sheet and emerged holding a leather strap. “I didn’t come here aiming for trouble. But the boys ain’t taking no for an answer. Maybe we got to do some persuading.”

Mrs. Endicott let out a strangled sound as Jess advanced on the little man. He said nothing, nor did he move. The gloved hand swung the leather strap. It swished through the heavy, humid air of the room.

“Better grab hold of him, boys,” said Jess. “This is liable to be kind of messy.”

Brother Hood stepped forward. His voice was a soft whisper. “Wait a moment,” he said. Might I make a suggestion?”

“Sure. This is your party, really.”

“You haven’t asked the girl yet.”

Mr. and Mrs. Endicott looked at Rena. And now Jess was looking at her too, looking at her through the eyeholes in the hood. The room was suddenly very silent.

Jess coiled the strap in his gloved hands, caressing its length. “Why that’s right,” he said, slowly. “Looks like we clean forgot about Rena, here.”

He walked over to her and stood balanced on the balls of his feet, rocking from side to side.

Rena’s eyes went wide.

How old are you, honey? Jess drawled. “Fifteen, sixteen, thereabouts? Funny, I never noticed before. You’re right pretty. Too pretty to waste your spit on a nigra like that Scotty. You re a white girl, honey. Reckon maybe you need a white man to teach you what that means—”

“Keep away from her!” Mrs. Endicott sobbed.

Jess swung the strap slowly. “I’d sure hate to spoil that pretty face. Yessiree, I’d sure hate to have to do anything like that.” He raised the strap. “Suppose you help me out, honey. Suppose you tell me where Scotty’s hiding. Before I count up to three, maybe. One, two—”

Look at her,” Brother Hood said, sharply. “She won’t talk. Not that way.”

Jess paused and turned. “You got any other ideas?” he asked.

It’s my party, like you said. Brother Hood approached Jess and bent his hooded head. He whispered something. Jess nodded, snickered, straightened up.

Go ahead, he said. Go right ahead.”

Brother Hood nodded. Then he took two quick steps forward and gathered the girl in his sheeted arms. She screamed and struggled, engulfed in the billowing folds that enmeshed her. Brother Hood fought her, a great white bird flapping his wings over his prey.

Mr. Endicott came across the room. “Damn you, let her alone!” he shouted. “Let her—”

Jess drew the strap back and hit him across the mouth. Then he hit Mr. Endicott with his fist. The little man fell down and his glasses dropped to the floor.

Jess stood over him. One more move out of you and you'll really get it, he grunted. And that goes for your wife, too. You, Race—hang onto her."

Race was already grasping Mrs. Endicott's elbow, twisting her arm behind her. He didn't twist any harder than was necessary, but he did a job.

The hooded man named Pud flung open a door. "Right here's the bedroom, Brother Hood," he said. "Reckon that's what you're looking for."

Brother Hood nodded. He jerked the struggling girl through the doorway, dropping the strap and using both hands now. Pud started to follow behind, but Brother Hood snapped, "I don't need you in here. My party."

He started to laugh, and then the door banged shut, and there was silence.

Mrs. Endicott began to cry, noiselessly. Mr. Endicott crawled along the floor and picked up his glasses. They were unbroken, and when he put them on he could see Jess standing over him with the strap poised.

He could see Race, too, and now Race had a gun in his gloved hand.

So nobody moved.

Nobody moved when the gasps came, or the thud, or the scream. Nobody moved when the thumping sounds rose from behind the thick door.

Nothing moved in the room except the hands of the clock on the wall.

A full fifteen minutes passed before the door opened.

Brother Hood came out alone.

"Come on," he said. He was panting and his voice had submerged to a conspiratorial whisper.

"Did she—?"

"Come on," Brother Hood repeated, nodding. "Lets go."

"Where is he?" Jess asked.

"The old Jasper place, if you know where that is. Hiding out in the barn."

"I might of guessed," Jess said. "Way off on the side road down there. Been deserted for years.

"All set?" Brother Hood panted.

"Got everything right out in the car," Jess answered.

"Then let's go. You boys lead the way—I'll have to follow in my car."

Jess chuckled. "Man, you sound beat! Must have had quite a workout—"

Brother Hood cut him short with a curt nod and moved over to the door. Jess and his two companions followed. Jess stood in the doorway for a moment after the others had made their exit.

You all don't forget us now, he said. "Sorry we got to be running along so quick like, but we got this little surprise party all arranged. He paused. "Mebbe you better forget us after all," Jess murmured. "Yeah, that's the best idea. We never been here. He shifted the leather strap in his gloved hand. 'Mind, now. We never been here, none of us."

The Endicotts didn't answer.

They didn't look at him, nor at each other, as the white-robed man went out. They didn't move as they heard the receding murmur of voices drifting down the driveway. They waited until the motors started, roared, and droned away in the night.

Mr. Endicott turned as the bedroom door opened and Rena came out. Her face was white, and she let the door slam behind her fast and hard.

"Gone?" she whispered.

Mr. Endicott nodded.

"Then we'd better go, too. Right now."

Mrs. Endicott stretched out her hands. "Rena—"

The girl shook her head, brushing the tangled hair from her eyes. Don't say anything," she murmured. "Please, don't say anything. Let's just get out of here."

Mr. and Mrs. Endicott exchanged glances. He nodded and led his wife to the door.

Rena paused and bit her lip. "I forgot my purse," she said. "Start the car and I'll be right out."

She raced back into the bedroom as they left. By the time Mr. and Mrs. Endicott had climbed into the car she was back, snapping out the lights and closing the front door behind her.

"Don't use your lights," she told her father. "Just head for the highway. The faster the better."

Mrs. Endicott patted her arm. “Don’t worry, honey. They’re gone now, to the old Jasper place.” She paused. “How did you—?”

Rena didn’t answer her directly. “Jasper’s? That’s good. It’s a long way out. And they’ll surround it, and go inside to search. They’ve got kerosene, of course, and they’ll plan on burning him. They like to burn, you know.”

The car mounted the rise to the highway just ahead, and they could see the panorama below. Suddenly Mr. Endicott turned and said, “Look!”

Turning, they gazed behind them, staring at the side road. The White Hopes were on the prowl now, and they’d lighted their torches, two to a car, thrusting them out of the front windows so that a line of fire blazed in the night. A long chain of bobbing flame stretched down the side road leading to the old Jasper place.

“You see?” Rena whispered. “I was right. They’ll go there and hunt around the barn so that they can burn him.” Her voice broke and she began to laugh.

Mrs. Endicott shook her. “Stop it!” she cried. “Stop it! I don’t care what he did to you in there—you shouldn’t have told them. They’ll burn Scotty alive. Why did you tell them where he was?”

“Yes,” Mr. Endicott said. “And how did you know?”

Rena shrieked and gurgled. “I don’t know,” she said. “He must have made up the whole story when he came out.”

“Who? Brother Hood?”

“That wasn’t Brother Hood,” Rena giggled. “That was Scotty. I still don’t know where he’s been hiding, but he’d sneaked back here to tell us goodbye. And when he looked through the bedroom window and saw Brother Hood drag me in there, he crawled in. I saw him, but Brother Hood didn’t. He hit Brother Hood on the back of the head with a big rock.” Mrs. Endicott gasped. “Did he—kill him?”

“No. He was just unconscious. Then Scotty tied him up with bedsheets and gagged him good. And he put on Brother Hood’s pants and shoes and gloves and robe and came out. He told me we’d have to get away fast. He’s taking Brother Hood’s car, and when the White Hopes get to the barn he’ll sneak off in the confusion and make his getaway. By the time they find out there's nobody in the barn it'll be too late." She giggled again.

Mrs. Endicott touched her daughter's cheek. "Thank God," she said. "You're all right."

"I'm all right," Rena repeated. "Now let's hurry!"

Mr. Endicott shifted and the car moved out onto the highway. All's well that ends well," he muttered. "I think Scotty will make it—he just whispered and nobody recognized his voice. Once he's gone and we're gone there won't be any trouble. He glanced at his daughter. I—I know what an ordeal this has been for you. But you mustn't be bitter about it. You've got to remember they're not all like that. Plenty of decent folks in Freedom and all over. It's just the minority, the ones who haven't learned, and they're disappearing fast. The big danger isn't in what they do, but in how they feel. That bitterness—it's contagious. Makes you want to fight back, their way. And you mustn't. Only leads to more trouble."

"Fight fire with fire," Rena said. And giggled again.

"Look down there!" Mrs. Endicott cried.

Never mind, Rena insisted. "Keep going!"

"No—stop! Look at the flames!"

The car halted. The trio gazed off in the darkness as a sheet of fire rose suddenly in the night.

"But that's not Jasper's place," Mr. Endicott gasped. "That's—that's our house!"

"And Brother Hood is tied up in the bedroom," Mrs. Endicott said. "Rena, you said you were going back there for your purse. Did you—?"

Rena was silent. They were all silent, staring down at the fire. Now they could hear the roar of the flames and, above it, something that might or might not have been a single piercing scream.

Rena giggled again.

"Fight fire with fire," Mr. Endicott sighed. "They'll blame it on the White Hopes and nobody will ever know. But I hate it, it's wrong, we've got to go back."

Mrs. Endicott gripped his arm. “No,” she said. “It’s too late. Rena’s right. We’d better get out of here, fast.”

She didn’t look at her daughter, even when she began to laugh louder and louder, and after a minute Mr. Endicott started the car again.

He shifted into high and the car sped forward, heading away from the flames, heading due north.

ETFF

This is the first time I've ever written anything in English.

Like all primitive language-systems, it's a clumsy method of communication.

I had to study several days before I mastered it, but I'm glad I did.

It came in handy the other night, on that back-country road in West Virginia.

And so did my human body.

The body is even more clumsy than the language. The construction is easy enough—just rob a sperm-bank and away you go—but I spent nearly a week, by earth-time reckoning, adapting myself to the limitations of movement and perception. And I never did reconcile myself to its ugliness.

But one must be tolerant, and I learned to cope; just as I learned to comprehend the simplistic structure of terrestrial history, geography, biology, zoology, chemistry, anthropology, ethnology, sociology, psychology, philosophy, theology, astronomy, technology and pornography.

I still don't understand their mathematics completely—for example, how did McDonald's determine just exactly when they sold their 18,000,000,000th hamburger?—but then there are some things we are not meant to know.

And the earthlings are fallible, too.

That night in West Virginia, when I dropped down to the road in front of the van, Rick and Steve thought I was a fugitive from the fuzz.

Rick was driving, and he jammed on the brakes fast, pulling over to the side just before hitting me. "Climb in, man!" he yelled. "We gotta get away from that helicopter!"

Steve was sitting next to him, and he opened the door to pull me aboard. "Turn off on the side-road, fast—we can lose them," he told Rick.

"Don't bother," I said. "Look, they've scrinched."

And of course, they had scrinched—grocceling up and out into a blik, right on schedule.

"Scrinched, hell," said Steve. "They've disappeared!" He shook his head. "I never saw a police helicopter do that before."

"Weird," said Rick. "Like I need a drink, you know?" And he grabbed the beer-can out of Steve's hand.

It was then that I noticed both of them were in a condition caused by alcoholic drink in which control of the faculties is impaired and inhibitions are broken; i.e., they were smashed.

"Maybe it wasn't a chopper," Steve said. "Could be a flying saucer."

"What's a flying saucer?" I asked.

"It's a UFO. Unidentified flying object."

"But I can identify it for you," I said. "It was a plain, ordinary vroob."

"Vroob?"

I nodded. "You'd call it a space-ship."

Rick made a face. "Space-ship? What are you, a Trekkie or something?"

"Exactly. A something named Pzquadfltorzz. At least that's as close as I can come to it in English."

Steve looked at Rick, "This guy is bananas."

"No, I'm Pzquadfltorzz. Pzquadfltorzz Icthylopaughribbl III, to be exact, from Freebis M2, Quadrant IV, Vector—"

"Open another beer, quick," Steve said.

Rick reached into a six-pack on the seat beside him and handed Steve a can. "Let's get it all together. "What you're saying is that you're an alien and you just landed here from a spaceship—"

"Ohhhhhh!"

The soft moan came from the interior of the van behind us. We turned to look at the girl lying on the bunk in back.

Steve frowned at her. “Sherry, what’s the matter?”

“I bumped my arm against the side when you hit the brakes back there. I think I cut myself.”

Both Steve and Rick were frowning now.

“What’s the trouble?” I said. “Trouble? Sherry needs a doctor right away, man.”

“For a minor cut?”

“Could be fatal. She’s a haemophilic. You know what that means.”

“Of course.” I nodded. “Let me help her.”

“You?”

“I told you I’m an extra-terrestial,” I said. “Take me to your bleeder.”

“Hold it, what do you think you’re doing—?”

But I ignored him and climbed into the back of the van. Kneeling beside the girl, I examined her arm. Sure enough, she had a cut just below the left elbow and it was bleeding profusely.

I lifted her arm and ran my fingers over the cut. The bleeding stopped. Then I pressed my fingers against the wound. It puckered up and vanished.

“Holy Heinlein!” the girl gasped. “What did you do?”

“I stroomfed it A simple technique, known to your ancient Egyptians and modern faith-healers. Laying on of hands, that sort of thing. We do it all the time on Freebis M2, Quadrant IV, Vector—”

“I believe it,” Sherry said. She sat up, nodding at Rick and Steve. “You know something? This dude’s telling the truth.”

Steve stared at her. “You mean—V “Well, he didn’t ask for any donations, so he’s not a faith-healer. And he doesn’t have enough wrinkles to be an ancient Egyptian, either. Besides, that flying thing did look like a space-ship.”

“I’ll drink to that,” Rick said. And he did.

“But if you’re an extra-terrestial, what are you doing here?” Steve said.

“Same thing you are. I’m on my way to Connecticut.”

“How’d you know that?”

"I know a lot of things. You're Steve Morgan and Sherry's your sister. Rick Greeley is your best friend."

"You've been reading our minds?"

"I've been reading your fanzine. And it isn't easy—your mimeo is terrible. Also you should justify your margins."

"You read Smudge?" Rick shook his head. "How could you? We only printed twenty-nine copies of the last issue. I thought nobody read it except Harry Warner, Jr."

"How would an extra-terrestial get hold of a fanzine?" Steve asked. "I know the post office is fouled up, but this is ridiculous."

"Space-ships get around," I told him. "We make frequent visits here to acquire artifacts."

"In other words, you ripped it off," Sherry said.

I shrugged. "I could hardly subscribe, you know. As your brother says, the post office is undependable, and I doubt if there's regular delivery service to Freebis M2, Quadrant IV, Vector—"

"Why?" Rick said. "What would you want with a fanzine?"

"We're interested in pop culture. That's why we send our ships here. We've been studying your planet for years."

"Now wait a minute!" Steve looked grim. "Don't tell me you're planning to invade earth?"

"None of that crazy Buck Rogers stuff," I said. "What would an extraterrestial want to do that for? Do you think we need your troubles—pollution, inflation, wars, muggings, television game-shows, political assassinations, Rod McKuen—"

"Then why come here?"

"Because I couldn't risk landing in Connecticut near the hotel, where the ship would be seen. But your fanzine said you'd be driving there by this route, and I thought you'd give me a lift."

"To the Convention?"

"Of course." I nodded. "Don't you understand? I'm a fan."

"A science fiction fan?"

“Why not? After all, fandom is a way of life. And nowhere is it specified that it must be limited merely to terrestial life. Well, I’m alive. And when I got into your earth culture, fandom turned me on. Fanzines like yours, and proxines too. Your science fiction writers have some interesting concepts of the universe. Quaint, but interesting, i became fascinated with the naive extrapolations of Clarke, Asimov and van Vogt—the subtleties of the Perry Rhodan series—the autoerotic imagery of your New Wave. I even read the first four pages of Dhalgren—’

“And you’re going to the Convention in Connecticut? The Con-Con?”

“That’s my reward for working on these earth-study projects. My colleagues, noting my interest and enthusiasm, created an informal organization to sponsor my trip here. The ETFF.”

“What’s that?”

“The Extra-Terrestial Fan Fund.”

“Oh wow,” said Sherry, with the natural eloquence of a young earthling. “What a break for us! Bringing the first actual visitor from outer space to a science fiction convention—why, it’ll double our circulation! I-can just see the look on their faces when we get up and introduce Pzquadfltorzz Icthyfopaughribbl III from—”

“Please,” I murmured. “No names.”

“No names like that one, anyway,” Rick said. “It sounds like something out of H.P. Lovecraft. Yog-sothoth, Nyarlathotep, Cthulhu—”

“Never mind about Cthulhu,” I said. “He happens to be a good friend of mine.”

“Suppose we just call you Pete,” Steve said.

“That would be fine,” I told him. “But just remember, I’m incognito.”

“You mean we can’t tell anyone you’re an alien?” He looked disappointed.

“if you do, you’ll spoil the whole purpose of my visit. I want to feel free to act as an observer, instead of being mobbed by autograph-hounds.”

Sherry sighed. “You’ve got a point there. But just think of the sensation it would cause if—”

“i am thinking of it,” I said. “And I insist on privacy. As one trufan to another, please DNQ or I’ll gafiate. Is that clear?”

“Perfectly,” said Rick. “Don’t worry, we’ll keep your secret. But are you sure you know how to behave like a real fan?”

“Of course I do,” I told him. “Give me a beer.”

“He’s a fan, all right,” Steve said.

If there were any further doubts on the matter, I dispelled them completely as we drove through the night to Connecticut. During our trip I drank a whole can of beer and threw three times.

On Friday afternoon we arrived at the Convention hotel. Rick called it the Stradivarius, because it was a vile inn.

The lobby was a madhouse, filled with longhaired young women and even longerhaired young men, plus an assortment of older men with beards. A number of children, unable to grow long enough hair or long enough beards, were carrying around hairy objects called Tribbles. The place looked like a barber’s nightmare.

“Is it always like this in a hotel?” I whispered.

We approached the registration desk and Rick asked the elderly clerk if his room was ready. There was a constant ringing of telephones and Rick had to shout his question above the din.

“Do you have a reservation?” the clerk said.

“Plenty of them, after seeing what’s going on here,” Rick told him. “Don’t those phones drive you crazy?”

The clerk shook his head. “Luckily, I’m almost stone-deaf.”

“Some hotel,” Sherry sniffed. “I suppose the house detective is blind.”

“Not until around three o’clock,” said the clerk. “The bar doesn’t open before noon.” He scrabbled through a sheaf of papers on the desk. “Ah, here you are. Rick Sneary, right?”

“Wrong. I know how to spell. The name is O’Shea. Rick O’Shea.”

“That’s the trajectory of a bullet bouncing off of something,” the clerk said. “Why’d your mother pick that name for you?”

"Well, it was a shotgun wedding. But the justice of the peace was crosseyed and he married her to the wrong man." Rick frowned. "Never mind my personal history—what about our room?"

The clerk nodded. "Maybe I'd better explain the layout of the hotel first. It's divided into two wings. All of the even-numbered rooms are in the west wing, and all of the odd-numbered rooms are in the right wing."

"What does that mean?"

"Simple. Let's say you're in Room 2953, and your best friend is in Room 2954. If you want to visit him, all you have to do is take the elevator down to the first floor of the right wing and walk through the lobby to the elevator on the left wing."

"And that will take me up to 2954?"

"Not exactly," said the clerk. "You see, this hotel only has twenty-eight floors."

"Typical convention hotel," Steve muttered. "They always come up with a place laid out like this." He turned to the clerk. "But it does have elevators."

"Of course," sniffed the clerk. "Six cars for each wing. Just remember, though—those on the left only run up and those on the right only run down. But on both sides just one elevator is presently in operation, and even the one that runs up is pretty run-down. Of course, you can always use the escalators, but I suggest the stairs."

"Why?"

"The escalators aren't running."

Rick shrugged. "Never mind that—just give me our room-number."

"Certainly, sir. It's 1623½."

"1623½? In which wing is that?"

"Neither."

"Neither?"

The clerk looked embarrassed. "I forgot to mention, the rooms ending in ½ are on the floors of the old annex, in the building around the corner."

"How can there be such a thing as an old annex?" Rick said.

"Well, you see the management was smart. They anticipated there'd be overcrowding in years to come, so they put up the annex before they built the hotel. Actually, it was there all the time; used to be the county jail, but it was condemned."

"What about the inmates?"

"They were condemned, too."

"Oh, super!" Sherry tossed her blonde curls. "Never mind all that—we won't be staying in our room anyway. Just tell us where the convention is being held."

"Let me see, now." The clerk glanced at a list before him. "The International Hog-Calling Association is on the fourth floor—lots of open windows up there, and they like to practice. The Chicken-Plucker's Union is on three, and the chickens are on the mezzanine—by the way, the mezzanine is downstairs in this hotel, because somebody mixed up the blue-prints—' "

"We want the World Science Fiction Convention," Rick said.

The clerk looked at his list again and frowned. "It's not listed. You'll just have to look around."

"Look around?" Steve shook his head. "This isn't a hotel—it's a twenty-eight storey jigsaw puzzle! Don't you have a map or something?"

"Of course we have a map," said the clerk.

"Can we have one?"

"I don't keep maps at the desk," the clerk told him. "They're in the storage room."

"And where is that?"

"I don't know. I'm afraid I've never been able to find it."

"Knock it off," Sherry murmured. "We'll locate the Convention ourselves. Just wander around until we run into it." And we did, though it wasn't easy. Somewhere we found a stairway leading up to a second level.

"Try this floor," Sherry said. "We'll just ask the first fan we meet."

Unfortunately, the corridors seemed deserted. We wandered through a labyrinth of halls without finding another soul. Finally I spotted a room with a sign on the door.

"Hey, look!" I said. "See what it says? Where No Man Has Gone Before. That must be the Star Trek Suite!"

"Let me find out," Steve muttered.

He went inside fast, and came out faster.

"What's the matter?" Rick asked.

"That wasn't the Star Trek Suite—it was the women's washroom!"

"You can't win 'em all," Sherry sighed. "But come on. Keep your ears open for the sounds of fannish voices."

As we rounded a corridor we heard a dreadful shriek.

"What did I tell you?" Sherry said. "Somebody's singing filk-songs! Hey, I wonder if Marion Zimmer Bradley knows about this?"

But the noise was not produced by filk-songs, nor was Ms. Bradley in evidence. At the end of the hall was a large open area filled with figures milling before a series of long tables. Behind the tables were seated a group of the most miserable-looking people I've ever encountered—weary, haggard, harried and harassed, with red-rimmed eyes and trembling hands.

"See, what did I tell you?" Sherry exulted. "It's the Convention Committee!"

"And the screaming—?"

"Fans, waiting to be registered. There's always some kind of hassle, you know. Fandom is a way of strife. Now just get in line and we'll get our badges."

Which we did, in less than two hours. My badge read Pete Boggs—Steve registered for me, and invented the last name on the spot. "Makes you sound like a Big Name Fan," he said. "They'll think you're Redd Boggs' brother." They led me toward the stairway at one side. "Up we go, now," Rick said. "Committee tells me everything's on the third floor. Just think—in a moment you'll see your first real Worldcon." He frowned. "What's the matter?"

"I am thinking," I murmured. "Do you realize what this moment means to me? Ever since I discovered science fiction, I've dreamed of the time when I’d actually come to a convention. And now, all at once, I’m frightened. They say there are thousands of people up there—fans, authors, artists, editors, publishers—”

“Nothing to be scared about,” Rick said. “Fans are just a bunch of hairy people like the ones you saw in the lobby. The authors are just the same, only hairier. You won’t see any artists—they’re all in the Art Show, sneaking around and drawing mustaches on each other’s paintings. As for the editors, they’re just here to be chewed-out on the panel sessions.”

“But where are all the publishers?”

“Oh, they don’t dare to come to these affairs. If they did, they’d be lynched.”

Sherry took my arm. “Come along, now, and don’t be frightened. You’re going to have a ball.”

And that’s exactly what I did, all the rest of the day. Sherry and Rick and Steve took me around and showed me everything.

How can I possibly describe the thrill of attending one’s first convention? dust imagine the excitement of seeing thousands and thousands of real live science fiction fans gathered together in one place, all of them giving each other their autographs!

And the pros gave autographs, too. Out in the hall stood Isaac Asimov, big as life, signing copies of the Bible.

“He just arrived by car a few minutes ago,” Steve said.

“You mean he drove here?”

“Asimov never takes a plane,” Rick told me. “He believes that if God meant for people to fly, He’d have given them plane-tickets.”

Going into the meeting-hall, we passed Lester del Rey, Poul Anderson, Gordon Dickson and Bob Silverberg. And there was Philip Jose Farmer, surrounded by a circle of fans who were asking him about his latest work. “I’m doing a sequel to my Riverwortd series,” he said. “It’s called “Up the Creek.”

Inside the meeting-hall, more thrills awaited me. Ray Bradbury was up on the platform, reading a long poem about a whale. When he finished, Robert Bloch followed him and read a two-line verse about a sardine.

At dinner, in the coffee-shop, Sherry pointed out other notables. “See that group over there?” she murmured. “That’s Roy Lavender, Ted White, Fuzzy Pink Niven and Charlie Brown.”

“What a color-combination!” I said. My eyes were even more dazzled when they were joined by Redd Boggs.

Back in the hall for the evening program, I heard Harlan Ellison reading a short story to the crowd. It was greeted with wild applause, so for an encore, Harlan read one of his novels.

Later in the evening we just wandered around looking at celebrities. I saw David Gerrold selling Tribbles, Ben Bova and Fred Pohl selling each other stories. There was Judy Lynn Benjamin and Ursula K. LeGuin and a woman named Parenthesis who, they told me, writes under the name of Leigh Brackett. And in one of the corridors a group of fans listened to an argument about the proper length of a story, carried on by Frank Belknap Long and Elliot Shorter.

I must say my newfound friends were good to me. Any request I made was carried out immediately; whatever I asked for, I got.

Sometimes, of course, it didn’t work out. Just before they decided to turn in for the night, Sherry came up to me with two individuals—a petite redhead and a blond, balding man.

“Here they are,” she said, proudly. “Bjo and John.”

I acknowledge the introductions, then stared at them, baffled. “Where are my Tribbles?” I whispered.

“Sorry,” Sherry said. “I thought you asked for Trimbles.”

But I forgave her. It had been a long day, and we were all tired. “We’d better get some rest,” I said.

As we made our way up to our room, famous figures danced around me in a daze. There was William Rotsler telling Frank Kelly Freas how to draw, a group of fans explaining to Roger Elwood how to edit an anthology, and Theodore Sturgeon holding forth on his famous Sturgeon’s Law—“Ninety percent of everything is crud.”

“Only ninety percent?” I murmured drowsily, as my friends made up a bed for me on the sofa.

Usually I can fall asleep immediately, but tonight was different. Maybe it was the strain of activating a human body—I wasn’t accustomed to the limitations of just two arms, two legs, two eyes, two ears and a single itty-bitty little mouth. Or perhaps it was just the excitement.

But as I reflected on the matter, I realized there was more to it than that. I was beginning to feel just a wee bit neglected. Here were all these fans, kissing Terry Carr’s hand, asking Larry Niven for a lock of his beard, listening in awe as Roger Zelazny spelled his-last name for them. And none of them paid the slightest attention to me. Me, the only genuine extraterrestial in the world!

It was my own fault, of course—I was the one who’d insisted that my identity couldn’t be revealed. I hadn’t reckoned with one mind-boggling fact; fandom is the carrier of a contagious disease. And I had been exposed to it here, all day.

I was suffering from the most dangerous of all human desires—the craving for egoboo.

What to do? As I’d told Sherry and Rick and Steve, I couldn’t reveal my true name or place of origin—!’d made a solemn promise to my sponsors as a delegate of the Extra-Terrestial Fan Fund. No matter what happened, under no circumstances could I speak for myself.

But the thought of spending two more days here, surrounded by flattery, adulation and George Clayton Johnson, was too much to bear. There had to be some way of attaining recognition without violating my promise.

Then it came to me.

Actions speak louder than words.

Tomorrow, even though I couldn’t tell them who I was, I’d show what I could do. And by the time this Worldcon was over, I’d be a Big Name Fan, right up there with Chuck Crayne, Bruce Pelz and Mike Glicksohn.

I drowsed off to sleep with a happy smile on my face, lulled by the sound of screams from the corridor outside.

This time they were singing filk-songs.

Saturday morning I was up bright and early. My companions were still sleeping—Rick and Steve in bed, and Sherry slumbering in the place they'd so gallantly provided for her in the bathtub.

I tiptoed into the corridor without disturbing them and made my way downstairs. Strangely enough, the third floor was almost entirely deserted. The Art Show hadn't opened yet, the main meeting area was empty, and the only signs of life came from a smaller suite at the far end of the hall. As I stood near the doorway, listening to the feeble murmur of groaning voices, a tall man with a short mustache approached me.

"What's going on in there?" I asked.

"Sefwa meeting," he said. "Sef-who?"

"No—Sefwa. Science Fiction Writers of America. That's the group the professionals belong to."

I peered through the doorway at the small group huddled before a table which was set up at the end of the room. I recognized a few of the pale, drawn faces—Jerry Pournelle, Clifford Simak, James Gunn, Harry Harrison—as they mumbled to one another in hoarse whispers.

"What are they discussing?" I murmured.

"What do you suppose a science fiction writer would be discussing at this hour of the morning? Hangover remedies, of course."

I stared at my informant, and for the first time noticed the sheaf of magazines he clutched to his bosom, each bearing the gaudily-colored cover-painting of a horror-film star.

"Why, you must be Forry Ackerman!" I said.

He nodded, smiling.

I could only respond to the conditioned reflexes of my body. Beer had made me throw up; now, in the presence of this living legend, I had to gulp. Forrest J (no period) Ackerman is, of course, the best-known name in all the universe. From Aldebaran to Zoophilia his fame has spread; every sentient entity in the cosmos is aware of his fabulous fannish presence. And here I was, face to face with Mr. Science Fiction himself!

Suddenly all my resolutions vanished. Gone was my resolve to keep my real identity a secret, gone was the determination to maintain a false facade. If there was one person who deserved to know the truth, one person, who was equipped to fully appreciate an actual confrontation with an extraterrestial, one person who would be thrilled beyond measure by such a meeting—Forry Ackerman was that man. He alone would appreciate the historic significance of this meeting, and he deserved to know. I must tell him, now.

"Mr. Ackerman," I said. "Your interest in famous monsters is a matter of record. But have you ever met one in the flesh?"

"Certainly." Ackerman smiled. "Christopher Lee, Boris Karloff, Donald A. Wollheim—"

"I mean a real monster." I gulped again. "What would you say if you had an opportunity to meet a genuine creature from another world?"

Forry's eyes danced a frug of anticipation. "You aren't putting me on?" he said.

"Suppose I could arrange it?" I asked. "What would you do?"

"I'd interview him for my magazine, for one thing," Forry said. "And get his autograph, and take him to see my collection, and—"

His mounting excitement was interrupted by the voice of a small fan who rushed up to us, panting and breathless. "Oh, Mr. Ackerman," he gasped. "I've been looking for you! I've just come from the Film Room, and—"

He stood on tiptoe, whispering something in Forry's ear. Ackerman smiled, nodded, and started to turn away.

"Where are you going?" I murmured.

"You'll have to excuse me, I'm afraid," said Forry. "This young man informs me that they're starting to screen a movie, and I can't miss it."

"But what about meeting the monster—the interview—?"

"Sorry." Forry shook his head. "That will have to wait. They're showing Metropolis. I've only seen it four hundred and eighty-seven times, and I've got to catch it again."

"Please, Mr. Ackerman!" I tugged at his arm. "Stop and think! I'm not kidding you—a real live monster—"

Gently, Forry disengaged himself. "You just don't seem to understand us movie fans," he said.

I watched him, open-mouthed, as he moved off.

My hopes vanished with him. Now I'd never see his expression as I told him the truth about myself. There'd be no write-up in his magazine, and no egoboo for me.

Egoboo.

The word still burned in my brain. There had to be some other way of attaining recognition. Surely, in a science fiction convention of this size there were all sorts of chances to establish my importance.

I started off down the hall. It was almost noon now and the corridor was gradually filled with fannish figures.

From various side-rooms came the sound of voices. Meetings were in progress.

Standing just outside an open doorway was a young lady wearing a Trekkie T-shirt emblazoned with the legend, Friends, Romans and Mr. Spook—Lend me your ears.

I nodded at her as I approached. "What's going on inside?"

"Authors' panel," she told me.

My heart leaped. A science fiction writers' panel! Surely they, of all people, would be impressed if I revealed myself!

"What are they discussing?" I asked. "Alternate universes, other worlds, alien life-forms? Do you think they might be interested in actual contact with an extra-terrestial being?"

"You don't understand," said the girt. "These happen to be New Wave authors. They're talking about sex, and ecology, and sex, and relevancy."

Over her words the voice of one of the panelists boomed in my ears from a table-microphone. "Four-letter the editors!" he cried. "Four-letter the publishers!"

"Right on!" shouted a fellow-panelist. "Four-letter the agents and the distributors. And, while we're at it, four-letter the readers, too!"

There was a burst of wild applause from the audience. "Remember our slogan!" yelled the speaker. "Advocates of violence must be destroyed!" The girl turned to me and shrugged. "You see?" she said. "I hear," I told her. And moved off again. It was obvious that if I came up against the New Wave I wouldn't even create a ripple.

But there were other functions going on. Around the corner at the end of the corridor I found a meeting-room where another panel discussion was in progress. The group on the podium consisted entirely of females. Unobtrusively I edged my way to a chair at the rear.

A girl seated beside me turned and offered a disapproving stare.

"What are you doing here?" she whispered. "Don't you know this is a discussion-group for lady writers? They're speaking on Woman's Lib."

"That's interesting," I said. "I've studied a little psychology and I know the problems of a woman's libido—"

"Woman's Liberation!" she snapped. "Listen, and maybe you'll learn something."

A strikingly-handsome young woman was addressing the audience over the microphone.

"It's a conspiracy!" she declared. "Everyone knows that Hugo Gernsback was a male-chauvinist pig. Ever since he started his science fiction magazine, the field has been totally usurped by men! They ignore the contributions of all the great women science fiction writers—from Mary Wollestonecraft Shelley to Julia Verne, Alice Huxley, Georgette Orwell, Roberta Heinfein and Kate Vonnegut, Jr. Just remember, it was we who put the Gal in Galaxy!"

I felt a surge of sympathy as she continued.

"We are entitled to proper recognition for our work, even if we have to girlcott every publisher in the field. We must take a stand against such masculine inventions as manned space-flights and the U.S. Mail Service! Forget history—what about herstory?"

It was all too true, and I found myself nodding in agreement. Not that nodding would help. There would have to be a more positive contribution, and suddenly the thought occurred to me—maybe I could make it. Even in this altered body of mine, I still retained certain powers. For example, if I glixxed—

Her voice rose shrilly. “Speaking for myself, I want—I am entitled—to everything a man has!”

She was right. I sat there, vorching, as her shrill voice continued.

So I glixxed her.

Suddenly the shrill voice deepened. She paused in mid-sentence, staring down at herself, and I knew I’d succeeded in granting her wish.

She knew it too—and so did the audience—as her hand went to her face and encountered the full beard.

As the crowd stared, pointed, milled and murmured in confusion, the speaker ran out of the room—perhaps she was going to get a shave.

I took advantage of the distraction to slip away myself. But at least I had the satisfaction of knowing I’d done one positive thing for the Woman’s Lib Movement; certainly the speaker had moved quickly enough.

There was just one thing wrong; I still didn’t have any personal egoboo. Next time I wouldn’t be so modest about my achievements—if there was a next time.

Wandering through the now-crowded corridor, I halted at the entrance to another meeting room, attracted by the imposing figure of a young man wearing a metal helmet, a coat of chainmail, and an iron truss.

“Pardon me, sir,” I said. “What’s happening here?”

He stared at me in surprise. “You mean you haven’t heard of out group—the Society For Anachronistic Creativity?”

Something about the name rang a bell. “Isn’t that the organization whose members dress up in medieval costumes—young people interested in the Middle Ages? Don’t they have tourneys and trials by combat with swords?”

He nodded. “Some of us have duet personalities,” he explained.

“Sounds familiar,” I told him. “I must have read about one of your leaders; I think it was John Carter of Mars.”

“You mean Lin Carter, don’t you?” He gestured towards the assemblage. “He’s inside with the others.”

I entered, gazing in astonishment at the crowd of fans wearing knightly garb as though it were a daily Recurrence. Never have I seen such’an array of gorgets, tippets, nasars, bassinets, jupons, baudricks, pauldrons and palletes; just looking at them brought on an acute case of metal-fatigue.

It made me feel almost naked to appear here without armor, but instead of skulking in the rear of the room I took a seat right down in front before the platform. The first step towards obtaining egoboo is to be noticed, and this time I resolved to attract attention.

But at the moment everyone gazed, through their visards at the speaker. The gentleman on the platform proudly identified himself as an aide-de-camp to L. Sprague deCamp, and he was expounding about a literary genre known as sword-and-sorcery.

Many of his references were unfamiliar to me—he kept mentioning characters called Fafhreds, Grey Mousers, and either an ancient hero or a modern villain whose name was Cohen the Barbarian. But I gathered that these stories dealt with combats between brawny adventurers and scrawny wizards—muscles versus magic. And something about the very phrase, sword-and-sorcery, sparked a notion of my own.

“Of course you must remember,” the speaker continued, “that what we are dealing with here is pure fantasy, which has nothing to do with science fiction.”

Before I realized it, my mind was made up and I was on my feet. “Not so!” I shouted.

The speaker frowned down at me. “What do you mean?” he said. “It’s all myth and legend. Running people through with swords—using spells and incantations—surely this isn’t the scientific approach?”

“Nothing is impossible,” I told him. “Swords exist, and so does sorcery.”

By this time the audience was staring at me. I felt the first heady pulsations of egoboo emanating from their interest, and it intoxicated me.

“Here!” I shouted, leaping to the platform. “Let me give you a demonstration.”

The speaker had unbuckled his weapon—a long, two-edged, lethal-looking blade—and placed it on the table before him. Now I snatched it up and waved it.

“This is a sword,” I said. “Now, observe!”

And before he could move, I drove the deadly steel full-length into his chest.

As he staggered and fell back, the audience rose, screaming.

“And now, the sorcery!”

I was yelling at the top of my voice, but nobody heard me amidst the screams of the crowd.

Quickly, I glixxed the speaker, pulling the blade from his chest and leaving him unharmed; without as much as a scratch to show for his ordeal.

But no one saw my magic; the entire assemblage had turned tail and fled the room, their armor rattling in fright and flight.

And now, as the speaker gaped at me, open-mouthed, I realized I’d better follow their example.

“Help—murder—police!” he cried.

if he was offering me a choice, I’d take help. And the best way to help myself was to flee through the small door at the rear of the platform.

I found myself in another corridor, and quickly lost myself again around the corner, far from the madding crowd.

Just to make certain of my escape I took the stairway up to the next floor. Here I halted and looked around, catching my breath and reassembling my scattered wits.

This, I realized, was apparently not the way to gain egoboo. All I’d succeeded in doing was frightening those fans out of their wits. If I wanted their acclaim, I’d have to offer them something more constructive. Next time I must remember to do something helpful.

And there had to be a next time, soon, before I got a reputation as a trouble-maker.

With that resolve I started off down the hail. As luck would have it, I blundered into a meeting of First Fandom.

For the benefit of those who are unfamiliar with the term. First Fandom consists of a group whose affiliation with science fiction goes back to before 1940—people like Dave Kyle, Jack Williamson, Doc Barrett and Lou Tabakow. They gather annually at the Worldcons to reminisce about the Sense of Wonder, the Golden Age of Science Fiction, and the good old days when they were young.

As I listened to them crying into their Geritol about their misspent youth and how they wished they'd misspent more of it, I was seized with a kindly impulse.

And two minutes later I was running down the corridor once more. Behind me I heard only boos, not egoboo.

Somehow I'd goofed again.

This time I didn't stop scurrying until I was back downstairs. Here it was my intention to lose myself in the crowd, but almost immediately I sensed that several fans were eyeing me suspiciously. Apparently rumors were already flying, and—from the way they muttered and pointed—might soon be followed by fists.

Unwilling to provoke a scene, I ducked into the nearest side-door and found myself in the Huckster Room.

The Huckster Room, for your information, is where the dealers set up their displays of fannish merchandise for sale—artwork, sculptures, movie memorabilia, comic books, foreign reprints and rare first editions of science fiction, and old magazines, dating back to the days when Doc Smith was only an interne.

It was fascinating to see the pulps in which science fiction started—truly a Weird, Amazing, Fantastic, Startling and Astounding array—and I couldn't help but respond to the Thrilling Wonder of it all.

Wandering down the aisles between the tables, I was inflamed by a desire to possess some of these goodies. Surely there could be no better souvenir of my visit than a genuine autographed copy of The Outsider And Others or a mint copy of a 1922 Mickey Mouse Comics.

I paused before a display of old horror-pulps and gazed greedily at titles known and loved by every trufan: Spicy Mystery, Salty Terror, and Over-Seasoned Adventure. Suddenly I discovered the prize of them all—a Volume One, Number One issue of Sexy Science, with its famous cover illustration of a naked girl attacking a bug-eyed monster.

The dealer behind the table, a bit of a bug-eyed monster himself, leered at me and drooled encouragingly.

“That’s Warm-Hearted Walter,” whispered a teen-age fan at my side. “A hard man to do business with. He’s still got the first nickel he ever stole.”

“I don’t care,” I told him. “I’ve got to have this magazine!”

“I warn you,” said the fan. “It’ll cost you an arm and a leg.”

“No problem,” I said.

I was just starting to remove my arm when Sherry grabbed me from behind.

“So here you are!” she panted. “Come with me!”

“In a moment—I’ve got business to attend to—”

“No you don’t!” Sherry tugged at my shoulder. “We know all about your business.”

Rick and Steve moved up on either side, apprehension in their eyes, and pulled me away.

“Hurry,” Sherry murmured. “We’ve got to get you out of here before they find you!”

“They?”

“Don’t try to cop out,” Steve said. “Everybody’s heard about that hairy session with the women authors, and your run-in with the sword-and-sorcery people.”

They hustled me down the hail to the back stairs.

“Better take these and keep out of sight,” Rick said.

“But I haven’t done anything—”

“Oh no? What about the First Fandom meeting?” He glared at me accusingly as we mounted the steps.

“I can explain,” I said. “When I heard all those elderly parties saying they wished they were young again, I just decided to help—”

“Turning them into babies was a bad idea,” Sherry told me. “I understand they’ve already had to change Sam Moskowitz’s diapers three times.”

“Maybe I was a bit hasty.” I sighed, turning to Rick. “Where are you taking me?”

“To the room. You’ll be safe there. Besides, we’ve got to get our costumes ready for the Masquerade.”

“The Masquerade?” I brightened. “This I’ve got to see.”

“No way,” Steve told me. “You’re going to keep out of sight. If anyone spots you now, there’ll be real trouble.”

“But I can’t miss the Masquerade,” I said. “It’s one of the highlights of the convention!” I nodded at Steve. “Couldn’t I come with you if I were a costume too? Then nobody would recognize me.”

“That’s a thought,” he conceded. “Let’s see what we can do.”

And we did. Once in the room, the trio donned their outfits. Sherry dressed as a witch, Rick put on a spacesuit, and Steve struggled into a metallic robot costume.

“What about me?” I said.

Sherry yanked a sheet off the bed. “You can wear this,” she said.

“Who am I supposed to be—a member of the Ku Klux Klan?”

“You’re a ghost, silly! Go ahead, put it on!” She nodded approvingly. “Now you’re safe. Nobody wilt recognize you.”

“But I want egoboo—”

“Never mind that. You’re sticking with us, understand? And don’t do anything to attract attention. When your turn comes, just walk across the stage.”

“Just wearing a ghost costume won’t win me a prize,” I protested. “I should have some kind of an act. Maybe! could speak—”

"You don't even say boo!" Sherry told me, firmly.

"How about letting me sing, then?"

"Out of the question," Rick said. "We don't have any sheet-music."

Steve glanced at his watch. "Time to go," he said. "Now remember—you stay undercover."

The auditorium was crowded. We stood backstage amidst a motley crew of mummies, zombies, warlocks, galactic explorers and characters from famous science fiction epics. And as I stared through the eyeholes of my sheet, the Masquerade began. A committee-member handed each of us a number, and when it was called, its owner paraded out before the footlights.

At first I was excited, but as the affair continued I began to feel a twinge of disappointment.

Quite frankly, I'd expected more than this prosaic procession of armed warriors, bearded enchanters and members of the Star Trek crew. And the costumes seemed duplicated time and again. Sherry and Rick and Steve proceeded me, but I knew they didn't stand a chance. There were a dozen other witches, a score of space-men, and a whole regiment of robots. And now, as I glanced around at those remaining to be called out, I noted a host of ghosts. I wouldn't win a prize either, unless—

Unless what?

I'd given my word not to speak or sing or open my mouth in any way to attract attention. And I didn't have a little act worked up; a routine to impress the audience.

As a matter of fact, none of the contestants impressed me. Wenches and warlocks were all very appropriate to a fantasy festival, but this was supposed to be a Masquerade of science fiction.

Something was missing. Where were all the aliens—the extraterrestials?

Under the sheet, stupid!

The thought hit me then—just as my number was called, and Sherry pushed me out under the glare of the lights. For a moment I stood before the crowd, debating what to do, then summoned my resolution. A vision of Sexy Science flashed before my eyes, and concentrating on It, I glixxed myself.

Then, flinging my sheet aside, I flashed.

Just for a second I stood revealed to the audience with my green, scaly body, my four arms, six legs, and bulging eyes covered with cockroaches. There I was, complete to the last detail—the bug-eyed monster from the magazine cover.

Then I felt Rick and Steve lifting me from behind and hauling me offstage into the far wings.

"Put me down!" I yelled, as I glixxed back into human form again. "Hey—where are you taking me?"

"Away. And we'd better hurry!" Sherry was beside me, gesturing towards an exit leading into the outer corridor. As we hastened to the elevator the babble of voices from the auditorium faded.

Rick pressed the button. As the car-doors closed and the elevator ascended, he sighed in relief, then faced me. "You did it again," he said. "And here I thought we could trust you!"

"I only wanted to win a prize," I told him.

Sherry shook her head. "Obviously you don't know anything about Masquerades," she said. "The judges already had made up their minds—I heard them talking backstage. Third prize goes to the girl with the plunging neckline, second prize to the girl with the bare breasts. And first prize goes to the girl who came out naked. They always win!"

"And you're a loser," Steve muttered. "Unless we protect you. I can just see what will happen if we let you run around loose any longer. Next thing we know you'll be showing up at the Count Dracula Society meeting as a vampire. You'll go to the Burroughs Bibliophile luncheon and turn into a gorilla. And what will we do if you attend the Georgette Heyer tea and decide to turn into Georgette Heyer?"

The elevator halted and the doors slid open.

"Come on," said Rick. "Let's go."

I hesitated. "Where are you taking me?"

“To Suite 16,” Sherry said. “You’ll be in safe hands there.”

They led me to a door at the far end of the hall and Rick knocked.

“What’s the password?” demanded a muffled voice from within the room.

“Beam,” Rick murmured.

Instantly the door flew open and there, confronting us, was a tall, kindly-looking gentleman with a smiling face.

“Meet Bob Tucker,” said Sherry.

“Bob Tucker?” I gasped. My knees began to tremble. And well they might, for this was indeed a Big Name Fan, a true Secret Master, a veritable Elder God of Fandom. Impulsively, I dropped to my knees and kissed his hand.

Ignoring me graciously, Tucker turned and listened as Sherry whispered in his ear.

“Eight.” Tucker nodded. “Leave everything to me.”

Sherry beckoned to Rick and Steve. They followed her to the door.

“Where are you going?” I cried.

“Never mind, they’ll be back,” Tucker said, closing the door behind them. “Now stop worrying. Sherry explained what happened, and I understand. There’s nothing to be afraid of—I’ll take care of you.”

“But I want to see the rest of the Convention,” I said. “Saturday night is supposed to be the time for the riots, the smoke-filled rooms—”

“We can have our own riot right here,” Tucker assured me, producing a cigar. “And I guarantee to fill this room with smoke in thirty seconds. Now come on—you and I are going to have a little drink.”

Turning, he lifted a bottle from the bureau and filled two glasses with fluid colored like darkly-shining brass.

“That’s not beer, is it?” I said. “Beer makes me sick.”

Tucker shook his head. “Have no fear, this isn’t beer.” He handed a glass to me and raised his own. “Drink up,” he said. “It’s smo-ooooo-th!”

“Smo-ooooo-th!” I echoed.

Tilting the glass to my lips, I drank.

Smo-ooooo-thly, the liquor gurgled down into my stomach. Smo-ooooo-thly the room spun round and round. Smo-ooooo-thly my eyes closed and I fell back upon the bed. Smo-ooooo-thly I passed out.

When I came to again, it was seven o'clock, Sunday night.

What more can I say? They'd tricked me, all of them, but I understood. It had been done with good intentions, to keep me out of further peril. I bore them no ill-will.

But now, as I opened my eyes and found myself alone in Suite 16, I was seized with a dreadful realization.

The climax of the Worldcon—the Hugo Awards Banquet—was scheduled to start promptly at six p.m. And I was missing it!

Tottering to my feet—none too smo-ooooo-thly—I staggered to the door. Nobody barred my way, and the corridor beyond was silent and deserted.

I raced to the elevator, descended to the third floor, and found myself caught up in the crowd pressing its way into the banquet-hall. Fortunately, everyone was so intent on entering and my presence passed unnoticed. But from remarks I heard, I gathered the actual banquet meal was ended. Now, as the waiters hasten to pick up the remains of the rubber chicken and took it away for retreads, the non-attendees were being allowed into the hall to hear the speeches and the award ceremonies.

Mingling with the mob, I found a place at the back of the room and stared past the audience, admiring the distinguished figures on the dias. Some of them I recognized—Joanna Russ, Frank Herbert, A.E. van Vogt, Hal Clement—names to conjure with. As a matter of fact, the entire assemblage was packed with notables; the artists, editors, authors and fans who had created this unique phenomenon of science fiction. I felt a warm glow steal over me as I observed them—almost as warm a glow as I'd gotten from Bob Tucker's smo-oooo-th concoction.

No doubt about it; this was an intoxicating moment.

And when the toastmaster stood up to present the Hugo Awards for the best work in the field for the past year, I found myself listening spellbound —nodding in accord as he stressed the fact that while only one award was given in each category, all of the nominees were winners.

He began to read off names and hand out the trophies—two-foot high metal figures of space-rockets, gleaming and sharply pointed at the end—I felt a surge of sentiment. Not just for the recipients, but for all those present here; all these wonderful fans and pros who had made this weekend memorable to me. Oh, earthlings are primitive, their ways and ceremonies are childish—but people like these, inspired infants striving to reach the stars—are truly the hope of the future.

All at once I realized that my craving for egoboo had vanished. The petty desire for personal attention was gone, and in its place was an unselfish appreciation of the whole of science fiction fandom. Maybe the so-called serious scientific world mocked their make-believe, but out of their imagination would come the reality which would raise mankind to the limits of outer space. If there was only some way I could express my gratitude—

Too late.

Something pulsed inside my human skull. A message, telling me my vacation was over. The vroob had grocefed down to the hotel roof, arriving right on schedule, and I must join it there to scrinch home.

Silently, I slipped away. Quickly, I ascended the elevator to the topmost floor where a skylight led me to the rooftop.

I entered the ship, and we got ready to go into a blik.

No time to thank Sherry and Rick and Steve for what they'd done; no time to thank all the others who'd helped to give me such a marvelous experience. Too late.

Or was it?

As we started to scrinch, inspiration seized me. I remembered what the toastmaster had said, about all the nominees deserving Hugos. Why stop there?

Suppose everyone—everyone there at the banquet—got a Hugo for their very own?

That was one way of saying thanks.

Quickly, I went into a glix. Too quickly, perhaps.

For as we swooped down past the hotel, I caught a glimpse of the banquet-hail through the windows. Everyone was screaming and jumping to their feet, as if in a standing ovation. But that wasn't the reason.

Apparently, in my haste, I'd made a slight error. I'd glixxed everybody a Hugo under their seat—forgetting that, in English, the words "chair" and "seat" are not necessarily synonymous.

Anyway, I could only hope they got the point.

And as we scrinched off I smiled, happy with my memories of the past and hopeful with my expectations of the future. After all, they tell me these Worldcons are annual affairs.

I can hardly wait for next year. . . .

A Most Unusual Murder

It all started outside an especially curious curiosity shop in London's Saxe-Coburg Square . . . and ended in a shabby lodging at 17 Dorcas Lane, the two friends drawn there by a famous mystery and themselves becoming part of the terrible legend . . .

O*nly the dead know Brooklyn.*

Thomas Wolfe said that, and he's dead now, so he ought to know.

London, of course, is a different story.

At least that's the way Hilary Kane thought of it. Not as a story, perhaps, but rather as an old-fashioned, outsize picaresque novel in which every street was a chapter crammed with characters and incidents of its own. Each block a page, each structure a separate paragraph unto itself within the sprawling, tangled plot—such was Hilary Kane's concept of the city, and he knew it well.

Over the years he strolled the pavements, reading the city sentence by sentence until every line was familiar; he'd learned London by heart.

And that's why he was so startled when, one bleak afternoon late in November, he discovered the shop in Saxe-Coburg Square. "I'll be damned!" he said.

"Probably." Lester Woods, his companion, took the edge off the affirmation with an indulgent smile. "What's the problem?"

“This.” Kane gestured towards the tiny window of the establishment nestled inconspicuously between two residential relics of Victoria’s day.

“An antique place.” Woods nodded. “At the rate they’re springing up there must be at least one for every tourist in London.”

“But not here.” Kane frowned. “I happen to have come by this way less than a week ago, and I’d swear there was no shop in the Square.”

“Then it must have opened since.” The two men moved up to the entrance, glancing through the display window in passing.

Kane’s frown deepened. “You call this new? Look at the dust on those goblets.”

“Playing detective again, eh?” Woods shook his head. “Trouble with you, Hilary, is that you have too many hobbies.” He glanced across the Square as a chill wind heralded the coming of twilight. “Getting late—we’d better move along.”

“Not until I find out about this.”

Kane was already opening the door and Woods sighed. “The game is afoot, I suppose. All right, let’s get it over with.”

The shop-bell tinkled and the two men stepped inside. The door closed, the tinkling stopped, and they stood in the shadows and the silence.

But one of the shadows was not silent. It rose from behind the single counter in the small space before the rear wall.

“Good afternoon, gentlemen,” said the shadow. And switched on an overhead light. It cast a dim nimbus over the countertop and gave dimension to the shadow, revealing the substance of a diminutive figure with an unremarkable face beneath a balding brow.

Kane addressed the proprietor. “Mind if we have a look?”

“Is there any special area of interest?” The proprietor gestured toward the shelves lining the wall behind him. “Books, maps, china, crystal?”

“Not really,” Kane said. “It’s just that I’m always curious about a new shop of this sort—”

The proprietor shook his head. “Begging your pardon, but it’s hardly new.”

Woods glanced at his friend with a barely suppressed smile, but Kane ignored him.

"Odd," Kane said. "I've never noticed this place before."

"Quite so. I've been in business a good many years, but this is a new location."

Now it was Kane's turn to glance quickly at Woods, and his smile was not suppressed. But Woods was already eyeing the artifacts on display, and after a moment Kane began his own inspection.

Peering at the shelving beneath the glass counter, he made a rapid inventory. He noted a boudoir lamp with a beaded fringe, a lavaliere, a tray of pearly buttons, a durbar souvenir programme, and a framed and inscribed photograph of Matilda Alice Victoria Wood aka Bella Delmare aka Marie Lloyd. There was a miscellany of old jewelry, hunting-watches, pewter mugs, napkin rings, a toy bank in the shape of a miniature Crystal Palace, and a display poster of a formidably mustached Lord Kitchener with his gloved finger extended in a gesture of imperious command.

It was, he decided, the mixture as before. Nothing unusual, and most of it—like the Kitchener poster—not even properly antique but merely outmoded. Those fans on the bottom shelf, for example, and the silk toppers, the opera glasses, the black bag in the far comer covered with what was once called "American cloth."

Something about the phrase caused Kane to stoop and make a closer inspection. American cloth. Dusty now, but once shiny, like the tarnished silver nameplate identifying its owner. He read the inscription.

J. Ridley, MD.

Kane looked up, striving to conceal his sudden surge of excitement.

Impossible! It couldn't be—and yet it was. Keeping his voice and gesture carefully casual, he indicated the bag to the proprietor.

"A medical kit?"

"Yes, I imagine so."

"Might I ask where you acquired it?"

The little man shrugged. “Hard to remember. In this line one picks up the odd item here and there over the years.”

“Might I have a look at it, please?”

The elderly proprietor lifted the bag to the countertop. Woods stared at it, puzzled, but Kane ignored him, his gaze intent on the nameplate below the lock. “Would you mind opening it?” he said.

“I’m afraid I don’t have a key.”

Kane reached out and pressed the lock; it was rusted, but firmly fixed. Frowning, he lifted the bag and shook it gently.

Something jiggled inside, and as he heard the click of metal against metal his elation peaked. Somehow he suppressed it as he spoke.

“How much are you asking?”

The proprietor was equally emotionless. “Not for sale.”

“But—”

“Sorry, sir. It’s against my policy to dispose of blind items. And since there’s no telling what’s inside—”

“Look, it’s only an old medical bag. I hardly imagine it contains the Crown jewels.”

In the background Woods snickered, but the proprietor ignored him. “Granted,” he said. “But one can’t be certain of the contents.” Now the little man lifted the bag and once again there was a clicking sound. “Coins, perhaps.”

“Probably just surgical instruments,” Kane said impatiently. “Why don’t you force the lock and settle the matter?”

“Oh, I couldn’t do that. It would destroy its value.”

“What value?” Kane’s guard was down now; he knew he’d made a tactical error but he couldn’t help himself.

The proprietor smiled. “I told you the bag is not for sale.”

“Everything has its price.”

Kane’s statement was a challenge, and the proprietor’s smile broadened as he met it. “One hundred pounds.”

“A hundred pounds for that?” Woods grinned—then gaped at Kane’s response.

“Done and done.”

“But, sir—”

For answer Kane drew out his wallet and extracted five twenty-pound notes. Placing them on the countertop, he lifted the bag and moved toward the door. Woods followed hastily, turning to close the door behind him.

The proprietor gestured. “Wait—come back—”

But Kane was already hurrying down the street, clutching the black bag under his arm.

He was still clutching it half an hour later as Woods moved with him into the spacious study of Kane’s flat overlooking the verdant vista of Cadogan Square. Dappled splotches of sunlight reflected from the gleaming oilcloth as Kane set the bag on the table and carefully wiped away the film of dust with a dampened rag. He smiled triumphantly at Woods.

“Looks a bit better now, don’t you think?”

“I don’t think anything.” Woods shook his head. “A hundred pounds for an old medical kit—”

“A very old medical kit,” said Kane. “Dates back to the Eighties, if I’m not mistaken.”

“Even so, I hardly see—”

“Of course you wouldn’t! I doubt if anyone besides myself would attach much significance to the name of J. Ridley, M.D.”

“Never heard of him.”

“That’s understandable.” Kane smiled. “He preferred to call himself Jack the Ripper.”

“Jack the Ripper?”

“Surely you know the case. Whitechapel, 1888—the savage slaying and mutilation of prostitutes by a cunning mass-murderer who taunted the police—a shadow, stalking his prey in the streets.”

Woods frowned. “But he was never caught, was he? Not even identified.”

“In that you’re mistaken. No murderer has been identified quite as frequently as Red Jack. At the time of the crimes and over the years since, a score of suspects were named. A prime candidate was the Pole, Klosowski, alias George Chapman, who killed several wives—but poison was his method and gain his motive whereas the Ripper’s victims were all penniless prostitutes who died under the knife. Another convicted murderer, Neil Cream, even openly proclaimed he was the Ripper—”

“Wouldn’t that be the answer, then?”

Kane shrugged. “Unfortunately, Cream happened to be in America at the time of the Ripper murders. Egomania prompted his false confession.” He shook his head. “Then there was John Pizer, a bookbinder known by the nickname of ‘Leather Apron’—he was actually arrested, but quickly cleared and released. Some think the killings were the work of a Russian called Konovalov who also went by the name of Pedachenko and worked as a barber’s surgeon; supposedly he was a Tsarist secret agent who perpetrated the slayings to discredit the British police.”

“Sounds pretty far-fetched if you ask me.”

“Exactly.” Kane smiled. “But there are other candidates, equally improbable. Montague John Druitt for one, a barrister of unsound mind who drowned himself in the Thames shortly after the last Ripper murder. Unfortunately, it has been established that he was living in Bournemouth, and on the days before and after the final slaying he was there, playing cricket. Then there was the Duke of Clarence—”

“Who?”

“Queen Victoria’s grandson in direct line of succession to the throne.”

“Surely you’re not serious?”

“No, but others are. It has been asserted that Clarence was a known deviate who suffered from insanity as the result of venereal infection, and that his death in 1892 was actually due to the ravages of his disease.”

“But that doesn’t prove him to be the Ripper.”

“Quite so. It hardly seems possible that he could write the letters filled with American slang and crude errors in grammar and spelling which the Ripper sent to the authorities; letters containing information which could be known only by the murderer and the police. More to the point, Clarence was in Scotland at the time of one of the killings and at Sandringham when others took place. And there are equally firm reasons for exonerating suggested suspects close to him—his friend James Stephen and his physician, Sir William Gull.”

“You’ve really studied up on this,” Woods murmured. “I’d no idea you were so keen on it.”

“And for good reason. I wasn’t about to make a fool of myself by advancing an untenable notion. I don’t believe the Ripper was a seaman, as some surmise, for there’s not a scintilla of evidence to back the theory. Nor do I think the Ripper was a slaughterhouse worker, a midwife, a man disguised as a woman, or a London bobby. And I doubt the very existence of a mysterious physician named Dr. Stanley, out to avenge himself against the woman who had infected him, or his son.”

“But there do seem to be a great number of medical men amongst the suspects,” Woods said.

“Right you are, and for good reason. Consider the nature of the crimes—the swift and skillful removal of vital organs, accomplished in the darkness of the streets under constant danger of imminent discovery. All this implies the discipline of someone versed in anatomy, someone with the cool nerves of a practising surgeon. Then too there’s the matter of escaping detection. The Ripper obviously knew the alleys and byways of the East End so thoroughly that he could slip through police cordons and patrols without discovery. But if seen, who would have a better alibi than a respectable physician, carrying a medical bag on an emergency call late at night?

“With that in mind, I set about my search, examining the rolls of London Hospital in Whitechapel Road. I went over the names of physicians and surgeons listed in the Medical Registry for that period.”

“All of them?”

“It wasn’t necessary. I knew what I was looking for—a surgeon who lived and practised in the immediate Whitechapel area. Whenever possible, I followed up with a further investigation of my suspects’ histories—researching hospital and clinic affiliations, even hobbies and background activities from medical journals, press reports, and family records. Of course, all this takes a great deal of time and patience. I must have been tilting at this windmill for a good five years before I found my man.”

Woods glanced at the nameplate on the bag. “J. Ridley, M.D.?”

“John Ridley. Jack, to his friends—if he had any.” Kane paused, thoughtful. “But that’s just the point. Ridley appears to have had no friends, and no family. An orphan, he received his degree from Edinburgh in 1878, ten years before the date of the murders. He set up private practise here in London, but there is no office address listed. Nor is there any further information to be found concerning him; it’s as though he took particular care to suppress every detail of his personal and private life. This, of course, is what roused my suspicions. For an entire decade J. Ridley lived and practised in the East End without a single mention of his name anywhere in print, except for his Registry listing. And after 1888, even that disappeared.”

“Suppose he died?”

Woods shrugged. “Perhaps he moved, emigrated, took sick, abandoned practise?”

“Then why the secrecy? Why conceal his whereabouts? Don’t you see—it’s the very lack of such ordinary details which leads me to suspect the extraordinary.”

“But that’s not evidence. There’s no proof that your Dr. Ridley was the Ripper.”

“That’s why this is so important.” Kane indicated the bag on the tabletop. “If we knew its history, where it came from—”

As he spoke, Kane reached down and picked up a brass letter-opener from the table, then moved to the bag.

“Wait.” Woods put a restraining hand on Kane’s shoulder. “That may not be necessary.”

“What do you mean?”

“I think the shopkeeper was lying. He knew what the bag contains—he had to, or else why did he fix such a ridiculous price? He never dreamed you’d take him up on it, of course. But there’s no need for you to force the lock any more than there was for him to do so. My guess is that he has a key.”

“You’re right.” Kane set the letter-opener down. “I should have realized, if I’d taken the time to consider his reluctance. He must have the key.” He lifted the shiny bag and turned. “Come along—let’s get back to him before the shop closes. And this time we won’t be put off by any excuses.”

Dusk had descended as Kane and his companion hastened through the streets, and darkness was creeping across the deserted silence of Saxe-Coburg Square when they arrived.

They halted then, staring into the shadows, seeking the spot where the shop nestled between the residences looming on either side. The shadows were deeper here and they moved closer, only to stare again at the empty gap between the two buildings.

The shop was gone.

Woods blinked, then turned and gestured to Kane. “But we were here—we saw it—”

Kane didn’t reply. He was staring at the dusty, rubble-strewn surface of the space between the structures; at the weeds which sprouted from the bare ground beneath. A chill night wind echoed through the emptiness. Kane stooped and sifted a pinch of dust between his fingers. The dust was cold, like the wind that whirled the fine grains from his hand and blew them away into the darkness.

“What happened?” Woods was murmuring. “Could we both have dreamed—”

Kane stood erect, facing his friend. “This isn’t a dream,” he said, gripping the black bag.

“Then what’s the answer?”

“I don’t know.” Kane frowned thoughtfully. “But there’s only one place where we can possibly find it.”

“Where?”

“The 1888 Medical Registry lists the address of John Ridley as Number 17 Dorcas Lane.”

The cab which brought them to Dorcas Lane could not enter its narrow accessway. The dim alley beyond was silent and empty, but Kane plunged into it without hesitation, moving along the dark passage between solid rows of grimy brick. Treading over the cobblestones, it seemed to Woods that he was being led into another era, yet Kane’s progress was swift and unfaltering.

“You’ve been here before?” Woods said.

“Of course.” Kane halted before the unlighted entrance to Number 17, then knocked.

The door opened—not fully, but just enough to permit the figure behind it to peer out at them. Both glance and greeting were guarded.

“Whatcher want?”

Kane stepped into the fan of light from the partial opening. “Good evening. Remember me?”

“Yes.” The door opened wider and Woods could see the squat shadow of the middle-aged woman who nodded up at his companion. “Yer the one what rented the back vacancy last Bank ’oliday, ain’tcher?”

“Right. I was wondering if I might have it again.”

“I dunno.” The woman glanced at Woods.

“Only for a few hours.” Kane reached for his wallet. “My friend and I have a business matter to discuss.”

“Business, eh?” Woods felt the unflattering appraisal of the landlady’s beady eyes. “Cost you a fiver.”

“Here you are.”

A hand extended to grasp the note. Then the door opened fully, revealing the dingy hall and the stairs beyond.

“Mind the steps now,” the landlady said.

The stairs were steep and the woman was puffing as they reached the upper landing. She led them along the creaking corridor to the door at the rear, fumbling for the keys in her apron.

“ ’Ere we are.”

The door opened on musty darkness, scarcely dispelled by the faint illumination of the overhead fixture as she switched it on. The landlady nodded at Kane. “I don’t rent this for lodgings no more—it ain’t properly made up.”

“Quite all right.” Kane smiled, his hand on the door.

“If there’s anything you’ll be needing, best tell me now. I’ve got to run over to the neighbor for a bit—she’s been took ill.”

“I’m sure we’ll manage.” Kane closed the door, then listened for a moment as the landlady’s footsteps receded down the hall.

“Well,” he said. “What do you think?”

Woods surveyed the shabby room with its single window framed by yellowing curtains. He noted the faded carpet with its pattern wellnigh worn away, the marred and chipped surfaces of the massive old bureau and heavy morris-chair, the brass bed covered with a much-mended spread, the ancient gas-log in the fireplace framed by a cracked marble mantelpiece, and the equally-cracked washstand fixture in the corner.

“I think you’re out of your mind,” Woods said. “Did I understand correctly that you’ve been here before?”

“Exactly. I came several months ago, as soon as I found the address in the Registry. I wanted a look around.”

Woods wrinkled his nose. “More to smell than there is to see.”

“Use your imagination, man! Doesn’t it mean anything to you that you’re standing in the very room once occupied by Jack the Ripper?”

Woods shook his head. “There must be a dozen rooms to let in this old barn. What makes you think this is the right one?”

“The Registry entry specified ‘rear’. And there are no rear accommodations downstairs—that’s where the kitchen is located. So this has to be the place.”

Kane gestured. “Think of it—you may be looking at the very sink where the Ripper washed away the traces of his butchery, the bed in which he slept after his dark deeds were performed! Who knows what sights this room has seen and heard—the voice crying out in a tormented nightmare—”

“Come off it, Hilary!” Woods grimaced impatiently. “It’s one thing to use your imagination, but quite another to let your imagination use you.”

“Look.” Kane pointed to the far corner of the room. “Do you see those indentations in the carpet? I noticed them when I examined this room on my previous visit. What do they suggest to you?” Woods peered dutifully at the worn surface of the carpet, noting the four round, evenly spaced marks. “Must have been another piece of furniture in that corner. Something heavy, I’d say.”

“But what sort of furniture?”

“Well—” Woods considered. “Judging from the space, it wasn’t a sofa or chair. Could have been a cabinet, perhaps a large desk—”

“Exactly. A rolltop desk. Every doctor had one in those days.” Kane sighed. “I’d give a pretty penny to know what became of that item. It might have held the answer to all our questions.”

“After all these years? Not bloody likely.” Woods glanced away. “Didn’t find anything else, did you?”

“I’m afraid not. As you say, it’s been a long time since the Ripper stayed here.”

“I didn’t say that.” Woods shook his head. “You may be right about the desk. And no doubt the Medical Registry gives a correct address. But all it means is that this room may once have been rented by a Dr. John Ridley. You’ve already inspected it once—why bother to come back?”

“Because now I have this.” Kane placed the black bag on the bed. “And this.” He produced a pocket-knife.

“You intend to force the lock after all?”

“In the absence of a key I have no alternative.” Kane wedged the blade under the metal guard and began to pry upwards. “It’s important that the bag be opened here. Something it contains may very well be associated with this room. If we recognize the connection we might have an additional clue, a conclusive link—”

The lock snapped.

As the bag sprang open, the two men stared down at its contents—the jumble of vials and pillboxes, the clumsy old-style stethescope, the probes and tweezers, the roll of gauze. And, resting atop it, the scalpel with the steel-tipped surface encrusted with brownish stains.

They were still staring as the door opened quietly behind them and the balding, elderly little man entered the room.

“I see my guess was correct, gentlemen. You too have read the Medical Registry.” He nodded. “I was hoping I’d find you here.”

Kane frowned. “What do you want?”

“I’m afraid I must trouble you for my bag.”

“But it’s my property now—I bought it.”

The little man sighed. “Yes, and I was a fool to permit it. I thought putting on that price would dissuade you. How was I to know you were a collector like myself?”

“Collector?”

“Of curiosa pertaining to murder.” The little man smiled. “A pity you cannot see some of the memorabilia I’ve acquired. Not the commonplace items associated with your so-called Black Museum in Scotland Yard, but true rarities with historical significance.” He gestured. “The silver jar in which the notorious French sorceress, La Voisin, kept her poisonous ointments, the actual dirks which dispatched the unfortunate nephews of Richard III in the Tower—yes, even the poker responsible for the atrocious demise of Edward II at Berkeley Castle on the night of September 21st, 1327. I had quite a bit of trouble locating it until I realized the date was reckoned according to the old Julian calendar.”

Kane frowned impatiently. “Who are you? What happened to that shop of yours?”

“My name would mean nothing to you. As for the shop, let us say that it exists spatially and temporally as I do—when and where necessary for my purposes. By your current and limited understanding, you might call it a sort of time-machine.”

Woods shook his head. “You’re not making sense.”

“Ah, but I am, and very good sense too. How else do you think I could pursue my interests so successfully unless I were free to travel in time? It is my particular pleasure to return to certain eras in this primitive past of yours, visiting the scenes of famous and infamous crimes and locating trophies for my collection.

“The shop, of course, is just something I used as a blind for this particular mission. It’s gone now, and I shall be going too, just as soon as I retrieve my property. It happens to be the souvenir of a most unusual murder.”

“You see?” Kane nodded at Woods. “I told you this bag belonged to the Ripper!”

“Not so,” said the little man. “I already have the Ripper’s murder weapon, which I retrieved directly after the slaying of his final victim on November 9th, 1888. And I can assure you that your Dr. Ridley was not Jack the Ripper but merely and simply an eccentric surgeon—” As he spoke, he edged toward the bed.

“No you don’t!” Kane turned to intercept him, but he was already reaching for the bag.

“Let go of that!” Kane shouted.

The little man tried to pull away, but Kane’s hand swooped down frantically into the open bag and clawed. Then it rose, gripping the scalpel.

The little man yanked the bag away. Clutching it, he retreated as Kane bore down upon him furiously.

“Stop!” Woods cried. Hurling himself forward, he stepped between the two men, directly into the orbit of the descending blade.

There was a gurgle, then a thud, as he fell.

The scalpel clattered to the floor, slipping from Kane's nerveless fingers and coming to rest amidst the crimson stain that seeped and spread.

The little man stooped and picked up the scalpel. "Thank you," he said softly. "You have given me what I came for." He dropped the weapon into the bag.

Then he shimmered.

Shimmered—and disappeared.

But Woods' body didn't disappear. Kane stared down at it—at the throat ripped open from ear to ear.

He was still staring when they came and took him away.

The trial, of course, was a sensation. It wasn't so much the crazy story Kane told as the fact that nobody could ever find the fatal weapon.

It was a most unusual murder . . .

A Case of the Stubborns

Robert Bloch received last year's World Fantasy Convention Life Award, an award that was not only richly deserved, but also seems to have happily generated a burst of writing from Mr. Bloch. Here is the first of several new tales we have on hand from the master of the contemporary weird tale.

The morning after he died, Grandpa come downstairs for breakfast.

It kind of took us by surprise.

Ma looked at Pa, Pa looked at little sister Susie, and Susie looked at me. Then we all just set there looking at Grandpa.

"What's the matter," he said. "Why you all staring at me like that?"

Nobody said, but I knowed the reason. Only been last night since all of us stood by his bedside when he was took by his attack and passed away right in front of our very eyes. But here he was, up and dressed and feisty as ever.

"What's for breakfast?" he said.

Ma sort of gulped. "Don't tell me you fixing to eat?"

"Course I am. I'm nigh starved."

Ma looked at Pa, but he just rolled his eyes. Then she went and hefted the skillet from the stove and dumped some eggs on a plate.

"That's more like," Grandpa told her. "But don't I smell sausages?" Ma got Grandpa some sausage. The way he dug into it, they sure was nothing wrong with his appetite.

After he started on seconds, Grandpa took heed of us staring at him again.

“How come nobody else is eating?” he asked.

“We ain’t hungry,” Pa said. And that was the gospel truth.

“Man’s got to eat to keep up his strength,” Grandpa told him. “Which reminds me—ain’t you gonna be late at the mill?”

“Don’t figure on working today,” Pa said.

Grandpa squinted at him. “You all fancied-up this morning. Shave and a shirt, just like Sunday. You expecting company?”

Ma was looking out the kitchen window, and she give Grandpa a nod. “Yes, indeedy. Here he comes now.”

Sure enough, we could see ol’ Bixbee hotfooting up the walk.

Ma went through the parlor to the front door—meaning to head him off, I reckon—but he fooled her and come around the back way. Pa got to the kitchen door too late, on account of Bixbee already had it and his mouth open at the same time.

“Morning, Jethro,” he said, in that treacle-and-molasses voice of his. “And a sad grievous morning it is, too! I purely hate disturbing you so early on this sorrowful occasion, but it looks like today’s another scorcher.” He pulled out a tape measure. “Best if I got the measurements so’s to get on with the arrangements. Heat like this, the sooner we get everything boxed and squared away the better, if you take my meaning—”

“Sorry,” said Pa, blocking the doorway so ol’ Bixbee couldn’t peek inside. “Needs be you come back later.”

“How much later?”

“Can’t say for sure. We ain’t rightly made up our minds as yet.”

“Well don’t dilly-dally too long,” Bixbee said. “I’m liable to run short of ice.”

Then Pa shut the door on him and he took off. When Ma come back from the parlor, Pa made a sign for her to keep her gap shut, but of course that didn’t stop Grandpa.

“What was that all about?” he asked.

“Purely a social call.”

“Since when?” Grandpa looked suspicious. “CM’ Bixbee ain’t nobody’s friend—him with his high-toned airs! Calls hisself a Southern planter. Shucks, he ain’t nothing but an undertaker.”

“That’s right, Grandpa,” said sister Susie. “He come to fit you for your coffin.”

“Coffin?” Grandpa reared up in his seat like a hog caught in a bobwire fence. “What in bo-diddley blazes do I need with a coffin?”

“Because you’re dead.”

Just like that she come out with it. Ma and Pa was both ready to take after her but Grandpa laughed fit to bust.

“Holy hen-tracks, child—what on earth give you an idee like that?”

Pa moved in on Susie, taking off his belt, but Ma shook her head. Then she nodded to Grandpa.

“It’s true. You passed on last night. Don’t you recollect?”

“Ain’t nothing wrong with my memory,” Grandpa told her. “I had me one of my spells, is all.”

Ma fetched a sigh. “Wasn’t just no spell this time.”

“A fit, mebbe?”

“More’n that. You was took so bad, Pa had to drag Doc Snodgrass out of his office—busted up the game right in the middle of a three-dollar pot. Didn’t do no good, though. By the time he got here you was gone.”

“But I ain’t gone. I’m here!” Pa spoke up. “Now don’t git up on your high horse, Grandpa. We all saw you. We’re witnesses.”

“Witnesses?” Grandpa hiked his galluses like he always did when he got riled. “What kind talk is that? You aim to hold a jury trial to decide if I’m alive or dead?”

“But Grandpa—”

“Save your sass, sonny.” Grandpa stood up. “Ain’t nobody got a right to put me six feet under, ’thout my say-so.”

“Where you off to?” Ma asked. “Where I go ewy morning,” Grandpa said. “Gonna set on the front porch and watch the sights.” Dumed if he didn’t do just that, leaving us behind in the kitchen.

“Wouldn’t that frost you?” Ma said. She crooked a finger at the stove. “Here I went and pulled up half the greens in the garden, just planning my spread for after the funeral. I already told folks we’d be serving possum stew. What will the neighbors think?”

“Don’t you go fret now,” Pa said. “Mebee he ain’t dead after all.”

Ma made a face. “We know different. He’s just being persnickety.” She nudged at Pa. “Only one thing to do. You go fetch Doc Snodgrass. Tell him he’d best sashay over here right quick and settle this matter once and for all.”

“Reckon so,” Pa said and went out the back way. Ma looked at me and sister Susie.

“You kids go out on the porch and keep Grandpa company. See that he stays put till the Doc gets here.”

“Yessum,” said Susie, and we traipsed out of there.

Sure enough, Grandpa set in his rocker, big as life, squinting at cars over on the road and watching the drivers cuss when they tried to steer around our hogs.

“Lookee here!” he said, pointing. “See that fat feller in the Hupmobile? He come barreling down the road like a bat outta hell—must of been doing thirty mile an hour. ‘Fore he could stop, ol’ Bessie poked out of the weeds right in front of him and run that car clean into the ditch. I swear I never seen anything so comical in all my life!”

Susie shook her head. “But you ain’t alive, Grandpa.”

“Now don’t you start in on that again, hear!” Grandpa looked at her disgusted and Susie shut up.

Right then Doc Snodgrass come driving up front in his big Essex and parked alongside ol’ Bessie’s pork butt. Doc and Pa got out and moseyed up to the porch. They was jawing away something fierce, and I could see Doc shaking his head like he purely disbelieved what Pa was telling him.

Then Doc noticed Grandpa setting there, and he stopped cold in his tracks. His eyes bugged out.

“lumping Jehosephat!” he said to Grandpa. “What you doing here?”

“What’s it look like?” Grandpa told him. “Can’t a man set on his own front porch and rockify in peace?”

“Rest in peace, that’s what you should be doing,” said Doc. “When I examined you last night you were deader’n a doornail!”

“And you were drunker’n a coot, I reckon,” Grandpa said.

Pa give Doc a nod. “What’d I tell you?”

Doc paid him no heed. He come up to Grandpa. “Mebbe I was a wee bit mistaken,” he said. “Mind if I examine you now?”

“Fire away.” Grandpa grinned. “I got all the time in the world.”

So Doc opened up his little black bag and set about his business. First off he plugged a stethyscope in his ears and tapped Grandpa’s chest. He listened, and then his hands begun to shake.

“I don’t hear nothing,” he said.

“What you expect to hear—the Grand Ol’ Opery?”

“This here’s no time for funning,” Doc told him. “Suppose I tell you your heart’s stopped beating?”

“Suppose I tell you your stethyscope’s busted?”

Doc begun to break out in a sweat. He fetched out a mirror and held it up to Grandpa’s mouth. Then his hands got to shaking worse than ever.

“See this?” he said. “The mirror’s clear. Means you got no breath left in your body.”

Grandpa shook his head. “Try it on yourself. You got a breath on you would knock a mule over at twenty paces.”

“Mebbe this’ll change your tune.” Doc reached in his pocket and pulled out a piece of paper. “See for yourself.”

“What is it?”

“Your death certificate.” Doc jabbed his finger down. “Just you read what it says on this line. ’Cause of death—card-yak arrest.’ That’s medical for heart attack. And this here’s a legal paper. It’ll stand up in court.”

“So will I, if you want to drag the law into this,” Grandpa told him. “Be a pretty sight, too—you standing on one side with your damnfool piece of paper and me standing on the other! Now which do you think the judge is going to believe?"

Doc's eyes bugged out again. He tried to stuff the paper into his pocket but his hands shook so bad he almost didn't make it.

"What's wrong with you?" Pa asked.

"I feel poorly," Doc said. "Got to get back to my office and lie down for a spell." He picked up his bag and headed for his car, not looking back.

"Don't lie down too long," Grandpa called. "Somebody's liable to write out a paper saying you died of a hangover."

When lunchtime come around, nobody was hungry. Nobody but Grandpa, that is.

He set down at the table and put away black-eyed peas, hominy grits, a double helping of chitlins, and two big slabs of rhubarb pie with gravy.

Ma was the kind who liked seeing folks enjoy her vittles, but she didn't look kindly on Grandpa's appetite. After he finished and went back on the porch, she stacked the plates on the drain-board and told us kids to clean up. Then she went into the bedroom and come out with her shawl and pocketbook.

"What you all dressed up about?" Pa said.

"I'm going to church."

"But this here's only Thursday."

"Can't wait no longer," Ma told him. "It's been hot all forenoon and looking to get hotter. I seen you wrinkle up your nose whilst Grandpa was in here for lunch."

Pa sort of shrugged. "Figgered the chitlins was mebbe a little bit spoiled, is all."

"Weren't nothing of the sort," Ma said. "If you take me meaning."

"What you fixing to do?"

"Only thing a body can do. I'm putting ewything in the hands of the Lord."

And off she skaddaddled, leaving sister Susie and me to scour the dishes whilst Pa went out back, looking powerful troubled. I spied him through the window, slopping the hogs, but you could tell his heart wasn't in it.

Susie and me, we went out to keep tabs on Grandpa.

Ma was right about the weather heating up. That porch was like a bake-oven in the devil's own kitchen. Grandpa didn't seem to pay it any heed, but I did. Couldn't help but notice Grandpa was getting ripe.

"Look at them flies buzzing round him," Susie said.

"Hush up, sister."

But sure enough, them old blueflies buzzed so loud we could hardly hear Grandpa speak. "Hi, young 'uns," he said. "Come visit a spell."

"Sun's too hot for setting," Susie told him.

"Not so's I can notice." He weren't even working up a sweat.

"What about all them blue-flies?"

"Don't bother me none." Big ol' fly landed right on Grandpa's nose and he didn't even twitch.

Susie begun to look scared. "He's dead for sure," she said.

"Speak up, child," Grandpa said. "Ain't polite to go mumbling your elder."

Just then he spotted Ma marching up the road. Hot as it was, she come along lickety-split, with the Reverend Peabody in tow. He was huffing and puffing, but she never slowed until they fetched up alongside the front porch.

"Howdy, Reverend," Grandpa sung out.

Reverend Peabody blinked and opened his mouth, but no words come out.

"What's the matter?" Grandpa said. "Cat got your tongue?"

The Reverend got a kind of sick grin on his face, like a skunk eating bumblebees.

"Reckon I know how you feel," Grandpa told him. "Sun makes a feller's throat parch up." He looked at Ma. "Addie, whyn't you go fetch the Reverend a little refreshment?"

Ma went in the house.

“Well, now, Rev,” said Grandpa. “Rest your britches and be sociable.”

The Reverend swallowed hard. “This here’s not exactly a social call.”

“Then what you come dragging all the way over here for?”

The Reverend swallowed again. “After what Addie and Doc told me, I just had to see for myself.” He looked at the flies buzzing around Grandpa. “Now I wish I’d just took their word on it.”

“Meaning what?”

“Meaning a man in your condition’s got no right to be asking questions. When the good Lord calls, you’re supposed to answer.”

“I ain’t heard nobody calling,” Grandpa said. “Course my hearing’s not what it use to be.”

“So Doc says. That’s why you don’t notice your heart’s not beating.”

“Onny natural for it to slow down a piece. I’m pushing ninety you know.”

“Did you ever stop to think that ninety might be pushing back? You lived a mighty long stretch, Grandpa. Don’t you reckon mebbe it’s time to lie down and call it quits? Remember what the Good Book says—the Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away.”

Grandpa got that feisty look on his face. “Well he ain’t gonna taketh away me.”

Reverend Peabody dug into his jeans for a bandanna and wiped his forehead. “You got no cause to fear. It’s a mighty rewarding experience. No more sorrow, no more care, all your burdens laid to rest. Not to mention getting out of this hot sun.”

“Can’t hardly feel it.” Grandpa touched his whiskers. “Can’t hardly feel anything.”

The Reverend give him a look. “Hands getting stiff?”

Grandpa nodded. “I’m stiff all over.”

“Just like I thought. You know what that means? Rigor mortis is setting in.”

“Ain’t never heard tell of anybody named Rigger Morris,” Grandpa said. “I got me a touch of the rheumatism, is all.”

The Reverend wiped his forehead again. “You sure want a heap of convincing,” he said. “Won’t take the word of a medical doctor, won’t take the word of the Lord. You’re the contrariest old coot I ever did see.”

“Reckon it’s my nature,” Grandpa told him. “But I ain’t unreasonable. All I’m asking for is proof. Like the feller says, I’m from Missouri. You got to show me.” The Reverend tucked away his bandanna. It was sopping wet anyhow, wouldn’t do him a lick of good. He heaved a big sigh and stared Grandpa right in the eye.

“Some things we just got to take on faith,” he said. “Like you setting here when by rights you should be six feet under the daisies. If I can believe that, why can’t you believe me? I’m telling you the mortal truth when I say you got no call to fuss. Mebbe the notion of lying in the grave don’t rightly hold much appeal for you. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust—that’s just a saying. You needn’t trouble yourself about spending eternity in the grave. Whilst your remains rest peaceful in the boneyard, your soul is on the wing. Flying straight up, yesiree, straight into the arms of the Lord! And what a great day it’s fixing to be—you free as a bird and scooting around with them heavenly hosts on high, singing the praises of the Almighty and twanging away like all git-out on your genuine 18-carrots solid golden harp—”

“I ain’t never been much for music,” Grandpa said. “And I get dizzy just standing on a ladder to shingle the privy.” He shook his head. “Tell you what—you think heaven is such a hellfired good proposition, why don’t you go there yourself?”

Just then Ma come back out. “We’re fresh out of lemonade,” she said. “All’s I could find was a jug. I know your feeling about such things, Reverend, but—”

“Praise the Lord!” The Reverend snatched the jug out of her hand, hefted it up, and took a mighty swallow.

“You’re a good woman,” he told Ma. “And I’m much beholden to you.” Then he started down the path for the road, moving fast.

"Here, now!" Ma called after him. "What you aim to do about Grandpa?"

"Have no fear," the Reverend said. "We must put our trust now in the power of prayer."

He disappeared down the road, stirring dust.

"Danged if he didn't take the jug!" Grandpa mumbled. "You ask me, the onny power he trusts is in the corn likker."

Ma give him a look. Then she bust out crying and run into the house.

"Now what got into her?" Grandpa said.

"Never you mind," I told him. "Susie, you stay here and whisk those flies off Grandpa. I got things to attend to."

And I did.

Even before I went inside I had my mind set. I couldn't hold still to see Ma bawling that way. She was standing in the kitchen hanging onto Pa, saying, "What can we do? What can we do?"

Pa patted her shoulder. "There now, Addie, don't you go carrying on. It can't last forever."

"Nor can we," Ma said. "If Grandpa don't come to his senses, one of these mornings we'll go downstairs and serve up breakfast to a skeleton. And what do you think the neighbors will say when they see a bag of bones setting out there on my nice front porch? It's plumb embarrassing, that's what it is!"

"Never you mind, Ma," I said. "I got an idea."

Ma stopped crying. "What kind of idea?"

"I'm fixing to take me a hike over to Spooky Hollow."

"Spooky Hollow?" Ma turned so pale you couldn't even see her freckles. "Oh, no, boy—"

"Help is where you find it," I said. "And I reckon we got no choice."

Pa took a deep breath. "Ain't you afeard?"

"Not in daylight," I told him. "Now don't you fret. I'll be back afore dark."

Then I scooted out the back door.

I went over the fence and hightailed it along the back forty to the crick, stopping just long enough to dig up my piggy bank from where it was stashed in the weeds alongside the rocks. After that I waded across the water and headed for tall timber.

Once I got into the piney woods I slowed down a smidge to get my bearings. Weren't no path to follow, because nobody never made one. Folks tended to stay clear of there, even in daytimes—it was just too dark and too lonesome. Never saw no small critters in the brush, and even the birds kep' shut off this place.

But I knowed where to go. All's I had to do was top the ridge, then move straight on down. Right smack at the bottom, in the deepest, darkest, lonesomest spot of all, was Spooky Hollow.

In Spooky Hollow was the cave.

And in the cave was the Conjure Lady.

Leastwise I reckoned she was there. But when I come tippy-toeing down to the big black hole in the rocks, I didn't see a mortal soul, just the shadows bunching up on me from all around.

It sure was spooky, and no mistake. I tried not to pay any heed to the way my feet was itching. They wanted to turn and run, but wasn't about to be put off.

After a bit I started to sing out. "Anybody home? You got company."

"Who?"

"It's me—Jody Tolliver."

"Whoooo?"

I was wrong about the birds, because now when I looked up I could see the big screech-owl glaring at me from a branch over yonder near the cave.

And when I looked down again, there she was—the Conjure Lady, peeking out at me from the hole between the rocks.

It was the first time I ever laid eyes on her, but it couldn't be no one else. She was a teensy rail-thin chickabiddy in a linsey-woolsey dress, and the face under her poke bonnet was as black as a lump of coal.

Shucks, I says to myself, there ain't nothing to be afeard of—she's just a little ol' lady, is all.

Then she stared up at me and I saw her eyes. They was lots bigger than the screech-owl's, and twice as glarey.

My feet begun to itch something fierce, but I stared back. "Howdy, Conjure Lady," I said.

"Whoooo?" said the screech-owl.

"It's young Tolliver," the Conjure Lady told him. "What's the matter, you got wax in your ears? Now go on about your business you hear?"

The screech-owl give her a dirty look and took off. Then the Conjure Lady come out into the open.

"Pay no need to Ambrose," she said. "He ain't rightly used to company. All's he ever sees is me and the bats."

"What bats?"

"The bats in the cave." The Conjure Lady smoothed down her dress. "I beg pardon for not asking you in, but the place is purely a mess. Been meaning to tidy it up, but what with one thing and another—first that dadblamed World War and then this dad-gummed Prohibition—I just ain't got round to it yet."

"Never you mind," I said, polite-like. "I come on business."

"Reckoned you did."

"Brought you a pretty, too." give it to her.

"What is it?"

"My piggy bank."

"Thank you kindly," said the Conjure Lady.

"Go ahead, bust it open," I told her.

She whammed it down on a rock and the piggy bank broke, spilling out money all over the place. She scrabbled it up right quick.

"Been putting aside my cash earnings for nigh onto two years now," I said. "How much is they?"

"Eighty-seven cents, a Confederate two-bits piece and this here button." She kind of grinned. "Sure is a purty one, too! What's it say on there?"

“Keep Cool With Coolidge.”

“Well ain’t that a caution.” The Conjure Lady slid the money into her pocket and pinned the button atop her dress. “Now, son—purty is as purty does. So what can I do for you?”

“It’s about my Grandpa,” I said. “Grandpa Titus Tolliver.”

“Titus Tolliver?” Why I reckon I know him! Use to run a still up in the toolies back of the crick. Fine figure of a man with a big black beard, he is.”

“Is turns to was,” I told her. “Now he’s all dried-up with the rheumatiz. Can’t rightly see too good and can’t hear for sour apples.”

“Sure is a crying shame!” the Conjure Lady said. “But sooner or later we all get to feeling poorly. And when you gotta go, you gotta go.”

“That’s the hitch of it. He won’t go—”

“Meaning he’s bound-up?”

“Meaning he’s dead.”

The Conjure Lady give me a hard look. “Do tell,” she said.

So I told. Told her the whole kit and kabodle, right from the git-go.

She heard me out, not saying a word. And when I finished up, she just stared at me until I was fixing to jump out of my skin.

“I reckon you mightn’t believe me,” I said. “But it’s the gospel truth.”

The Conjure Lady shook her head. “I believe you, son. Like I say, I knowed your Grandpappy from the long-ago. He was plumb set in his ways then, and I take it he still is. Sounds to me like he’s got a bad case of the stubborns.”

“Could be,” I said. “But they’s nary a thing we can do about it, nor the Doc or the Reverend either.” The Conjure Lady wrinkled up her nose. “What you ’spect from them two? They don’t know grit from granola.”

“Mebbe so. But that leaves us betwixt a rock and a hard place—’less you can help.”

“Let me think on it a piece.” The Conjure Lady pulled a corncob out of her pocket and fired up. I don’t know what brand she smoked, but it smelled something fierce. I begun to get itchy again—not just in the feet but all over. The woods was darker now, and a kind of cold wind come wailing down between the trees, making the leaves whisper to themselves.

"Got to be some way," I said. "A charm, mebbe, or a spell."

She shook her head. "Them's ol' fashioned. Now this here's one of them newfangled mental things, so we got to use newfangled idees. Your Grandpa don't need hex nor hoodoo. Like he says, he's from Missouri. He got to be showed, is all."

"Showed what?"

The Conjure Lady let out a cackle "I got it!" She give me a wink. "Sure 'nough, the very thing! Now just you hold your water—I won't be a moment." And she scooted back into the cave.

I stood there, feeling the wind whooshing down the back of my neck and listening to the leaves that was like voices whispering things I didn't want to hear too good.

Then she come out again, holding something in her hand.

"Take this," she said.

"What is it?"

She told me what it was, and then she told me what to do with it.

"You really reckon this'll work?"

"It's the onny chance."

So I stuck it in my britches pocket and she give me a little poke. "Now, sonny, you best hurry and git home afore supper."

Nobody had to ask me twice—not with that chill wind moaning and groaning in the trees, and the dark creeping and crawling all around me.

I give her my much-obliged and lit out, leaving the Conjure Lady standing in front of the cave. Last I saw of her she was polishing her Coolidge button with a hunk of poison oak.

Then I was tearing through the woods, up the hill to the ridge and over. By the time I got to the clearing, it was pitch-dark, and when I waded the crick I could see the moonlight wiggling on the water. Hawks on the hover went flippy-flapping, but I didn't stop to heed. I made a beeline for the fence, up and over, then into the yard and through the back door.

Ma was standing at the stove holding a pot whilst Pa ladled up the soup. They looked downright pleasured to see me.

"Thank the Lord!" Ma said. "I was just fixing to send Pa after you."

"I come quick as I could."

"And none too soon," Pa told me. "We like to go clean out'n our heads, what with the ruckus and all."

"What kind of ruckus?"

"First off, Miz Francy. Folks in town told her about Grandpa passing on, so she done the neighborly thing—mixed up a mess of stew to ease our appeytite in time of sorrow. She come lollygagging up the walk, all rigged out in her Sunday go-to-meeting clothes, toting the bowl under her arm and looking like lard wouldn't melt in her mouth. Along about then she caught sight of Grandpa setting there on the porch, kind of smiling at her through the flies.

"Well, up went the bowl and down come the whole shebang. Looked like it was raining stew greens all over that fancy Sears and Roebuck dress. And then she turned and headed for kingdom come, letting out a whoop that'd peel the paint off a privy wall."

"That's sorrowful," I said. "Save your grieving for worse," Pa told me. "Next thing you know, Bixbee showed up, honking his horn. Wouldn't come nigh Grandpa, nosiree—I had to traipse clear down to where he set in the hearse."

"What'd he want?"

"Said he'd come for the remains. And if we didn't cough them up right fast, he was aiming to take a trip over to the county seat first thing tomorrow morning to get hisself a injection."

"Injunction," Ma said, looking like she was ready to bust out with the bawls again. "Said it was a scandal and a shame to let Grandpa set around like this. What with the sun and the flies and all, he was fixing to have the Board of Health put us under quar-and-tine."

"What did Grandpa say?" I asked.

“Nary a peep. Of Bixbee gunned his hearse out of here, and Grandpa kep’ right on rocking with Susie. She come in ’bout half hour ago, when the sun went down—says he’s getting stiff as a board but won’t pay it no heed. Just keeps asking what’s to eat.”

“That’s good,” I said. “On account of I got the very thing. The Conjure Lady give it to me for his supper.”

“What is it—pizen?” Pa looked worried. “You know I’m a God-fearing man and I don’t hold with such doings. How you ’spect to pizen him if he’s already dead?”

“Ain’t nothing of the sort,” I said. “This here’s what she sent.”

And I pulled it out of my britches pocket and showed it to them.

“Now what in the name of kingdom come is that?” Ma asked.

I told her what it was, and what to do with it.

“Ain’t never heard tell of such foolishness in all my born days!” Ma told me.

Pa looked troubled in his mind. “I knowed I shouldn’t have let you go down to Spooky Hollow. Conjure Lady must be short of her marbles, putting you up to a thing like that.”

“Reckon she knows what she’s doing,” I said. “ ‘Sides, I give all my savings for this here—eighty-seven cents, a Confederate quarter and my Coolidge button.”

“Never you mind about no Coolidge button,” Pa said. “I swiped it offn a Yankee, anyway—one of them revenooers.” He scratched his chin. “But hard money’s something else. Mebbe we best give this notion a try.”

“Now, Pa—” Ma said.

“You got any better plan?” Pa shook his head. “Way I see it, what with the Board of Health set to come a-snapping at our heels tomorrow, we got to take a chance.”

Ma fetched a sigh that come clean up from her shoes, or would of if she’d been wearing any.

“All right, Jody,” she told me. “You just put it out like the Conjure Lady said. Pa, you go fetch Susie and Grandpa. I’m about to dish up.”

"You sure this'll do the trick?" Pa asked, looking at what I had in my hand.

"It'd better," I said. "It's all we got."

So Pa went out and I headed for the table, to do what the Conjure Lady had in mind.

Then Pa come back with sister Susie.

"Where's Grandpa?" Ma asked.

"Moving slow," Susie said. "Must be that Rigger Morris."

"No such thing." Grandpa come through the doorway, walking like a cockroach on a hot griddle. "I'm just a wee mite stiff."

"Stiff as a four-by-four board," Pa told him. "Upstairs in bed, that's where you ought to be, with a lily in your hand."

"Now don't start on that again," Grandpa said. "I told you I ain't dead so many times I'm blue in the face."

"You sure are," said sister Susie. "Ain't never seen nobody look any bluer."

And he was that—blue and bloated, kind of, but he paid it no heed. I recollected what Ma said about mebbe having to put up with a skeleton at mealtime, and I sure yearned for the Conjure Lady's notion to work. It plumb had to, because Grandpa was getting deader by the minute.

But you wouldn't think so when he caught sight of the vittles on the table. He just stirred his stumps right over to his chair and plunked down.

"Well, now," Grandpa said. "You done yourself proud tonight, Addie. This here's my favorite—collards and catfish heads!"

He was all set to take a swipe at the platter when he up and noticed what was setting next to his plate.

"Great day in the morning!" he hollered. "What in tarnation's this?"

"Ain't nothing but a napkin," I said.

"But it's black?" Grandpa blinked. "Who ever heard tell of a black napkin?"

Pa looked at Ma. "We figger this here's kind of a special occasion," he said. "If you take my meaning—"

Grandpa fetched a snort. “Consam you and your meaning! A black napkin? Never you fear, I know what you’re hinting around at, but it ain’t a-gonna work—nosiree, bub!”

And he filled his plate and dug in.

The rest of us just set there staring, first at Grandpa, then at each other.

“What’d I tell you?” Pa said to me, disgusted-like.

I shook my head. “Wait a spell.”

“Better grab whilst you can git,” Grandpa said. “I aim to eat me up a storm.”

And he did. His arms was stiff and his fingers scarce had enough curl left to hold a fork and his jaw muscles worked extra hard—but he went right on eating. And talking.

“Dead, am I? Ain’t never seen the day a body’d say a thing like that to me before, let alone kinfolk! Now could be I’m tolerable stubborn, but that don’t signify I’m mean. I ain’t about to make trouble for anyone, least of all my own flesh and blood. If I was truly dead and knowed it for a fact—why, I’d the first one to go right upstairs to my room and lie down forever. But you got to show me proof ’fore I do. That’s the pure and simple of it—let me see some proof!”

“Grandpa,” I said.

“What’s the matter, sonny?”

“Begging your pardon, but yoir got collards dribbling all over your chin.”

Grandpa put down his fork. “So they is. I thank you kindly.”

And before he rightly knowed what he was doing, Grandpa wiped his mouth on the napkin.

When he finished he looked down at it. He looked once and he looked twice. Then he just set the napkin down gentle-like, stood up from the table, and headed straight for the stairs.

“Good-by all,” he said.

We heard him go clumping up the steps and down the hall into his room, and we heard the mattress sag when he laid down on his bed.

Then everything was quiet.

After a while Pa pushed his chair back and went upstairs. Nobody said a word until he come down again.

“Well?” Ma looked at him.

“Ain’t nothing more to worry about,” Pa said. “He’s laid down his burden at last. Gone to glory, amen.”

“Praise be!” Ma said. Then she looked at me and crooked a finger at the napkin. “Best get rid of that.”

I went round and picked it up. Sister Susie give me a funny look. “Ain’t nobody fixing to tell me what happened?” she asked.

I didn’t answer—just toted the napkin out and dropped it deep down in the crick. Weren’t no sense telling anybody the how of it, but the Conjure Lady had the right notion, after all. She knowed Grandpa’d get his proof—just as soon as he wiped his mouth.

Ain’t nothing like a black napkin to show up a little of white maggot.

The Head

Science fiction has always demonstrated a dark awareness of the catastrophes that could destroy civilization: nuclear holocausts, worldwide plagues, insect mutations, and even the sun's going nova have decimated our cities and technology in many a story. But short of every human on Earth being suddenly killed, there's only one thing that can truly destroy us . . . as Robert Bloch shows in this pungent short-short.

Robert Bloch has been a major name in the fields of science fiction and horror writing for forty years. He won a Hugo Award for his short story That Hell-Bound Train, and his novel Psycho is recognized as a classic of modern horror.

ONE MORNING, when Jon was ten years old, it was raining too hard for him to go out and kill anybody.

He stood at the top of the cave looking out at the storm, telling himself rain was a goodie, man. But he felt kind of, you know, down.

So Jon stash the knife away under the belt of his jock and went back into the tunnels to find somebody he could do it to. Only he coulden catch any of the little kids because they run when they see him coming. And he know if he wassen careful some of the biggies would do it to him.

He diden turn on for that, not even when Grope did it, but at lease Grope kepp the others offen him. Grope was the biggest stud in the whole cave, and he never let anyone do it to his old ladies or his kids excep himself.

The hangup was, Grope had went away on a skull-hunt with the gang and Jon didden trust the others. Even though it was raining the women was out in the fields and the kids was running loose all through the cave with their knives and clubs, hassling. Moving along, Jon could hear the noises from out of the side tunnels—laughs and screams and moans.

So Jon kepp to the middle of the big cave where the cooking fires light up the way. Each gang had their own, with a creep watching to see it never went out. Creeps were like too old to hunt or work in the fields and they coulden do it anymore, so most of them just got killed, but they was always a few leff to keep the fires.

The kids never went to the cooking fires alone. Jon remember one time he was little, Grope find a kid try to rip off food from a pot. Grope juss pick the kid up and smash her brains out on the side of a rock. So she end up in the cook-pot herself. All the other kids laugh, ha ha, but they diden forget. And after that they kepp away from the fires excepp at feeding times.

Thass why it was safe to stay in the big cave now, but Jon was itchy, he wannet to do something. So he grab a torch and went down into Grope's side tunnel very slow and careful in case someone hide there. But the tunnel was empty and he crepp down in the dark until he pass the sleeping-place and find the entrance hole to the burrows way farther on. There was lotsa burrows twisty all through the rock and Jon know his way good. Nobody else ever come this far.

They was rocks failed into the tunnels, too many for the biggies to climb over, but Jon start to crawl through when he was a little kid and he was the only one ever. Thass how come he find the secret place.

The secret place was far under. Jon went through failed rocks to where the walls was, you know, all smooth. Not rocks, the walls, but something else. Like his knife—hard and shiny. And then he went to where they was the buzz noise.

When he first went there the buzz noise scare him, but he got use to it after while. It never hurt him, only noise from somewhere behind the smooth walls. So now he kepp on to where he diden need a torch because they was fight. The fight come from somewhere behind like the buzz.

Nobody know about the buzz or the fight and Jon never tole because that was part of the secret.

The secret was in a little smooth-wall cave with more buzz noise and fight blinks from under a shelf with knobs in it. Jon remember how it scare him long time ago to see the big shiny bubble on the shelf, like he tried to smash it with a rock but the rock just bounce off. Then he twist knobs and they diden come loose, but more fight come from the shiny bubble so he could see what was inside.

That was the real secret, like floating inside the bubble with the long thin things sticking down out of the ears and neck.

A big head, all wrinkle and hairy. Eyes shut tight, mouth shut too. Dead.

Until Jon twist knobs like he done the first time. Now the sparks jump from long thin things.

The eyes open, look at him. The mouth open too.

And the head say, “Good morning, Jon.”

Good morning, Jon.

He could hear his voice say it, but maybe it wasn’t really morning: time had no meaning here. And it wasn’t really his voice—just the level, artificial output of the mechanism powered by the feeble electrical impulse of his tongue and laryngeal nerve; electronically amplified, as was his hearing.

What was the old phrase? Damned clever, these Chinese. Inappropriate, of course. The Chinese hadn’t perfected this variation of the crionics technique; in fact it had been arrived at just prior to the threatened thermonuclear holocaust. They’d anticipated the results, and this was the solution. A chemical solution, in which the brain was preserved and electrically reactivated.

It was the only way they'd come up with. They couldn't save the atmosphere, they couldn't save the artifacts, they couldn't save human life. But perhaps, under these conditions, they could save knowledge.

They reasoned that recorded knowledge is perishable—books and tapes and microfilms are subject to disintegration.

Or, even if preserved, to misinterpretation. And computers weren't the answer; perpetual power couldn't be generated or maintained on a sufficient scale for maintainence of large units, and they'd be useless to anyone without sophisticated training.

The one sure source of wisdom was still the mind. So select the minds, select the precious few who were psychologically suitable to withstand such stress and preserve them. Place them in the strategically situated security bunkers far below the surface, and hook them up to the self-maintained mechanisms of input and output. Sooner or later someone would find them. There would be survivors; eventually the atmosphere would shed itself of pollution. Then the remnants of the human race, ready for regeneration, would stumble across the secret storage-spots, the secret sources of science and skill and scholarship that were waiting to rebuild a new world from the ruins.

That had been the plan. There were other minds buried away in various top-security subterranea; maybe they hadn't been discovered yet, maybe they never would be discovered. But the law of averages, the law of accident, had led to this resurrection.

I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord. And a little child shall lead them. A child, prowling the caves and chancing upon this unit, fumbling with the unfamiliar gadgetry, reactivating his awareness.

He stared at the creature crouching before him. Blurry, indistinct, out of focus. Better correct that.

"Jon—can you hear me?"

The crouching figure nodded.

"Good. Now listen carefully. Remember what I told you the other times you came here—about the switches?"

The creature blinked. Something was puzzling him. Switch. He didn't understand the word. What term would he know?

"The knob, Jon. The knob on the left."

The creature nodded again, and reached forward.

"There. Push it up. Slow—not too far—just a little way. That's better."

Yes, he could see clearly now. But was it better? Was it really better to get a clear glimpse of this near-naked figure—this white ape? Not even white, actually, but a new ethnic admixture of Caucasian and Negroid, a product of generations of inbreeding here in the doomed darkness.

Their previous confrontations had produced little more than knowledge of Jon's name; his people had no history, no consciousness of continuity. As far as Jon was aware, they had always lived in the caves, always scratched and scrabbled on the scarred surface just outside and above to find weeds for the cook-pots, always hunted other groups from other caves to supplement their daily diet with occasional meat. They had fire, shelter, crude weapons, a surviving semblance of an urban subculture based upon the concept of gangs and territories. This much he had learned through patient questioning, and perhaps there was no more. Savages.

He dismissed the thought; it wasn't important. What mattered now was that this creature was all that remained of humanity. The hope of the future, the sole surviving hope.

It could speak. "Tell me something, man."

Man. This creature was mankind, what was left of it. Shorn of heritage, stripped of civilization, its language reduced to crude slang.

God, how could he educate this? How could he even communicate clearly? But he had to, he must, it was the only way.

"Like talk, man."

So he talked.

Once again, just as he had so many times before, he told Jon the story. Told him of the old days, the days of innocence before the wars, when people walked proud and free over the face of the earth and built their shining cities with spires thrusting high into the heavens; built their shining hopes still higher, soaring to the stars.

That's what it was to Jon—a story. He was listening, he always listened, but obviously he didn't believe. Any more than humanity had believed in the Garden of Eden.

In a way, of course, this new world was the Garden of Eden he talked about—Earth in the day before the Fall. And the growing dissent that had led to the war—the racial, political, religious, ideological, sexist strife with its breakdown of communications on every level—had been like the Tower of Babel. Just as the final war itself was like the Flood, wiping out the world. Its survivors didn't land on a mountaintop; instead they were inside the mountain. The children of Noah, crouching in this cave.

He listened to himself—to the mechanical output of his thought—and recognized how much it all sounded like a fairy tale. That's the way the biblical accounts had sounded to him in the old days. Fables, fantasies, folklore. If it had been difficult for him to conceive of the simplicity of the Garden of Eden, how much harder must it be for Jon to realize the reality of a complicated civilization.

And yet it was true. There had been hope for a heaven on earth, until humanity turned it into hell. For most, hell had been a shockingly swift and short nightmare of fear and pain, followed by merciful oblivion. But the true meaning of hell had been revealed to only a few, like himself. He knew what hell really was.

Hell was forever.

Hell was a darkness that never died, a nightmare that never ended. Hell was the fear and pain of being alive and aware in that darkness, utterly isolated, unable to see or hear or speak or even move. Hell was being alone with his thoughts forever; thoughts that never slept, thoughts that echoed eternally with a soundless shrieking that shattered the skull.

That was his hell, before Jon turned him on. And that was his hell when Jon turned him off and left him alone in the dark.

So now it didn't really matter if Jon believed him or not, just as long as he was willing to listen. Because if Jon was listening he wouldn't turn him off.

Keep talking, keep him interested. Tell him about anything, everything. About radar, lasers, fission, fusion, super- and subsonics, microcosm, macrocosm, dactyls and pterodactyls, all the wonders and blunders of the world. "And then, Jon, we started to conquer space. We landed on the moon —"

"You tole that." Jon scowled; he was bored. "Tell about big kills."

Big kills. The war. He didn't want to talk about the war; that was Privileged Information, Top Security, the sealed orders and the directive that had sent him here to the Classified Area. Operation Survival—that's what they'd labeled it, the procedure that placed him under the knife at the very last moment when the earth shuddered and the mountain-top melted over his head. But he'd obeyed, they'd all obeyed; scientists and surgeons sweating as they wielded their scalpels under the sizzling, sputtering lights before the final darkness. Their words came back to him. "But damn it, don't you understand? It isn't death—you'll be alive! There's bound to be someone who finds you sooner or later and when they do, when they turn on the power, you'll be reborn. And so will the human race—reborn with the knowledge you retain."

That was the hope he had taken down with him into the darkness, the purpose that had sustained him in the hideous, endless emptiness.

But that's not what Jon wanted to hear about. He was scowling again, scratching his armpit.

"More kill," Jon said. "Borns. You know, man."

"I don't know," he said. "And you don't know, either. You're not a man —you're a child. That's why you must listen to me, listen and learn. There's more to life than killing and feeding and copulation. If you listen I can teach you."

"Tell how you make born." Jon grinned. "Someday I kill Grope."

"No, that's not the way."

Jon shook his head stubbornly. “Tell me!”

Tell him what? Where were the words, how could he reach him, teach him, save him from savagery, lead his people out of the wilderness?

And whose words would serve—those of Jesus, Buddha, Muhammad, Lao-tse, Plato, Spinoza, Confucius, Shakespeare? What prophets, priests, philosophers, savants, or sages in the history of mankind could show him the solution?

He had to find those words now, for Jon’s sake, for his own sake, if only to keep from being turned off again, from being turned back into that ceaseless silence, that blind blackness. A brain, buried alive beneath a mountain.

Mountain. Wilderness. Hadn’t Moses led a nomad rabble into a wilderness, climbed a mountain? Suppose the biblical Babel and Flood were allegories. Suppose there had been thermonuclear destruction then—and the same solution? Scientists of a forgotten civilization had hit upon the secret of salvation, preserved a living intelligence against the day when some primitive survivor would encounter it, hidden away and waiting to bring the light of truth back into the world. Suppose Moses had gone into the mountain, found just such a cave, stumbled across just such a mechanism, turned it on, and heard the voice of God?

Steady, now. God wouldn’t dread the darkness the way he dreaded it, God wouldn’t feel the fear of being turned off. You’re not God, remember that.

But you can be God’s voice.

You can be God’s voice and Jon can be Moses. Speak to him in God’s words, so that he can lead his people to the Promised Land.

“Thou shalt not kill,” he said.

Jon frowned at him, shaking his head. “I kill Grope. You see.”

“No. Grope is your father. Honor thy father and thy mother—don’t you understand?”

Jon grimaced, his eyes restless, resentful. He wasn’t interested.

But there had to be a way! A way to save Jon and the others, a way to save himself. Because if he was turned off once again he knew he would truly go mad, finally and irrevocably mad, and there would be no voice of God, only the writhing and wriggling and crazed clawing within his bursting brain alone in the darkness and forevemess. There would be darkness over the heavens and the earth, and without his voice, God would be dead.

Jon was reaching for the knob now. Reaching, bored and impatient.

He was powerless to prevent it. Only God had that power. Salvation. Salvation through prayer. Yes, that was the way.

He spoke then. Spoke the only words that would save the world, the words that never failed, the words of wisdom, the words of the ages, the words of God.

“The Lord is my shepherd: I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul—”

Jon was listening now. Did he understand? Was there enough humanity left in this creature to comprehend the truth? The answer would decide his fate forever, Jon’s fate, the fate of the world, the fate of God.

Then Jon smiled and the answer came.

“That’s shit, man,” Jon said.

And turned him off.

Crook of the Month

Edison was right.

Genius is one percent inspiration and ninety-nine percent perspiration.

Jerry Cribbs started sweating long before the plane touched down in the Rio dawn and continued all through Customs inspection. But the black bag preserved its secret, and he hugged it in his lap during the long taxi ride to his Copacabana hotel. Anyone who survives a cab trip through Rio de Janeiro traffic is entitled to feel relieved, but by the time Jerry checked into his room he was still perspiring. And a shower didn't help even though he took the bag into the stall with him.

Jerry dried off, only to find himself wringing wet again in the few moments it took him to dress and shave. Then he sat soaking and waiting for the phone to ring. He held the black hag on his lap, hugging his secret—and his genius—to him for reassurance.

Why didn't the call come?

A knock on the door answered his question. Of course they'd never risk using the telephone; they'd rely on personal contact.

Or would they?

Jerry shoved the bag under the bed and moved to the door.

A soft voice from the hall outside murmured, "Mr. Cribbs?"

Jerry flinched. He'd registered downstairs as Mr. Brown, figuring that any alias good enough for the late Al Capone should be good enough for him. And yet the stranger beyond the door knew his name. In a way it was reassuring, but he had to make certain.

"Who sent you?" he whispered.

“The Big Bird.”

With a sigh of relief, Jerry opened the door.

A baldheaded black giant entered, nodding curtly. He was dressed in the ornate uniform of a Brazilian general or chauffeur—it didn’t matter which, because the Big Bird could have sent either if he chose.

“Come with me, please,” said the giant Jerry turned and started out, but a hand gripped his shoulder.

“Aren’t you forgetting something?” the giant asked.

“Sorry.” Jerry stopped and retrieved the black bag from its hiding-place beneath the bed. The giant reached for it but Jerry shook his head.

“I’ll carry it,” he said.

The giant shrugged. “As you wish.” He followed Jerry through the doorway and down the hall. He didn’t speak in the elevator or in the lobby below, and his silence continued as he led Jerry to the huge limousine parked insolently on the sidewalk outside the entrance.

Jerry slid into the back seat and his escort got behind the wheel.

If Jerry had any doubts about the black giant being a chauffeur, they were quickly dispelled as the car weaved through Rio’s noonday traffic—from the way he drove, he was obviously a general.

Once aboard the waiting launch at the wharf the man proved himself to be an admiral too. The boat raced off across the harbor and out into the open sea while Jerry crouched in the bow with the black bag between his trembling knees.

The long sleek lines of the yacht loomed ahead, bobbing in the swell. As they pulled astern Jerry looked up at the gold-leaf lettering which identified the vessel as The Water Closet.

The black giant killed the engine and rose, cupping his hands. “Ahoy there!” he called.

A bearded seaman peered down from the deck above.

“Let down the ladder,” the black man muttered.

Climbing a rope-ladder while holding the handle of the black bag in his teeth wasn’t easy, but Jerry managed it. Once on deck he followed the giant along the deck, past an elegant array of staterooms, a sauna, a private projection-room, a bowling-alley. They stopped just beyond an outdoor bar, at an Olympic-sized swimming pool.

"He's expecting you," said the black man.

Jerry squinted at the pool. Over the stereophonic screech of raucous rock shrill shrieks rose from the pool, where a half dozen figures splashed and sported, stark naked in the sunlight Jerry had no trouble recognizing his host; he was the only male.

"Mr. Buzzard?" he murmured.

The scrawny balding little man climbed out of the water, scowling against the sun as a waiting attendant instantly draped a gold lamé robe over his shoulders.

The Big Bird nodded. "I'm Al Buzzard," he said. "You've met my wife." He gestured vaguely towards the naiades in the pool.

"Oh sure."

"Come on then." Buzzard held out both hands. The alert attendant placed a frosted full triple-martini glass in one of the hands and a lighted Upmann in the other, then Buzzard turned and led Jerry aft.

From the appearance of the stateroom they entered, with its mirrored walls and ceiling and king-sized circular bed covered with leopardskin, Jerry decided he was in the Captain's cabin.

The scrawny man closed the door. With a lightning-fast gesture he swallowed his drink, then set the empty glass on the mink carpet. He sprawled back on the bed, puffing his cigar and staring moodily at his visitor.

"Did you ever have one of those days when nothing goes right?" he sighed. "Just look at that!" He gestured toward the empty glass. "A triple martini with only two olives in it! As soon as we get out into international waters, remind me to have the bartender keelhauled."

"Really, Mr. Buzzard, it isn't all that bad—"

"Hah!" Buzzard snorted and sat up. "You sound just like Barabass."

"Barabass?"

“My publisher. He was out here last week. We got into a conversation during the orgy and he said to me, “Why don’t you look on the bright side of things for a change? After all, you’re the world’s most popular author, next to Conway Mann, that is. Ten all-time best sellers, eight blockbuster movies, a hit television series that lasted almost an entire season—what more do you want? Why, your name is a household word—like Drano and Sani-flush. “That’s what he told me.”

“Well, it’s true, isn’t it?”

“No—it’s a damnable lie! I’m much more popular than Con Mann. Him and his sexy romances—”

“But you’re rich and famous.” Jerry gestured at the mirrored walls. “You live on this big yacht, you have a lovely wife—”

Buzzard shrugged. “Boats make me seasick. I have to stay on hoard because the minute I set foot on land the I.R.S. will lay a suit on me for thirty-three million dollars in back taxes. And my wife isn’t all that lovely—the first nine were much more attractive. Trouble is, none of them could understand me. This one doesn’t understand me, nor do any of my mistresses. The shrinks all tell me we don’t have the right chemistry. So what am I supposed to do about that?”

Sighing wearily, Buzzard rose and threw his cigar out of a porthole.

When he turned back he was a different man; his shoulders straightened beneath the gold robe and his beady eyes matched its glitter. “Now, to business,” he said. “Have you got it?”

Jerry held out the black bag and Buzzard’s twitching fingers closed around the handle. He carried it to the bed and scrabbled at the lock. “The key!” he panted. “Where’s the key?”

Jerry rolled up his trouser leg and ripped the adhesive tape from his right ankle. He handed the key to Buzzard, who inserted it in the lock with a vicious twisting motion. The bag sprang open and its contents tumbled out onto the leopardskin coverlet.

Buzzard stared down at the bed, rubbing his hands together.

“How many pages?” he whispered.

“Three hundred.”

“All but the last chapter. I expected to finish by the end of next week, but then your wire came—”

“You can knock off the ending when you get back,” Buzzard said. “Just so’s I get the whole thing to the publisher by the end of the month. We gotta hit the fall list before Conway Mann beats us to it. I hear he’s got a big one coming up, but we’ll show him.” He paused, eying Jerry suspiciously. “It is a goodie, isn’t it?”

“I think so.”

“Think? I’m not paying you to think—I’m paying you to write.” Buzzard made a face. “It better be good. After all, I’ve got a reputation to live down to.”

“Don’t worry, Mr. Buzzard. Just read it and you’ll see for yourself.”

“Yeah, yeah—later sometime.” Al Buzzard gathered up the pages, hefting them. “Feels nice and thick, anyhow. Barabass likes them that way.” He frowned. “Where’s the carbon?”

“Home, in the safe.”

“Good.” Buzzard nodded. “Speaking of home, we better get you on the next flight out of here. I’d invite you to stay for lunch, but seeing as how you still have a chapter to go there’s no sense wasting time. Besides, you can grab a sannich or something on the plane, right?”

“Uh—aren’t you forgetting something, Mr. Buzzard?”

Buzzard scowled. “I know. That’s the difference between guys like you and a creative artist like I am. All you writers ever think about is money.”

Sighing, he reached under the bed and pulled out a locked metal box. “O.K., if that’s the way you want it.”

He fiddled with the combination until the box flew open, cascading a heap of glittering objects over the bed.

“Damn!” he muttered. “I told you this wasn’t my day. Wrong box—I got the diamonds by mistake!”

Buzzard stooped and fumbled until he found a second metal container identical with the first. When its tumblers clicked and the lid rose, Jerry stared down at the stacks of currency.

"Petty cash," Buzzard explained. "Only fifties and hundreds." He extracted a wad of bills and began to count "Let's see now. Three hundred pages at ten dollars a page—"

"You promised me fifteen this time, Mr. Buzzard."

"Oh, yeah—fifteen times three hundred—"

"Forty-five hundred," said Jerry.

"What's the matter, don't you think I know how to count?" Scowling, Buzzard thrust a sheaf of currency into Jerry's hands. "That's a lot of loot, fella. If you ask me, you're being overpaid."

"But it took me almost six months to write the hook, Mr. Buzzard. Nowadays a plumber can make that much in three weeks."

"So take the money and study plumbing," Buzzard told him. "Just so you finish up that last chapter first. If you got a pencil and paper, maybe you can write it on the plane."

But Jerry Cribbs did no writing on the return flight He brooded. The plane slipped between the crowded peaks, plunged into a few air pockets above Latin America, then sped like a thief up the Atlantic Coast. When it landed at Kennedy, Jerry was still brooding.

"Darling—what's the matter?"

Jerry halted at the terminal exit and stared at Ann Remington's troubled face. Then he kissed it. "I'll tell you later," he said.

Thanks to the marvels of modem technology Jerry got through Customs, into Ann's car, out of the airport, and through the city traffic in less time than it had taken him to fly from South America.

In the car he unburdened himself. "Don't you see?" he sighed. "It's the same old story."

"But it's a good story," Ann said. "I was reading one of your carbons just last night. I like that hero of yours, Lance Pustule. And having him murder his parents at the age of eight—it's going to win a lot of reader sympathy. Everybody has a kindly feeling for orphans."

"Ann, please—"

"That scene where he's raped by his grandmother is terrific! And all those killings and tortures he uses to get control of the television network—you really tell it like it is! The drugs and violence and kinky sex are dynamite. By the way, what's the title of the book?"

"The Aristocrats."

"Perfect!"

Jerry shook his head. "Al Buzzard pays me forty-five hundred dollars for ghostwriting a book that will make him millions. What's so perfect about that? All he does is sit on his big fat yacht, divorcing wives and having affairs with movie stars and throwing fashion models overboard—"

"But that's why he gets all the money," Ann said. "Doing those things makes him a celebrity. His life style is front-page news, so when he writes a book that's news too."

"Only he doesn't write books. I do, and I can't even earn enough for us to get married." Jerry sighed. "If I could just write my own book, under my own name—"

"Why don't you?"

"Because I can't find the time, or the money."

Ann smiled. "We could manage. There's my secretarial job at the travel agency."

"I'm not going to live off your salary."

Ann's smile faded as she gripped the steering-wheel and swung the car toward the curb in front of the dingy rundown apartment building where Jerry spent his dingy rundown life.

"I don't understand you," she murmured. "How can a man who writes such trendy modem pom have such old-fashioned ideas?"

"Because I am old-fashioned." Jerry lugged his bags out of the car. "And when I do write my book, it isn't going to be trendy either. A good novel doesn't need all that cheap sensationalism." Ann started to get out of the car, but he checked her with a gesture. “Sorry, you’d better not come up with me. I have to get to work on the last chapter right away. The big identity-crisis scene when Lance finally discovers where his head is at—he gets rid of his wife and girl friend and becomes a child-molester.”

“When will I see you?”

“I should have everything wrapped up by tomorrow night. Come around and we’ll have dinner together. Make it about seven.”

They clung together for a moment, then Ann drove away and Jerry hastened upstairs to commit a statutory offense on paper.

Neither of them noticed the little man crouching behind the pillars before the apartment-house entryway. “Seven o’clock,” the little man whispered. “Tomorrow night.”

It had been a good day’s work, Jerry decided. Three thousand words, many of which were four-letter; twelve pages of solid hardcore sex and violence. Al Buzzard and his readers would be happy, and Jerry was satisfied with a dishonest job, well done.

He showered, shaved and dressed, and when the doorbell rang shortly before seven he was ready.

He lifted the latch and the door swung open.

“Ann—” he said.

“Wrong.” The little man stood in the doorway, staring him up and down.

Jerry frowned, perplexed. “Who are you?”

“Sorry, no time for introductions.” The little man moved past him into the apartment. “You’re coming with me.”

“Now wait a minute—”

“I don’t have a minute.” The intruder crooked a commanding finger. “Let’s go.”

“No way,” said Jerry, eying the stranger. Whoever he was and whatever he wanted, Jerry had no intention of being pushed around by this little character.

He turned, and that was his mistake.

Because a big man loomed up in the doorway behind him, raising a rubber truncheon.

As the weapon descended on Jerry’s skull, the little man looked at his Wristwatch and nodded approvingly.

“Six forty-nine,” he said. “Right on schedule.”

“Yah,” said the big man, who was preoccupied with the task of stuffing Jerry into a large gunnysack. Grunting, he swung the sack over his shoulder and carried it down the hall to the backstairs exit of the building.

The little man followed and they descended the steps together.

The big man scowled at him apprehensively. “Mach schnell,” he panted. “Maybe somebody sees us.”

“Don’t worry.” The little man nodded. “It’s in the bag.”

In the bag was no place to be, and when Jerry recovered consciousness he wanted out.

Voicing these sentiments through a mouthful of burlap he was conscious of a shuddering drone and a sound like faroff thunder, gradually fading.

Then a knife slashed through the cloth above his head, the gunnysack shredded and fell in folds about his shoulders, and Jerry emerged. He wobbled to his feet, blinking at his surroundings.

He stood in the capacious cabin of a private plane—a Lear jet, from the looks of it. Only a man wealthy enough to own such an aircraft could afford to decorate its interior with the original artwork exhibited on the walls.

Jerry recognized a Renoir, a Picasso, a Modigliani. And then, turning toward the far end of the cabin, he recognized the owner of the paintings.

There was no mistaking the identity of the bearded figure seated behind the ornate Chippendale desk, wearing an incongruously crumpled hat and peering at him through tinted glasses. The face would be instantly familiar to anyone who had ever watched a television interview program or Bowling for Dollars.

"Conway Mann!" gasped Jerry.

The bearded author nodded. He smiled and beckoned Jerry to the Heppelwhite chair before the desk.

"Welcome to my humble digs," he said. "I trust you'll excuse the crudity of my invitation, but I had to see you, Mr. Gibbs."

"Cribbs."

"Exactly." The pudgy hand investigated the contents of a desk drawer, emerging with a fistful of yellow pills which disappeared between his bearded lips. He gulped and nodded. "I suppose you're wondering what brought you here."

"I already know," said Jerry. "Two goons and a gunnysack."

"My dear Hibbs—"

"Cribbs."

"Ah, yes." The hand fumbled in the drawer once more, then rose to extend a crumpled sheet of paper. "Please be good enough to read this proof of an advertisement scheduled to appear in Publishers Weekly. I think it may interest you."

Jerry stared down at the bold lettering of the full-page ad.

SHOCKING! SCANDALOUS!
SENSATIONAL!

Searing sex . . . vicious violence . . . raw and raunchy . . . a novel that rips aside the last shreds of convention to reveal the hidden world of secret passions and unbridled lusts behind the locked doors of America's power-mad masters . . . as they move from boardroom to bedroom in their savage search for forbidden pleasures! Jerry put the ad down on the desktop. "Your new novel?"

“Precisely so.”

“Is it good?”

Conway Mann shrugged. “That’s up to you. You’re going to write it.”

“Now hold on—”

“I’m holding on, Mr. Dribbs. But I can’t hold on much longer. The manuscript is due at the publisher’s office by the end of the month.”

“Let me get this straight You mean to say you don’t write your own hooks?”

“Why should that surprise you? That wretched Al Buzzard doesn’t write his novels either.”

“Then you know?”

“Of course. Why else would I bring you here?” Conway Mann shook his head. “Don’t get me wrong. I’m perfectly capable of doing the job myself, but lately I’ve suffered from writer’s block.”

“When did it start?”

“In 1959.” The pudgy hand popped red capsules into its owner’s mouth. “I have a full schedule of commitments ahead of me—Johnny Carson. Merv Griffin, Hollywood Squares—best-selling authors must live up to their responsibilities, even at the sacrifice of the creative impulse. And that’s where you come in.”

“That’s where I get out,” Jerry told him.

“At forty thousand feet in the air?” Conway Mann shrugged again. “Very well, suit yourself.”

“Now see here,” Jerry cried, “you kidnapped me! That’s a federal offense. I can push charges.”

“You’ll push up daisies if you refuse.”

“But why me?” Jerry said. “Surely you must have a regular ghostwriter. What happened to him?”

“He refused,” Conway Mann murmured. “Would you like to see where he’s buried?”

Conway Mann, with his royalties and reputation at stake, wasn’t conning. When his hand again descended to the desk drawer, Jerry expected it to reappear holding a revolver.

Instead it clutched a bundle of bills.

“Six thousand,” said the bearded man. “In advance.”

“Six thousand?”

“That’s more than you get from that chintzy Buzzard, if my spies are correct.” The pudgy hand extended. “Now take it and get out—you’ve got a deadline to meet.”

“But I couldn’t possibly write an entire novel by the end of the month,” Jerry said.

“You can and you will,” Conway Mann told him. “Unless you’re awfully fond of daisies.”

Jerry pocketed the bills, not an easy task for trembling hands. “I’ll try,” he said. “Only you haven’t told me what the book will be about.”

“Ninety thousand words, that’s what it’s about.” Conway Mann gestured at the proof-sheet on the desktop. “This ad doesn’t mention much about a plot, so you can suit yourself. You know what readers expect. Behind the scenes in politics and big business, and the further behind the better. Maybe a touch of necrophilia in San Francisco, a Black Mass at the U.N., orgies in the White House—I leave it to your discretion.”

Jerry took a deep breath. “I’ll do my best.”

“Your best isn’t good enough,” Conway Mann said. “I want your worst.”

He rose and came around the desk, glancing at his watch. “I’ll tell the pilot to take us down, and the boys will see to it that you get home safely.”

“That’s not necessary.”

“I think it is.” Conway Mann’s eyes narrowed behind the tinted lenses. “They’re going to be keeping tabs on you until the book is finished.”

“And if it isn’t?”

“Then they’ll finish you.”

“I’m not afraid of your threats,” Jerry said. “I can call the police—”

“That’s already been taken care of. Your phone is dead. And unless you want to follow its example, you’ll stay in your apartment from tonight until the manuscript is in the hands of my publishers.” Conway Mann put his hand on Jerry's shoulder and smiled. "If you want to stay healthy, learn a lesson from the flowers. Daisies don't tell."

It was good advice, but Jerry couldn't take it Not when he found Ann waiting for him outside the apartment door.

"It's after nine o'clock!" she told him. "I've been waiting here for two hours. Where on earth have you been?"

"I wasn't exactly on earth," Jerry said, looking toward the car from which he'd emerged. The headlights glared, the motor growled, and its sleek black length crouched at the curb like a panther waiting to spring.

Ann followed his gaze, noting the big man behind the wheel and his small companion beside him.

"Please, darling, come inside." Jerry gripped her arm and drew her through the doorway. "I can explain everything."

"It better be good."

But once inside the apartment, it wasn't good.

"Not good at all," Ann said, after she'd listened to Jerry's account of the evening. "It took you months to knock out the novel for Buzzard, and now Mann expects you to do one in a couple of weeks!"

"It's impossible." Jerry nodded. "But there's no way out."

"Not for you," Ann said. "But I'm free to come and go."

"Meaning?"

"It's simple." Ann smiled. "I'm going to leave now. The minute I get home I'll put through a call to the police. They'll get over here, you tell them what happened, and you're home free."

"Dynamite!"

Ann smiled reassuringly as she moved to the door and opened it. Then her smile faded. The little man stood in the doorway, his eyes bulging. There was another ominous bulge where his hand rested in his pocket.

"I heard what you just said, lady. Nobody's calling the fuzz."

Ann stared at him. “You mean you intend to keep me locked up here with Jerry?”

The man shook his head. “I didn’t say that. Somebody’s got to go for groceries and it might as well be you. But whenever you cut out, I go with you. And my buddy downstairs keeps an eye on your boy friend. Boss’s orders.”

Jerry faced him, frowning. “He thinks of everything, doesn’t he?”

“You better believe it.” The little man gave him a crooked smile. “Time for you to start thinking too, fella. You got a book to write.”

The days that followed moved in a blinding blur. Ann spent most of her time in the living room, while Jerry’s typewriter pounded away behind the bedroom door. Sometimes she read, sometimes she watched television, sometimes she just stood at the window and stared down at the black limousine. On occasion she took brief walks or shopped at the supermarket, but always under escort She didn’t talk to the little man and he didn’t talk to her. She scarcely talked to Jerry when he came out of the bedroom for meals.

One look at his haggard face told the story. He was racing the deadline, racing for his life, and she resolved not to nag him with questions.

But as the end of the month inched closer there came a moment when she could keep silent no longer.

They were seated at the kitchen table over coffee, and the sight of Jerry’s gaunt features and glassy stare was too much for her to bear. From her lips burst the age-old question, the question every writer dreads.

“How’s it going?” she asked.

Jerry shook his head. “It isn’t,” he muttered.

“You mean you won’t finish in time?”

“I haven’t started.”

“Haven’t started?” Ann frowned. “But you’ve been in there typing night and day.”

“I type at night because I can’t sleep. And I can’t sleep because of what I type during the day. Page after page of new beginnings—none of them making sense, all of them going into the wastebasket. I’m afraid it’s finally happened, just the way it did to Al Buzzard and Conway Mann.”

“What are you talking about?”

“When they started, they wrote their own stuff. Then gradually it got to them. No man can stand such a pace forever—a daily diet of corruption, brutality, mayhem, incest, voyeurism, sado-masochistic satyriasis, all of it so hard to spell. So they hired ghostwriters, people like myself. The trouble is, now the same thing is happening to me.” Jerry raised his anguished face. “All those rapes and murders—it’s too much! Even Jack the Ripper had to quit in the end.”

Ann rose and moved to the stricken man. “Listen to me,” she said softy. “It’s not that bad. All you have to do is get Buzzard’s last chapter to the publisher. If you can only go on a little longer, until you do Conway Mann’s novel—”

“Don’t you understand?” Jerry slammed a clenched fist on the table. “It’s too late now. Even if I stay at the typewriter twenty-four hours a day, I’ll never beat the deadline. There isn’t time.”

Ann sighed, and walked to the living room. Jerry followed. Together they stared out of the window, down at the black car crouched and waiting. Neither of them said a word. Words wouldn’t help now—unless Jerry could put ninety thousand of them onto paper within the next three days.

It was Ann who broke the silence, her face and voice thoughtful.

“Maybe it’s all for the best,” she said.

“What do you mean?”

“Even if you could have finished on time, it wouldn’t help. At first I hoped this would be a blessing in disguise. Forty-five hundred from Al Buzzard and six thousand from Conway Mann—that’s ten thousand five hundred dollars in cash, enough to live on until you realized your ambition. With that much money you could finally write a novel of your own. But it doesn’t matter now, does it? If you say you can’t write any more—”

“I never said that!” Jerry gripped her hands tightly in his own. “I said I couldn’t turn out any more sex and violence. The novel I want to write is different No sensationalism, no cheap anti-heroes, no ripoff of celebrities disguised under other names. My book would be about ordinary people, coping with everyday problems that all of us have to face.”

“But would such a book sell?”

There was doubt in Anris voice, but none in Jerry’s. “Why not? At least I’d give the readers some reality, something to think about and remember. Those pomo fairy-tales Buzzard and Mann are credited with are just the same thing repeated over and over again—you can’t tell one from another in the long run. I’m talking about real literature.”

Ann eyed him dubiously. “How would you promote it?”

“An honest book doesn’t need promotion,” Jerry told her. “A good writer doesn’t need notoriety. Think about it—did Thackeray have a yacht? Did Henry James wear a funny hat and fly around in a Lear jet? Did Jane Austen sleep around? Did Shakespeare ever appear on a late-night talk show?”

“I am thinking about it,” Ann told him. An odd note crept into her voice. “Jerry, do me a favor. Come into the bedroom with me for a minute. I want you to show me where you keep your files.”

Together they went to the bedroom. “Right here in this cabinet,” Jerry said.

“I see.” But Ann’s glance strayed from the filing-cabinet to Jerry’s desk—the typewriter, the paper, the carbons resting under a heavy paperweight. Her eyes narrowed. “Jerry—about this book of yours. Do you really want to write it?”

“More than anything in the world.”

“And you’re sure it could sell?”

Jerry nodded, then turned away. “If I’m wrong, may I be struck dead on the spot.”

It was then that Ann hit him with the paperweight . . .

"Dead," Jerry mumbled. "Well, I asked for it—"

"Wake up." Ann was shaking him by the shoulders. "You're not dead."

Jerry opened his eyes. The room was dark and he could just make out Ann's shadowy face peering anxiously over him.

"Why did you do it?" he said, sitting up and rubbing the lump on the side of his left temple.

"I'll explain later. Right now there isn't time. We've got to get out of here."

"What about the goon squad?"

"See for yourself."

Legs shaking, Jerry allowed her to lead him back into the living room and over to the window.

He stared down.

The black limousine was gone. Ann's car stood in its place.

"Come on," Ann said. "We've got to get to the airport. Your bags are packed and in the car."

"Where are we going?"

"Costa Rica."

Jerry frowned. "I don't get it."

"You will."

And once the plane took off, he did.

"What you said about writing your own novel convinced me," Ann told him. "That's when I got the idea. I'm sorry about knocking you out, but I knew you'd never agree to go through with it on your own."

"Agree to what?"

"Delivering Conway Mann's new novel to his publisher."

"But there is no new novel!"

"There is now. I took one of the carbons of Al Buzzard's manuscript All I did was go through it and change the names of the characters."

"You mean you gave both publishers the same book?"

"Including the last chapter." Ann nodded. "You said yourself that these things are all alike."

“So that’s why Conway Mann’s goons let us go.”

“Right. Once the manuscript got to the office of Scribbler’s and Sons, they took off. And so have we.”

“But why Costa Rica?”

“They don’t have an extradition law. Even if Mann and Buzzard find out, you can’t be touched. You’ve got the cash, enough to keep us going for a year, and you can write your book.” Ann smiled. “Besides, darling, if what you say is true, nobody will find out. Not Buzzard, or Mann, or the publishers, and certainly not the readers.”

Jerry groaned. “I hope you’re right,” he whispered.

Ann patted his hand. “I know I am,” she said.

And she was.

In the months that followed, The Aristocrats hit the best-seller lists with such force that Al Buzzard bought a new yacht, with two swimming pools, one of which he kept filled with champagne. If anything, The Taste-Makers was an even bigger success. Conway Mann was able to purchase a Jackson Pollock, a Van Gogh, a Rembrandt, and another hat.

Best of all, Jerry Cribbs finally wrote his own novel, which was duly published under his own name. You may have read it.

Then again, you may not. It sold 148 copies.

But First These Words

The television time marketplace was a seller's market, even if the sponsor's name was God . . .

On the morning of January 5th, 1976, at precisely 10:18 a.m., a man named Charlie Starkweather received a visit from God Almighty.

Since Charlie happened to be one of the senior copywriters with the prestigious advertising, agency of Pierce, Thrust, Hack and Clobber, Inc., God had a hell of a time getting in.

You just don't show up at a top Madison Avenue office without an appointment and expect to get past the receptionist unless you can flash an ID. So right away there was a problem. In an age where everyone is expected to carry a driver's license, a Social Security card and a plastic wallet filled with an assortment of plastic credit cards, God was at a disadvantage: He didn't even have a valid birth certificate. Painful experience had taught Him not to announce Himself by name—He'd merely be dismissed as a religious fanatic.

Nor would more spectacular methods serve as they had in the past. Descending in a fiery cloud or appearing in a burning bush would only result in trouble with the fire department.

So, in the end, the only way to slip past Security was to go right into Charlie Starkweather's head, and that was a mighty uncomfortable place to be on this, the first workday of the New Year.

To begin with, Charlie's head was throbbing with the effects of a post-holiday hangover, built up by long weeks of partying. It was also infiltrated by painful twinges of envy and self-pity, owing to the fact that Charlie was the sole senior copywriter actually on duty at the office today.

Ordinarily, the Almighty would have avoided Charlie's head like the plague—and nobody knew more about plagues than He did, having started so many of them—but this time there was no help for it. He had to give Charlie the message.

Charlie was standing at the water cooler when He arrived, trying to convey the contents of a paper cup to his lips with trembling fingers and irrigating his fly in the process.

"God!" said Charlie.

"Speaking," said the voice in Charlie's head. "And I've got a word for you."

"Why me?" Charlie groaned, dropping the cup.

"Because you believe. If you only knew the time I've had trying to find somebody in the business who still believes!"

Charlie listened, nodding sympathetically from time to time as the voice explained.

"It's the First Commandment," He said. "You remember—Thou shalt have no other gods before me."

"I don't," Charlie murmured.

"But your boss does, and so do the account execs. They worship Mammon. I tried to get into the heads of the FCC, but they're too thick. And nobody can reach your clients; they're always in conference. That leaves you."

"Leaves me where?"

"Here. Listening to me. The time has come to do something about television."

"Why?"

"Because of the Second Commandment. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor serve them—"

"Please. You're shouting in my ear."

"Sorry. But you do see the problem, don't you? All these little boxes in darkened rooms all over the earth. Graven images enshrined in every home, with billions of people sitting silently before them, worshiping—"

"People don't worship television. They just watch it."

"And believe what they see. Belief is what leads to worship. Worship of athletes, worship of stars, worship of talk-show hosts. Not heavenly hosts, mind you, but characters like Johnny Carson and Merv Griffin!"

"You're shouting again."

"You're Me-damned right I am. It's about time somebody shouted. And it's reaching the point where the belief itself is getting worse than the worship. Because people have come to accept television messages as gospel. Even those commercials you write—"

"But that's my job. What can I do about it?"

God told him.

"It won't work." Charlie shook his head and God winced.

"Try," He said. "Now here's what I want you to do."

In the end Charlie staggered back to his desk, sat down before his typewriter, and did it.

Then he took the results in to Mr. Hack. His other bosses, Pierce, Thrust and Clobber, were on location at a luxury hotel in the Bahamas with a crew of twenty, including six gorgeous models who were part of a $200,000 assignment to photograph a thirty-second commercial spot about peanut butter. Mr. Hack, knowing what his partners were up to—and, most probably, into—was in a foul mood. He glared at the piece of paper which Charlie placed on his desk.

"What's this?"

"Little copy synopsis I turned out."

"Who's the client?"

"No client. Sort of a model for a new slant we might use. I've been thinking—"

"You're being paid to write, not to think."

"But it's a new approach. It could revolutionize the whole business."

"Revolutionize? That's Communist talk!"

"Nothing like that, I swear it. If you'll only read—"

"Okay, Starkweather." Mr.

Hack sighed, picked up the paper and scanned it, moving his lips.

Charlie's synopsis was simple. It read as follows:

Mexico City. A hot day in the year 1519. Under the blazing sun a throng of Aztecs gather around the base of a teocalli pyramid. Admist the thunder of drums and the squealing of flutes, the feather-clad priests drag a captive up the stone steps to the alter of sacrifice. As they press their victim down upon the slab, the high priest moves forward, grasping an obsidian knife. The knife is raised—the priest starts to drive it down—then winces, flings it aside, and clutches his shoulder.

One of the other priests looks up and murmurs, "What's the matter—arthritis pain bothering you again?"

The high priest nods—the other priest goes into his pitch—offers him the sponsor's product in a glass of tequila—the high priest drinks—smiles—picks up the knife—rips the victim open—plucks out his heart—thrusts it toward CAMERA—and says, "Give to the United Heart Foundation."

Mr. Hack looked up. "Where the hell did you get an idea like this?" He scowled. "Jesus Christ——"

"You're close," Charlie said. "There's a danger that people are taking the commercials too seriously. We've got to change that while there's still time. A touch of humor—don't you see—"

But Mr. Hack didn't see. He kicked Charlie Starkweather out on his assignment.

On the evening of February 27th, 1980, Fred and Myrna Hoober were watching Ah Fong Goo, an ethnic detective series featuring a Chinese private eye with a new slant on criminal investigation.

During Fred's first beer there was a thrilling chase sequence through the Grand Canyon which wiped out six cars, three dune buggies and a burro. Midway in Fred's second beer the hero went down to the harbor to interrogate the villain. Fred guessed it was the villain, because he had a yacht. As usual, the villain played it cool.

"Okay, so I did wear a Santa Claus suit at the playground," he said. "But that doesn't necessarily prove I'm a child molester."

Fred had finished his second beer and was just reaching for his third when the image faded and a suave announcer's voice informed him that the program would be continued after this important paid political message from Milo T. Snodgrass, candidate for United States Senator.

Gulping his beer, Fred listened to Mr. Snodgrass's assurances that, if elected, he would cut government spending, provide millions of new jobs through federal funding, eliminate crime, liberalize gun-control laws, fight pollution, encourage car sales by lowering automobile emission standards, crack down on monopolies, do away with antitrust suits that interfered with business.

Suddenly another voice interrupted the candidate.

"Repent!" it said. "Repent, ye miserable sinners, for the time is at hand. The day of judgment cometh—"

Onscreen, the candidate goggled.

Offscreen, Fred Hoober gargled into his beer. "Huh? What's that?"

"Must be getting interference from another channel," said Myrna. "Maybe Billy Graham—"

She reached out and switched to another station. Luckily, it was showing the 89th rerun of an old Lucy show. They settled down to watch it and Fred opened another beer.

Lucy, in an attempt to discourage prospective buyers of her house by convincing them there was a termite problem, came out as a giant ant. She opened her mouth to speak, and over her lines a voice murmured something that sounded like, “Oh, ye of little faith.”

But Fred was belching and didn’t hear it.

After that, the voice was silent.

During the afternoon of March 9th, 1983, the President of the United States and his principal advisors were holding an emergency summit meeting in a sand trap at the fifth hole of the Clammy Palm Desert Golf Course.

“It’s one hell of a problem, Mr. President,” said the Secretary of State. “What are you going to do?” The President shook his head. “I don’t know. I was thinking of using my four iron—”

“I’m not talking about the next shot,” said the secretary. “It’s the condition of the nation I’m worried about.”

“Forget it.” The President frowned. “I didn’t drag a staff of ninety people clear across the country in Air Force One just to discuss national affairs. I’ve got more important matters to consider.” He studied his ball. “How do I lie?”

“Exactly,” said the Secretary of Defense. “How do you lie? The population’s up to a quarter of a billion, and we’ve got fifty million unemployed. We’ve already boosted welfare payments, but it doesn’t mean a thing—with this galloping inflation, the dollar isn’t worth a plugged nickel. Half the world is at war—with the other half. And the air is so polluted—”

“Air.” The President nodded quickly. “That’s your answer.

“Trouble with you fellows, you don’t follow what’s on the air. Well, I do.” He smiled. “I was watching television just last night, waiting to see that new game show, You Bet Your Ass, or whatever it’s called—and I accidentally switched to a news broadcast. This guy, one of the biggest commentators on the networks, was saying as how the real trouble is all in our minds, just negative thinking. Instead of griping about what's wrong with the world, we should remember what's right."

"But he's only a news commentator—"

"What do you mean, only?" said the President. "Who knows more about the news than a commentator? That's his business, to tell us what's really going on. And this man is an expert—why, he earns more a year than I do!"

Off in the distant desert a pillar of fire suddenly started to form and flicker, but the smog was so thick that nobody noticed. And when the President swung, sliced, and started to curse, no one heard the voice crying out in the wilderness.

On the night of April 30th, 1986, Finnegan's Bar And Grill was crowded. But then it was always crowded and so was everyplace else.

No one was in the grill—that part of the operation had been closed for months because of the food shortage—but the bar area was decorated with wall-to-wall people. Not your upwardly mobile elitist types, but plain, ordinary folks who appreciated the informal atmosphere of a genuine replica of an old-fashioned tavern, an authentic imitation of a corner barroom located on the eighty-second floor of a brand-new high-rise savings and loan building.

Some customers were drinking, some were smoking, some were sniffing, some were mainlining, and a few die-hards were just crouching in the corners under the air-conditioning vents, trying to inhale a breath of fresh, clean recycled smog.

But everyone was here for a good time, and a little crowding didn't matter. Sure, ten grand was a steep price to pay for a shot and a chaser, but the alcohol killed the germs in the water, and if you didn't drink you could always turn on.

Turn on the transistor radios and hear that new rock group, the Dow-Jones Industrials, getting into their big platinum-record hit, Up the Creek without A Snorkel.

Turn on the TV to the educational channel and watch the Triple-X-Rated Movie Of The Week, King Kong Meets Deep Throat.

Sure, there were a few ripoffs, several muggings, an occasional gang rape, and a couple of teenies who cornered an old man in the washroom and flushed him to death. But like the announcer was saying on the government commercial that interrupted the movie, sex and violence were under control. The bulk of the customers here were just like the everyday crowd at—

"The Tower of Babel!"

The voice rising above the din was almost audible, but only for a moment. Because somebody had just opened a window, and now all you could hear was street noise—cars crashing, ambulance sirens wailing, home-made bombs exploding, rioters screaming, and the drone of police fighter planes overhead. After all, it was Saturday night.

"Generation of vipers," said the voice, talking to Itself. "This time no Flood, no Ark, no Noah—I swear it! Now where did I stockpile those thunderbolts—?"

The world ended on May 17th, 1988. But the Lakers were playing an important game, and nobody even noticed.

Nina

Here is yet another treat from the master of the contemporary chiller. And speaking of chills, Robert Bloch's latest book is a collection of scary stories just published by Doubleday and titled COLD CHILLS.

After the love-making Nolan needed another drink.

He fumbled for the bottle beside the bed, gripping it with a sweaty hand. His entire body was wet and clammy, and his fingers shook as they unscrewed the cap. For a moment Nolan wondered if he was coming down with another bout of fever. Then, as the harsh heat of the rum scalded his stomach, he realized the truth.

Nina had done this to him.

Nolan turned and glanced at the girl who lay beside him. She stared up through the shadows with slitted eyes unblinking above high cheekbones, her thin brown body relaxed and immobile. Hard to believe that only moments ago this same body had been a writhing, wriggling coil of insatiable appetite, gripping and enfolding him until he was drained and spent.

He held the bottle out to her. "Have a drink?"

She shook her head, eyes hooded and expressionless, and then Nolan remembered that she didn't speak English. He raised the bottle and drank again, cursing himself for his mistake.

It had been a mistake, he realized that now, but Darlene would never understand. Sitting there safe and snug in the apartment in Trenton, she couldn't begin to know what he'd gone through for her sake—hers and little Robbie's. Robert Emmett Nolan II, nine weeks old now, his son, whom he'd never seen. That's why he'd taken the job, signed on with the company for a year. The money was good, enough to keep Darlene in comfort and tide them over after he got back. She couldn't have come with him, not while she was carrying the kid, so he came alone, figuring no sweat.

No sweat. That was a laugh. All he'd done since he got here was sweat. Patrolling the plantation at sunup, loading cargo all day for the boats that went downriver, squinting over paperwork while night closed down on the bungalow to imprison him behind a wall of jungle darkness. And at night the noises came—the hum of insect hordes, the bellow of caimans, the snorting snuffle of peccary, the ceaseless chatter of monkeys intermingled with the screeching of a million mindless birds.

So he'd started to drink. First the good bourbon from the company's stock, then the halfway-decent trade gin, and now the cheap rum.

As Nolan set the empty bottle down he heard the noise he'd come to dread worst of all—the endless echo of drums from the huts huddled beside the riverbank below. Miserable wretches were at it again. No wonder he had to drive them daily to fulfil the company's quota. The wonder was that they did anything at all after spending every night wailing to those damned drums.

Of course it was Moises who did the actual driving; Nolan couldn't even chew them out properly because they were too damned dumb to understand plain English.

Like Nina, here.

Again Nolan looked down at the girl who lay curled beside him on the bed, silent and sated. She wasn't sweating; her skin was curiously cool to the touch, and in her eyes was a mystery.

It was the mystery that Nolan had sensed the first time he saw her staring at him across the village compound three days ago. At first he thought she was one of the company people—somebody's wife, daughter, sister. That afternoon, when he returned to the bungalow, he caught her staring at him again at the edge of the clearing. So he asked Moises who she was, and Moises didn't know. Apparently she'd just arrived a day or two before, paddling a crude catamaran downriver from somewhere out of the denser jungle stretching a thousand miles beyond. She had no English, and according to Moises, she didn't speak Spanish or Portuguese either. Not that she'd made any attempts to communicate; she kept to herself, sleeping in the catamaran moored beside the bank across the river and not even venturing into the company store by day to purchase food.

"Indio," Moises said, pronouncing the word with all the contempt of one in whose veins ran a ten-percent admixture of the proud blood of the conquistadores. "Who are we to know the way of savages?" He shrugged.

Nolan had shrugged, too, and dismissed her from his mind. But that night as he lay on his bed, listening to the pounding of the drums, he thought of her again and felt a stirring in his loins.

She came to him then, almost as though the stirring had been a silent summons, came like a brown shadow gliding out of the night. Soundlessly she entered, and swiftly she shed her single garment as she moved across the room to stand staring down at him on the bed. Then, as she sank upon his nakedness and encircled his thighs, the stirring in his loins became a throbbing and the pounding in his head drowned out the drums.

In the morning she was gone, but on the following night she returned. It was then that he'd called her Nina—it wasn't her name, but he felt a need to somehow identify this wide-mouthed, pink-tongued stranger who slaked herself upon him, slaked his own urgency again and again as her hissing breath rasped in his ears.

Once more she vanished while he slept, and he hadn't seen her all day. But at times he'd been conscious of her secret stare, a coldness falling upon him like an unglimpsed shadow, and he'd known that tonight she'd come again.

Now, as the drums sounded in the distance, Nina slept. Unmindful of the din, heedless of his presence, her eyes hooded and she lay somnolent in animal repletion.

Nolan shuddered. That's what she was; an animal. In repose, the lithe brown body was grotesquely elongated, the wide mouth accentuating the ugliness of her face. How could he have coupled with this creature? Nolan grimaced in self-disgust as he turned away.

Well, no matter—it was ended now, over once and for all. Today the message had arrived from Belem: Darlene and Robbie were on the ship, ready for the flight to Manaos. Tomorrow morning he'd start downriver to meet them, escort them here. He'd had his qualms about their coming; they'd have to face three months in this hellhole before the year was up, but Darlene had insisted.

And she was right. Nolan knew it now. At least they'd be together and that would help see him through. He wouldn't need the bottle any more, and he wouldn't need Nina.

Nolan lay back and waited for sleep to come, shutting out the sound of the drums, the sight of the shadowy shape beside him. Only a few hours until morning, he told himself. And in the morning, the nightmare would be over.

The trip to Manaos was an ordeal, but it ended in Darlene's arms. She was blonder and more beautiful than he'd remembered, more loving and tender than he'd ever known her to be, and in the union that was their reunion Nolan found fulfillment. Of course there was none of the avid hunger of Nina's coiling caresses, none of the mindless thrashing to final frenzy. But it didn't matter; the two of them were together at last. The two of them, and Robbie.

Robbie was a revelation.

Nolan hadn't anticipated the intensity of his own reaction. But now, after the long trip back in the wheezing launch, he stood beside the crib in the spare bedroom and gazed down at his son with an overwhelming surge of pride.

"Isn't he adorable?" Darlene said. "He looks just like you."

"You're prejudiced." Nolan grinned, but he was flattered. And when the tiny pink starshell of a hand reached forth to meet his fingers, he tingled at the touch.

Then Darlene gasped.

Nolan glanced up quickly. "What's the matter?" he said.

"Nothing." Darlene was staring past him. "I thought I saw someone outside the window."

Nolan followed her gaze. "No one out there." He moved to the window, peered at the clearing beyond. "Not a soul."

Darlene passed a hand before her eyes. "I guess I'm just overtired," she said. "The long trip—" Nolan put his arm around her. "Why don't you go lie down? Mama Dolores can look after Robbie."

Darlene hesitated. "Are you sure she knows what to do?"

"Look who's talking!" Nolan laughed. "They don't call her Mama for nothing—she's had ten kids of her own. She's in the kitchen right now, fixing Robbie's formula. I'll go get her."

So Darlene went down the hall to their bedroom for a siesta, and Mama Dolores took over Robbie's schedule while Nolan made his daily rounds in the fields.

The heat was stifling, worse than anything he could remember. Even Moises was gasping for air as he gunned the jeep over the rutted roadway, peering into the shimmering haze.

Nolan wiped his forehead. Maybe he'd been too hasty, bringing Darlene and the baby here. But a man was entitled to see his own son, and in a few months they'd be out of this miserable sweatbox forever. No sense getting uptight; everything was going to be all right.

But at dusk, when he returned to the bungalow, Mama Dolores greeted him at the door with a troubled face.

“What is it?” Nolan said. “Something wrong with Robbie?” Mama shook her head. “He sleeps like an angel,” she murmured. “But the senora—”

In their room, Darlene lay shivering on the bed, eyes closed. Her head moved ceaselessly on the pillows even when Nolan pressed his palm against her brow.

“Fever.” Nolan gestured to Mama Dolores, and the old woman held Darlene still while he forced the thermometer between her lips.

The red column inched upwards. “One hundred and four.” Nolan straightened quickly. “Go fetch Moises. Tell him I want the launch ready, pronto. We’ll have to get her to the doctor at Manaos.”

Darlene’s eyes fluttered open; she’d heard.

“No, you can’t! The baby—”

“Do not trouble yourself. I will look after the little one.” Mama’s voice was soothing. “Now you must rest.”

“No, please—”

Darlene’s voice trailed off into an incoherent babbling, and she sank back. Nolan kept his hand on her forehead; the heat was like an oven. “Now just relax, darling. It’s all right. I’m going with you.”

And he did.

If the first trip had been an ordeal, this one was an agony: a frantic thrust through the sultry night on the steaming river, Moises sweating over the throttle as Nolan held Darlene’s shuddering shoulders against the straw mattress in the stern of the vibrating launch. They made Manaos by dawn and roused Dr. Robales from slumber at his house near the plaza.

Then came the examination, the removal to the hospital, the tests and the verdict. A simple matter, Dr. Robales said, and no need for alarm. With proper treatment and rest she would recover. A week here in the hospital—

“A week?” Nolan’s voice rose. “I’ve got to get back for the loading. I can’t stay here that long!”

“There is no need for you to stay, senor. She shall have my personal attention, I assure you.”

It was small comfort, but Nolan had no choice. And he was too tired to protest, too tired to worry. Once aboard the launch and heading back, he stretched out on the straw mattress in a sleep that was like death itself.

Nolan awakened to the sound of drums. He jerked upright with a startled cry, then realized that night had come and they were once again at anchor beside the dock. Moises grinned at him in weary triumph.

“Almost we do not make it,” he said. “The motor is bad. No matter, it is good to be home again.”

Nolan nodded, flexing his cramped limbs. He stepped out onto the dock, then hurried up the path across the clearing. The darkness boomed.

Home? This corner of hell, where the drums dinned and the shadows leaped and capered before flickering fires?

All but one, that is. For as Nolan moved forward, another shadow glided out from the deeper darkness beside the bungalow.

It was Nina.

Nolan blinked as he recognized her standing there and staring up at him. There was no mistaking the look on her face or its urgency, but he had no time to waste in words. Brushing past her, he hastened to the doorway and she melted back into the night.

Mama Dolores was waiting for him inside, nodding her greeting.

“Robbie—is he all right?”

“Si, senor, I take good care. Por favor, I sleep in his room.”

“Good.” Nolan turned and started for the hall, then hesitated as Mama Dolores frowned. “What is it?” he said.

The old woman hesitated. “You will not be offended if I speak?”

“Of course not.”

Mama’s voice sank to a murmur. “It concerns the one outside.”

“Nina?”

“That is not her name, but no matter.” Mama shook her head. “For two days she has waited there. I see you with her now when you return. And I see you with her before—”

"That's none of your business!" Nolan reddened. "Besides, it's all over now."

"Does she believe that?" Mama's gaze was grave. "You must tell her to go."

"I've tried. But the girl comes from the mountains; she doesn't speak English—"

"I know." Mama nodded. "She is one of the snake-people."

Nolan stared at her. "They worship snakes up there?"

"No, not worship."

"Then what do you mean?"

"These people—they are snakes."

Nolan scowled. "What is this?"

"The truth, senor. This one you call Nina—this girl—is not a girl. She is of the ancient race from the high peaks, where the great serpents dwell. Your workers here, even Moises, know only the jungle, but I come from the great valley beneath the mountains, and as a child I learned to fear those who lurk above. We do not go there, but sometimes the snake-people come to us. In the spring when they awaken, they shed their skins, and for a time they are fresh and clean before the scales grow again. It is then that they come, to mate with men."

She went on like that, whispering about creatures half-serpent and half-human, with bodies cold to the touch, limbs that could writhe in boneless contortion to squeeze the breath from a man and crush him like the coils of a giant constrictor. She spoke of forked tongues, of voices hissing forth from mouths yawning incredibly wide on movable jawbones. And she might have gone on, but Nolan stopped her now; his head was throbbing with weariness.

"That's enough," he said. "I thank you for your concern."

"But you do not believe me."

"I didn't say that." Tired as he was, Nolan still remembered the basic rule—never contradict these people or make fun of their superstitions. And he couldn’t afford to alienate Mama now. “I shall take precautions,” he told her, gravely. “Right now I’ve got to rest. And I want to see Robbie.”

Mama Dolores put her hand to her mouth. “I forget—the little one, he is alone—”

She turned and padded hastily down the hallway, Nolan behind her. Together they entered the nursery.

“Ah!” Mama exhaled a sigh of relief. “The pobrecito sleeps.”

Robbie lay in his crib, a shaft of moonlight from the window bathing his tiny face. From his rosebud mouth issued a gentle snore.

Nolan smiled at the sound, then nodded at Mama. “I’m going to turn in now. You take good care of him.”

“I will not leave.” Mama settled herself in a rocker beside the crib. As Nolan turned to go, she called after him softly. “Remember what I have told you, senor. If she comes again—”

Nolan moved down the hall to his bedroom at the far end. He hadn’t trusted himself to answer her. After all, she meant well; it was just that he was too damned tired to put up with any more nonsense from the old woman.

In his bedroom something rustled.

Nolan flinched, then halted as the shadow-shape glided forth from the darkened corner beside the open window.

Nina stood before him and she was stark naked. Stark naked, her arms opening in invitation.

He retreated a step. “No,” he said.

She came forward, smiling.

“Go away—get out of here.”

He gestured her back. Nina’s smile faded and she made a sound in her throat, a little gasp of entreaty. Her hands reached out—

“Damn it, leave me alone!”

Nolan struck her on the cheek. It wasn’t more than a slap, and she couldn’t have been hurt. But suddenly Nina’s face contorted as she launched herself at him, her fingers splayed and aiming at his eyes. This time he hit her hard—hard enough to send her reeling back.

"Out!" he said. He forced her to the open window, raising his hand threateningly as she spewed and spit her rage, then snatched her garment and clambered over the sill into the darkness beyond.

Nolan stood by the window watching as Nina moved away across the clearing. For a moment she turned in a path of moonlight and looked back at him—only a moment, but long enough for Nolan to see the livid fury blazing in her eyes.

Then she was gone, gliding off into the night where the drums thudded in distant darkness.

She was gone, but the hate remained. Nolan felt its force as he stretched out upon the bed. Ought to undress, but he was too tired. The throbbing in his head was worse, pulsing to the beat of the drums. And the hate was in his head, too. God, that ugly face! Like the thing in mythology—what was it?—the Medusa. One look turned men to stone. Her locks of hair were live serpents.

But that was legend, like Mama Dolores' stories about the snake-people. Strange—did every race have its belief in such creatures? Could there be some grotesque, distorted element of truth behind all these old wive's tales?

He didn't want to think about it now; he didn't want to think of anything. Not Nina, not Darlene, not even Robbie. Darlene would be all right, Robbie was fine, and Nina was gone. That left him, alone here with the drums. Damned pounding. Had to stop, had to stop so he could sleep—

It was the silence that awakened him. He sat up with a start, realizing he must have slept for hours, because the shadows outside the window were dappled with the greyish pink of dawn.

Nolan rose, stretching, then stepped out into the hall. The shadows were darker here and everything was still.

He went down the hallway to the other bedroom. The door was ajar and he moved past it, calling softly. "Mama Dolores—"

Nolan's tongue froze to the roof of his mouth. Time itself was frozen as he stared down at the crushed and pulpy thing sprawled shapelessly beside the rocker, its sightless eyes bulging from the swollen purple face.

No use calling her name again; she'd never hear it. And Robbie—

Nolan turned in the frozen silence, his eyes searching the shadows at the far side of the room.

The crib was empty.

Then he found his voice and cried out; cried out again as he saw the open window and the gray vacancy of the clearing beyond.

Suddenly he was at the window, climbing out and dropping to the matted sward below. He ran across the clearing, through the trees and into the open space before the river-bank.

Moises was in the launch, working on the engine. He looked up as Nolan ran towards him, shouting. "What are you doing here?"

"There is the problem of the motor. It requires attention. I come early, before the heat of the day—"

"Did you see her?"

"Who, senor?"

"The girl—Nina—"

"Ah, yes. The Indio." Moises nodded. "She is gone, in her catamaran, up the river. Two, maybe three hours ago, just as I arrive."

"Why didn't you stop her?"

"For what reason?"

Nolan gestured quickly. "Get that engine started—we're going after her."

Moises frowned. "As I told you, there is the matter of the repairs. Perhaps this afternoon—"

"We'll never catch her then!"

Nolan gripped Moises' shoulder. "Don't you understand? She's taken Robbie!"

"Calm yourself, senor. With my own eyes I saw her go to the boat and she was alone, I swear it. She does not have the little one."

Nolan thought of the hatred in Nina’s eyes, and he shuddered. “Then what did she do with him?” Moises shook his head. “This I do not know. But I am sure she has no need of another infant.”

“What are you talking about?”

“I notice her condition when she walked to the boat.” Moises shrugged, but even before the words came, Nolan knew.

“Why do you look at me like that, senor? Is it not natural for a woman to bulge when she carries a baby in her belly?”

The Closer of the Way

I would like to think Robert Bloch is most noted as the man whose novel Psycho made Alfred Hitchcock famous; I know it made Hitchcock money. Bloch's fiction first appeared in Weird Tales during the 1930s and his work was greatly influenced by his literary mentor, Howard Phillips Lovecraft. He was the first recipient of the World Fantasy Award for life work, an honor he richly deserved. Recent years have seen a paucity of short stories from his pen as a result of his many commitments to novels, movies, and television, but Bob, ever generous with his time, kindly wrote the following story specifically for this book. The main character is one Robert Bloch, a man who—well, read on . . .

To this day I don't know how they got me to the asylum.

The events leading up to my committal constitute a mystery which defies the probe of memory, and so it shall remain.

Family and friends spoke, at the time, of a "nervous condition," but that is undoubtedly a polite euphemism. They preferred to call the asylum a "private sanatorium" and my incarceration was referred to as "convalescence."

But now that I have no family—and no friends—I can at least speak freely and frankly of my situation.

I was insane.

God, what hypocrites we’ve become! The higher the incidence of insanity in our society, the more the word itself has been tabooed. In a world gone mad it is no longer possible to speak freely of madmen; in this era of lunacy there are supposedly no lunatics; the craziness compounds because we refuse to admit that anyone is crazy.

“Mentally ill.” That’s the phrase which Dr. Connors used. “Paranoid schizophrenia” was another and more highly clinical description. Neither of which really conveys an accurate impression of the horror inherent in the reality—or the unreality.

Insanity is a long nightmare from which some never awaken. Others, like myself, eventually open their eyes to greet the dawn of a new day, rejoicing in renewed awareness. It’s a wonderful feeling to realize that the nightmare has ended. Makes you want to sing, as I did.

"Yes, we have no bananas—”

Dr. Connors eyed me dispassionately. “What’s that supposed to mean?” he said.

“That I’m all right again,” I smiled. “Bananas—the current slang for insanity. It’s a kind of a joke.”

“I see.”

But Dr. Connors didn’t really see anything.

When I assured him that I was no longer disoriented, no longer hostile or afraid, he merely nodded. And when I told him I was ready to go home, he shook his head.

“There are some problems we must work through first,” he said.

“Work—that’s my only problem,” I told him. “I’ve got to get back to work! Do you realize what staying here has cost me?”

Dr. Connors shrugged. “Your work is one of the problems we’re going to be talking about. I think it may help us to find the cause of your difficulties.” He opened a desk drawer and took out a book. “I’ve been reading some of the things you’ve written, and there are a number of questions—”

“Okay,” I said. “If you want to play games, suppose you let me have the first guess. The book you have there, the one you’ve been reading—it’s Psycho, isn’t it?”

“Yes.”

“Don’t look so surprised. Everybody seems to start out by reading Psycho. And reading things into it. I’ve been through this sort of inquisition so many times that you don’t even need to ask the questions. We can both save valuable time if I just give you the answers.”

“I’m listening.”

“First of all, I don’t hate my mother. And she never dominated me. My family background was perfectly normal—I had no hangups as far as my parents or my sister are concerned. My mother was a social worker and teacher, a very intelligent woman who encouraged me to write. I loved her dearly, but there was no oedipal fixation involved.

“Secondly, I have never been conscious of any homosexual tendencies, never felt a desire to experiment in transvestism. Or taxidermy, for that matter. I know nothing about motel operation, or hiding cars and bodies in swamps.

“So you can see I’m not Norman Bates. And as for identifying with other characters in the book—I never embezzled any money from an employer, never ran away, never conducted a long-term clandestine liaison. For that matter, I’ve always preferred a tub bath instead of a shower.”

I smiled at Dr. Connors. “The idea for the book came to me after reading about an actual murder case. I didn’t use any of the real-life participants as characters, nor the real-life situation. What set me off was wondering how a man living in a small town all his life, under constant scrutiny of his neighbors, could manage to conceal his crimes of violence. What I did—call it the case entry, if you will—was to construct a psychological profile of such a man, just as you do in your work. Once I felt I understood the character and his motivations, the rest was simple.”

Dr. Connors nodded. “Thank you for your cooperation. You’ve anticipated and answered all of my questions except one.”

"And that is—?"

"Let me put it this way. I imagine you read up on quite a few murder cases as a matter of course; it would be the natural thing to do, in your line of work."

"That's true."

"And some of them are pretty sensational, aren't they? Mass murders, bizarre slayings, ritual killings, weird deaths occurring under strange circumstances?"

"Also true."

"Some of them, I'm sure, are far more shocking and violent than the particular crime which, in your words, set you off?"

"Right."

"Then my question is simply this. Why did this one murder intrigue you? Why did you choose it rather than another?"

"But I've already explained—it was wondering how the killer managed to conceal his activities and get away with it—how he was able to avoid suspicion, lead a double life."

"That's interesting. The problem of concealment, avoiding suspicion." Dr. Connors leaned forward. "Do you lead a double life?"

I stared at him for a long moment before answering. "Forgive me for saying so, but you're out of your mind."

"Perhaps. But being out of my mind doesn't matter. It's getting into your mind that's important."

He stood up. "That's enough for now, I think. We'll talk again tomorrow."

"More questions?"

"Hopefully, more answers." He gave a little chuckle. "It appears I'm going to have to do some further reading tonight."

"Well, good luck to you. And pleasant dreams."

"That's the title of one of your books, isn't it—Pleasant Dreams?"

"I've written a lot of books," I said. "And a lot of stories."

"I know." He walked me to the office door. "Oh, one final thought. Did it ever occur to you that all fiction writing is a form of lying? And that the only major difference between an author and a psychotic is that the former puts down his fantasies on paper? You might think that over."

"I will," I told him.

And I did, all that day and during the night which followed. In the end I arrived at one firm conclusion.

I disliked Dr. Connors intensely.

It was late in the afternoon next day before Miss Frobisher came to my room and said that Dr. Connors was ready to see me. The long wait hadn't been easy on the nerves, and I'm sure she noticed how uptight I was. Miss Frobisher was a good nurse, I suppose, and treating patients like naughty children was just a part of her job. The fact that she was a little on the butch side probably contributed to her kindly authoritarianism, but I found her manner irritating.

"And how are we today?" she greeted me. "Are we ready for our therapy session?"

"Speaking for myself, I've no objection," I said. "But I happen to be alone. If you insist on addressing me in the plural, perhaps you need therapy more than I do."

Miss Frobisher laughed professionally (never show anger, never let them get to you, that's the secret) and guided me down the hall.

"Doctor's waiting for you in surgery," she said.

"Don't tell me I'm going to have a prefrontal lobotomy," I murmured. "This I need like a hole in the head."

Miss Frobisher laughed again. "Nothing of the sort! But the painters are doing his office and won't be finished until sometime tomorrow. So if you don't mind—"

"Fine with me."

She led me into the elevator and we got off on the third floor. I'd never been up there before, and was a little surprised to discover that Dr. Connors had a very efficient and compact medical unit installed. I knew, of course, that he was a neurosurgeon as well as a practicing psychiatrist, but I found myself quite impressed by the completely equipped modem surgery which I glimpsed beyond the glass wall of the outer room where Dr. Connors waited for me.

I smiled at him as Miss Frobisher left. "We've got to stop meeting this way," I said.

"Sit down."

One look convinced me he wasn't in the mood for fun and games. I seated myself and faced him across a small table on which rested a note-pad and a book.

"Aha!" I murmured, glancing at the book. "So you did read Pleasant Dreams."

"All last evening."

"I see you made some notes," I told him. "Since when did you become a critic?"

"I'm not here to criticize, only to discuss."

"Go ahead. We writers like to hear people talk about our work."

"I was hoping you might do the talking."

"What's to say? It's all in the book."

"Is it?"

"Look," I said, "is it really necessary to talk like a shrink?"

"Not if you're willing to stop talking like a patient." Dr. Connors smiled and glanced at the note-pad.

"But I am a patient," I said. "According to you."

"According to Pleasant Dreams you're quite a number of things. For instance, a collaborator of Edgar Allan Poe's. 'The Light House.' " I nodded. "A Poe scholar back East found the unfinished story and suggested that I complete it."

"Do you frequently get plots or ideas from other people?"

“None that I can use. Most of my stuff comes from my own background or interests. I wrote ‘The Dream-Makers’ because I was always a silent-movie fan, and ‘Mr. Steinway’ represents a similar preoccupation with music. I like to use locales I’ve visited or lived in. Milwaukee, in ‘The Cheaters,’ New Orleans in ‘The Sleeping Beauty,’ upstate Wisconsin in ‘Sweet Sixteen,’ ‘That Hellbound Train,’ and ‘Hungarian Rhapsody.’ ” I grinned at Dr. Connors. “But that’s the bottom line. I’ve never owned a pair of magic eyeglasses, slept with a skeleton, ridden a motorcycle, made a bargain with the Devil, or had an affair with a vampire.”

“Granted.” Dr. Connors squinted at his notes. “So far we’ve talked about things you like—now, let’s get on to what you dislike.”

“That’s easy,” I told him. “Formal dinner parties inspired ‘The Proper Spirit.’ And I suppose ‘The Hungry House’ represents an aversion to mirrors. In fact, if you really want to probe, it means I’ve always been self-consciously displeased with my own looks. Is that candid enough for you, Doc?”

“Not quite.” He stared at me. “Why don’t you want to discuss the real problems?”

“Such as?”

“Your attitude toward children.”

“That’s not what your stories say.” He tapped the notepad with his pen. “In ‘Sweets to the Sweet,’ a little girl is a witch. ‘The Sorcerer’s Apprentice’ deals with a mentally retarded youth whose delusions lead to murder. ‘Catnip’ is a thoroughly vindictive portrait of adolescence. ‘Sweet Sixteen’ is an indictment of an entire generation—you were writing about Satanist motorcycle gangs almost a decade before others picked up the notion for films. Even in a comparatively gentle story like ‘That Hellbound Train,’ your protagonist starts life as a runaway, a drifter who steals hubcaps and gets stoned on canned heat. And in ‘Enoch,’ your central character is a psychotic teenager who becomes a mass murderer.”

"Kids aren't my hangup," I said. "Don't forget, I write horror stories. And in a youth-oriented society, people are most apt to be shocked by having children depicted as monsters. The trick lies in violating the taboos we hold sacred—that's what I did to the mother image in Psycho."

"Trick," said Dr. Connors softly. "Lies."

I grinned again. "So now we're playing word games, right? In that case, let's just call it a Freudian slip."

He shrugged. "That reminds me of another element in your work—not just in this collection, but in literally dozens of your stories. The hostility toward psychiatrists."

"I don't hate psychiatrists."

"Your characters seem to. There are disparaging references to psychotherapists in 'The Sorcerer's Apprentice,' 'I Kiss Your Shadow,' and other titles in the book. And in 'Enoch,' your Dr. Silversmith is a caricature, a gross libel of the profession."

"But that's just another way of shocking people," I said. "Psychiatrists have become the high priests in a society that worships science. Showing them as incompetent or powerless to prevail against the forces of evil is an effective gimmick."

Dr. Connors stared at me. "Effective gimmicks—that's what you look for. Meaning things that induce fear in the reader. Your entire career has been spent in finding ways to shock people, horrify them."

"It's a living."

"Which you yourself chose. Nobody spends a lifetime frightening those he loves. Why do you hate people?"

"I don't."

"Think about it. Think about it seriously. I intend to." He glanced at his watch. "Until tomorrow, then."

"Sorry if it sounds like I'm stonewalling," I said, "but I really don't hate people."

Which was true. I didn't hate my readers, or kids, or shrinks per se.

But I was beginning to hate Dr. Connors.

It was a bad night. I didn't get any sleep, because I was too busy planning my own defense. Perhaps that sounds a trifle melodramatic, but there really was no other word for it. I had to defend myself when Dr. Connors attacked me by using my own words, my own work. It was unfair, unjust, unspeakable—only an idiot would equate make-believe with reality. Actors who played villains weren't monsters in real life: Boris Karloff and Christopher Lee were two of the nicest persons I've ever known. My own literary mentor, H. P. Lovecraft, was a kind and gentle man. If Dr. Connors thought otherwise, he was only displaying his own ignorance.

Or his own cleverness.

He was searching for something; something which escaped me. Something connected with my own condition, no doubt, something blocked and obscured by an amnesic reaction. If I could only recall what happened —

But that wasn't important now. The important thing was to be prepared for tomorrow's attack. Attack through my own books.

Which title would he select?

I tried to anticipate his choice in my own mind. American Gothic, Night-World, Firebug, The Dead Beat, The Kidnapper, The Will to Kill, The Scarf-—all were possible selections. But all of these novels possessed a common theme: the ease with which a psychopath could operate within our supposedly sane society. Surely such a premise is a legitimate subject for examination. And if Dr. Connors planned to play devil's advocate and ask why I was so preoccupied with psychopaths, I'd tell him the truth. I'm afraid of them, Doctor. Aren't we all?

That was it. Just tell the truth. The truth shall make ye free—

I had plenty of time to consider the matter, because Miss Frobisher didn't come for me until after dinner the following evening.

Dr. Connors, she said, had been called away on personal business during the afternoon. But he'd returned now and was waiting for me again in the anteroom to the surgery unit.

“Sorry about that,” he told me, as Miss Frobisher departed. “The painters finished my office, but I haven’t had time to get things straightened out yet. So if you don’t mind—”

“Not at all.”

Dr. Connors was seated at the table, note-pad resting on top of a book. I glanced at the book as I spoke, trying to see the title. Which one had he chosen?

There was no need to play guessing games. He was already lifting the pad, exposing the volume beneath.

It was The Opener of the Way.

He nodded at me. “As you can see, I’ve done my homework. You expected that, didn’t you?”

“Yes. But not your choice. Why this, instead of a novel?”

“Because it’s your first book, your first published story collection. And because of the title.”

“If you read it, you know that ‘The Opener of the Way’ is one of the stories.”

“But that’s not why you selected that title, is it? You were making a statement of intention—this book was opening the way to your writing career.”

“Very perceptive. What else did you notice?”

“That certain constant elements in your work go back almost to the beginning. Mass murders, for example, in ‘Waxworks,’ ‘House of the Hatchet,’ ‘Yours Truly, Jack the Ripper.’ The invasion or desecration of the human body—‘Beetles,’ ‘The Dark Demon,’ ‘The Shambler from the Stars,’ ‘The Fiddler’s Fee,’ and ‘The Opener’ itself. Plus the theme of possession by evil forces or an alter ego, in ‘The Cloak,’ ‘The Mannikin,’ ‘The Dark Demon,’ ‘The Eyes of the Mummy.’ You must admit, it all seems to add up.”

“To what?”

“To the recurrent image of a man possessed by a demon, mutilating his victims in a series of multiple murders.”

I shrugged. “As I told you, it’s a living. And as you told me, all fiction is a form of lying. These particular lies happen to be the ones I live by. They worked for me when I started writing, and they still work for me today.”

“But you don’t lie all the time, do you?” Dr. Connors opened the book. “What about the introduction you wrote for this collection? You start out by asking the very same question I’ve been asking you. Where do you get the ideas for your stories?”

“I’ve already told you that.”

Dr. Connors flipped a page. “You give a different answer here. You say that a fantasy author is cast in the dual role of Jekyll and Hyde.”

“Is it?” He glanced down at the text. “Let me read you your own words. ‘Dr. Jekyll attempts to deny the very existence of Mr. Hyde. But . . . Mr. Hyde exists. I know, for he is a part of me. He has been my literary mentor now for more than a decade.’ And now, the last paragraph of your introduction. ‘And when anyone inquires as to where I get the ideas for my stories, I can only shrug and answer, From my collaborator—Mr. Hyde.’ That’s an exact quote.”

I stared at him. Yesterday I’d told myself that I was beginning to hate this man. Today—

“Something wrong?”

“Only with your conclusions.”

“Not mine. Yours.”

“Cut the double-talk. Are you saying I’m a multiple personality?”

“You’re saying it, in your introduction here. And in your work. That’s double-talk with a vengeance.”

“I’m not interested in vengeance.” I shook my head. “And I don’t hate people.”

“So says Dr. Jekyll. But Mr. Hyde tells a different story. Over and over and over again.”

“Are you sure?” Dr. Connors shook his head. “Then why are you here?”

“I don’t know.”

“Don’t know, or don’t remember?”

“Both.”

“Exactly. In multiple-personality disorders, there’s always this element of amnesia, of disassociation. My job is to help you recall. I was hoping that analyzing your work would lead you to find clues to reality. Once you face the truth—”

“What is the truth?”

“There are many truths. Consider them. You’re in a private sanatorium—and you wouldn’t be here unless there was a reason. You’re under tight security—and that should suggest the reason is a serious one. You can’t remember what happened prior to your arrival; surely this implies a personality split protected by an amnesic reaction.”

I took a deep breath. “What you’re saying is that I flipped out and killed somebody?”

“No.” Dr. Connors smiled. “Consider the facts. If you’d killed somebody, you’d be downtown, at the county jail.”

“But I did flip, didn’t I?”

“Yes.” He smiled again. “Before we continue, perhaps I’d better remind you of another truth. I’m here because I’m interested in your welfare. I’m not your enemy.”

Locking me up. Playing cat-and-mouse games with me. Prying into my stories, my secrets. And then, expecting me to believe he wasn’t my enemy? Maybe I was crazy, but I wasn’t stupid.

“Of course not.” I returned his smile. “Shall we get on with it?”

Dr. Connors consulted his note-pad. “There’s another thread weaving itself through your fiction. Not just the fantasies but the mystery-suspense stories I’ve read—so many of them deal with variations on a single denouement."

“What’s that?”

“Decapitation.”

"Is that so unusual? It's a common enough device for shocking the reader. Even the Queen in Alice in Wonderland kept saying—"

"Let's stick to your own work, and what you say. About the collector of heads in 'Man with a Hobby,' and the collector of skulls in 'The Skull of the Marquis de Sade.' And that other collector called Enoch. What motivated you to write 'The Cure,' 'The Head-Hunter,' or 'See How They Run'? There's a head lopped off in Psycho, and the final scene in Night-World speaks for itself. Heads roll in 'The Hound of Pedro' and 'That Old College Try.' " Dr. Connors picked up the book. "You did it here, in 'Waxworks.' And in your very first published story, 'The Feast in the Abbey.' "

"And a damned good thing," I said. "That's what made an impression on the readers. Not just the idea of cannibalism. But when the narrator finds out what he's been eating—when he lifts the lid of the small silver platter and sees the head of his brother—"

"Quite effective, I agree." Dr. Connors looked up at me. "I notice you wrote in the first person."

"That's part of the impact."

"But where did the idea come from? A newspaper story? Something you heard or read about?"

"I don't remember. After all, that was so long ago—"

"Odd, isn't it, that this should be one of your earliest efforts? And that you continued the same theme over the years?" He kept staring at me. "You've told me the source of so many of your stories. Surely there's a point of origin for this one and those which follow the pattern."

"I told you, I can't recall!"

"Nothing in your personal background?"

"I'm not a cannibal, if that's what you're hinting. I do have a younger sister, but no brother, so I could hardly cut off his head—"

It was hard to speak quietly because I hated him so. And it was hard to hear him now, because of the way my heart was pounding, pounding, pounding—

"Look," said Dr. Connors. "I'm going to tell you something that will help you to remember. It may shock you, but sometimes shock therapy is the most effective method."

"Go ahead," I said. Ahead. Head. It was the head of my brother—

Dr. Connors was watching my face, but I'm positive he couldn't hear the voice inside my head. My head. His head. Their heads.

I forced myself to look at him, forced myself to smile. "Don't tell me I cut off somebody's head," I said.

"No. But you tried."

"That's a lie!" I stood up, and I wasn't smiling now. "That's a lie!"

"You mean you can't remember. But you did, and they stopped you just in time. It's all there in the record."

"But why—why?"

"Because the person you attempted to kill apparently reminded you of someone else. Someone long ago." Dr. Connors leaned forward, speaking very softly, so that I had to strain to hear him.

I did hear him, though—I must have—because the hate kept building, building as he spoke.

Only I still can't recall what he said. It was about something that happened when I was very young. Something I did to someone and Mama found out about it and the doctor came and then they sent me away for a long time and when I came home again I forgot all about everything. I was just a kid, I didn't know, I didn't mean it, I hated him, but I forgot and nobody ever even talked about it, nobody ever even knew about it. Except now, Dr. Connors knew—he'd gone away today and looked up the information and now he was telling me about it and he'd tell everybody and I hated him because I still couldn't remember.

But I do remember what I did when he told me. It was all luck, really—being in that room next to the surgery, and then later finding the backstairs exit and getting over the wall.

It was even luck that there was one of those silver things with a lid on top, right next to the knife cabinet in the surgery.

I keep thinking of that now—thinking of how Miss Frobisher must have come back, and what she saw when she lifted up the lid . . .

It was the head of my psychiatrist.

What You See Is What You Get

Robert Bloch's new story concerns one Charlie Randall, who picks up a bargain camera at a garage sale, snaps a few photos and develops nothing but dead bodies.

Never mind about inflation. You can still buy yourself a million dollars worth of trouble for ten bucks.

That's what Charlie Randall paid for the camera, and he thought he was getting a bargain.

It was one of those models with a self-developing photo pack already in place, but no exposures had been taken. The outfit retailed for something like forty bucks plus tax, so it looked like a good deal. There were even a couple of flash cubes in the box—the original owner had been all ready to take some pictures.

But dead men tell no tales, and they're not so hot on photography either. So Randall picked up the camera for a ten-spot at a Saturday garage sale conducted by the executor of the estate.

Randall didn't know the executor; he just happened to be driving past the house when he saw the sign. He didn't know the dead man, but from the looks of some of the stuff on display he must have been a real nostalgia freak. There were cartons and stacks of old books and magazines all over the place, but no good stuff, like stereo equipment or transistor radios or portable color TV. And the furniture was old and beat-up too. The only new item in the lot was the camera; picking it up cheap was a lucky break.

The first thing Charlie Randal did when he got home that afternoon was to take a picture of Butch.

Butch was a big German shepherd that Randall kept on a long chain when he gave him the run of the yard. Even so, he got a lot of static from the neighbors; they couldn't figure why Randall needed a dog that big and that mean. But then they couldn't figure what line of work Randall was in, or what he had stashed away in the cellar.

What you don't know won't hurt you, and having Butch around kept people from knowing. If they tried to find out, they'd get hurt soon enough, because Butch was a real guard dog.

Even Randall didn't trust him too far, but he wanted to check out how the camera worked, and Butch was the handiest subject around. Matter of fact, he was the only one around. Randall lived alone and didn't encourage visitors, not even on business; he liked to do his deals away from home.

Anyway, he read the instructions on the box the camera came in, got Butch to heel next to the kitchen door, attached one of the flash-cube units, and took the shot.

Nothing to it, easiest thing in the world; and when he pulled the exposed film out, the picture came into focus. A little blurry at first, but then it got clearer and sharper and the colors came out to make a perfect print.

Randall wanted to try another, but it was getting late and Saturday was always a big night for him. So he went down into the cellar and got his merchandise and took it out to the car by the back entrance to the garage. After that he shaved, dressed, fed Butch and locked him inside the house when he left.

Everything worked out for him that evening, and Randall was feeling pretty good when he drove in around two in the morning.

That is, until he opened the front door and Butch tried to kill him.

If he hadn't heard the growling before the dog made a leap for his throat, it would have gotten him for sure. As it was, he jumped back just in time, slamming the door. He could hear Butch snarling inside, snarling and clawing away, and there was no percentage trying to open that door again.

So Randall went around the back, tiptoeing through the yard and listening to make sure that Butch was still up front.

Easing the back door open very quietly, Randall let himself in. He switched on the kitchen light, and in just about two seconds flat the dog came charging through from the hallway. His eyes were red and ropy strands of saliva dripped from his fangs as he opened his jaws wide and hurtled across the room.

Randall stepped back quickly, across the threshold of the open doorway behind him. As the dog sprang, the door slammed shut just in time.

Standing outside, Randall stared at the door as it shuddered at the impact of Butch's launching attack. There was a piercing howl—then a thud—then silence.

Randall stood waiting for the onslought to resume, but he heard nothing, not even the sound of panting. Moving around to the side of the house, he peered through the kitchen window.

Butch was lying on the floor near the door. One look was enough to establish his condition: the foam-flecked jaws were slack, the glaring eyes glazed, and the rib cage no longer rose and fell in the movements of breathing. The dog had flipped out and it was dead.

Randall had a hard time dragging the body into the garage, but there was no other place to put it until Monday when he could call the animal shelter. Maybe he'd dispose of the body himself tomorrow.

Either way, this had loused up his evening, and when he got back to the house he poured himself a couple of stiff shots before he went to bed.

Even so, he had trouble falling asleep. Funny how things work out sometimes. One minute he'd been on top of the world, and the next—if he hadn't been quick—he'd have been dead. And now the dog was dead; all he had left was a picture.

That was funny, too—him taking the picture only a couple of hours before Butch jumped him. He wondered just what had happened; from the looks of things the dog must have freaked-out with rabies. Come to think of it, he hadn't touched his food or his water. Randall had heard something about dogs not drinking water when they got rabies. Oh, well, you can't win 'em all.

So on Sunday afternoon he made the long haul out to the quarry and dumped Butch's body. After that, he loosened up a little, and by the time he got back to the house he felt okay again.

Until he saw the car.

It was a big Caddie with a big man sitting behind the wheel smoking a big cigar. Randall spotted it through the window right after he came in, watched it pull up to the curb and park. The big man was looking at a piece of paper like he was checking the address of the house, and then he got out of the car and started up the walk.

Randall didn't waste any time. He had the cellar door locked before the front doorbell rang, and the gun was in his pocket when he walked back through the hall. There was a chain on the front door, but no sense taking chances.

The bell rang again.

He opened the door a smidge, just far enough to tighten the chain, and the big man smiled at him.

"Mr. Randall?" he said. "Mr. Charles Randall?"

"That's right."

"I'd like to talk to you. Mind if I come in?"

Randall was ready to ask him if he had a search warrant, but the man didn't give him a chance. "My name is Frank Lumley," he said. "The executor of the estate."

"What?"

"The Desmond estate. You were at the garage sale yesterday, weren't you?"

Randall stared at the big man, trying to see what was underneath his smile. "How come you know about that?"

“This check.” Lumley held it up. “Your name and address are on it. If you’ll just let me explain—”

It sounded legit. So Randall took the chain off the door and let him in. He led Lumley to the living room and sat down.

“Okay,” he said. “What’s on your mind?”

“I understand you purchased a camera at the sale. Is that correct?”

“Right.”

“Well, I’m afraid there’s been a slight error. One of my secretaries copied the inventory of what was to be sold, along with another listing of items which were to be held back for the heirs. Somehow she made a mistake and put the camera on the wrong list. It’s not for sale.”

“I bought it,” Randall said.

“So you did. And for ten dollars.” Lumley held up the check, still smiling. “Now I’d like to buy it back. For twenty.”

“No way. That’s a brand-new camera, it’d run you at least forty at a store.”

“All right, I’ll give you forty.” The big man said it so fast that Randall knew there had to be a catch to it.

“Not interested.” He shook his head.

“Fifty?”

“Forget it.”

The living room was comfortably cool, but Lumley was perspiring. “Now see here, Mr. Randall. I don’t like playing games—”

“Neither do I.” Randall was watching him sweat. “So stop with the hype and tell me what’s so special about that camera.”

“Nothing,” Lumley said. “But it’s one of the last things Desmond bought, and the heirs would like to have it for sentimental reasons. I got a cablegram this morning from Buenos Aires—”

“Hold it.” Randall frowned. “Who’s Desmond?”

“Sorry about that.” Lumley nodded. “Desmond the Great. Big-time vaudeville magician—retired years ago. His two sons took over the act. They’re touring it in South America. Flew home for the funeral, then went back to finish up the engagement. But they looked over their father's stuff and helped make out the inventory. He'd accumulated a lot of items as a hobby over the years, and they don't want to break up the collection."

"Bull," said Randall. "The camera's something special, isn't it? Something gimmicked for the magic act."

"If that's so, I wasn't informed." Lumley took out a handkerchief and wiped his forehead. "Look, all I'm doing is following orders. You can buy an exact duplicate of that camera in any drug or department store and make yourself a profit to boot. I'll give you a hundred dollars and that's my final offer."

"No way." Randall stood up. "But the Desmond brothers—"

"Tell them to get in touch with me when they come back."

Lumley sighed. "All right. They should be winding up their tour in a few days. Promise me you won't dispose of the camera until you hear from them."

"Don't worry." Randall smiled. "I'll take good care of it."

And that was that. Or almost so.

Randall was standing at the front window watching Lumley walk out to his car when the impulse hit him. Maybe if he took a few more shots, he'd figure out what the gimmick was.

He reached into the desk drawer where the camera was stashed, pulled it out and focused on the big man as he slid behind the wheel, catching him in the view finder just before the car pulled away.

Then he yanked the tab and waited for the print to develop.

Sure enough, there was Lumley in the Caddie, big as life.

Randall peered closely at the print, checking it for anything that looked unusual. All he saw was an ordinary photo.

But there had to be a gimmick, some reason why Lumley and the heirs wanted the camera. He'd have to take a few more shots soon, and if that still didn't tell him, the next step would be to disassemble the camera itself.

Meanwhile he had work to do. He put the camera and print back in the drawer, then prepared to drive off on his nightly rounds.

Sunday night was always good for heavy dealing because a lot of Randall’s clients were fresh out and hurting after a weekend high. He laid a lot of lids at rock joints, around town, got rid of some smack and everything went down without a hassle. But it took plenty of chasing, and by the time he got home again, Randall was really wiped out.

He was still in the sack the next morning when Josie arrived for her weekly cleaning session. Randall let her in and fixed himself some breakfast, then dressed and shaved. After that he went down to the cellar to check his inventory. He was low on grass, and so he came back up and called Gonzales to meet him up on Mulholland at nine and make a buy.

It was after lunch when he went into the front room and found Josie blubbering as she vacuumed the rug.

“Hey,” he said. “What’s with you?”

She just shook her head and went on crying.

“Shut that damn thing off,” he told her. “Here, have some Kleenex.”

He waited while she blew her nose and the sniffling stopped. “Okay, that’s better. Now sit down and tell me what’s bugging you.”

Josie sat down beside the desk, shaking her head. “Ain’t nothing to concern you, Mr. Randall. ’Jes a personal thing, is all.”

Josie was a good old broad, a little short on smarts but a hard worker, and she’d been with him for years. Randall really didn’t like to see her uptight this way. “Come on,” he said. “Lay it on me.”

What Josie spilled was like some kind of soap opera—one son up for grand theft, auto; another younger kid running with a gang; the dude she’d been shacking-up with walked out last night after ripping off the money she’d been saving to pay for car repairs.

“Cool it,” Randall told her. “The kids are old enough to do their own thing—you can’t take the rap for them now. And this guy who splits sounds like a real loser. Cheer up, there’s plenty more where he came from.”

Josie shook her head. “Ain’t no use trying to find me another man, not any more. Kids gone, money’s gone, sorrow here to stay. I about ready to wrap it all up.”

"You'll get somebody, wait and see."

"I 'jes a beat-up ol' cleaning lady. Nobody gonna want no part of me." Josie looked as if she was ready to start bawling again.

"That's when he got the idea. He went over to the desk, took out the camera.

Josie stared at him. "What you got there?"

"Sit still. I want to take your picture."

"Me—the way I look?"

"Right." Randall nodded as he focused. "Pictures don't lie. You're a sharp-looking woman and I'm going to show you. Now hold still." He pressed the button. "Got it."

He pulled the print out and set it down on the desk top to develop. Gradually the picture came into view.

"Here, see for yourself." He showed her the photo. "You got no problem, believe me."

"Maybe so." Josie looked doubtful, but at least she wasn't crying any more.

Randall gave her a big grin. "Now stop goofing off and get with it."

"Right on."

She started vacuuming again and he went downstairs to figure up the week's take.

By the time he finished and came up from the cellar, it was getting dark and Josie had already left. Randall went to the front door to see if the paper had arrived.

He took it into the kitchen to read while he ate his supper. After fixing a salad and heating up some beans, he carried his plate to the table and sat down; then he unfolded the paper to look at the frontpage news. That's when the crunch came.

Attorney Killed
In Car Accident

> Frank M. Lumley, 47, prominent local attorney, suffered fatal injuries late Sunday afternoon when the automobile he was driving crashed head-on into an embankment at 4125 S. Cooleigh Drive. According to police reports a steering-wheel defect caused the car to go out of control and swerve into the concrete retaining wall. A coroner's spokesman said death resulted from. . . .

Randall didn't read any more, nor did he eat.

He was still shaken when he drove off to keep his appointment with Gonzales. Somehow he got through the deal, but it was all a blur; his thoughts kept going back to his meeting the day before. Lumley must have been killed shortly after he left the house, because Cooleigh Drive Was less than a mile away.

It was an accident, of course, just like the police said. Damned automatic power-assists are always conking out in an emergency. But something about the way it happened kept spooking Randall.

Not until he got back home did he come up with the answer. Two deaths in a row, that was the downer. First the dog, then Lumley.

But that was just coincidence. Nothing to tie them together—or was there?

Then he remembered the photos. He'd taken a picture of the dog and he'd taken a picture of the attorney. And today he'd taken a picture of Josie—

He was out of the car, into the house and on his way to the front room when he heard the phone ring in the hall.

Even before he picked it up he had this sick feeling, almost as if he knew what the voice would say. The choked-up voice of Ira, Josie's youngest boy.

"Momma's dead. I come home tonight, she lying on the bathroom floor. Swallowed a whole bottle full of reds the doctor gave her for sleeping—"

It went on and on, and Randall could hear his own voice saying all the right things, telling the kid she'd been okay when she left the house, and if there was anything he could do—

He knew what he had to do, of course. When the kid finally hung up, Randall ran into the front room, turned on the lamp, took Josie's picture from the desk top.

There she was, sitting in the chair alongside the desk, in full focus and natural color. And there, resting on the desk beside her, was something neither she nor he had noticed when they looked at the photo.

A little plastic bottle, filled with red pills.

Randall blinked and stared down at the desk top. He didn't see any pill bottle now; there never had been one when he took the shot.

But the bottle was in the picture.

He reached into the drawer, scrabbling around until he found the other photos he'd taken—the pictures of Lumley and the dog.

Could the pictures be warnings? Did they predict how death would come?

With Josie it was the pills. And suddenly he realized that the shot of Lumley showed him sitting in the car that killed him. But what about Butch? There was nothing in his photo except the dog.

Then he remembered that rabies was a disease, some kind of virus, and you couldn't see the germs. They were invisible, but they were in the picture—in the dog, in its future. That camera had to be gimmicked after all. But how?

He was just reaching for it when someone started knocking on the front door. Hastily he dropped the photos into the drawer, slammed it shut, then hurried into the hall.

Through the peephole he saw the stranger standing outside; some young dude in blue jeans. He had light-brown hair, cut fairly short, and a small sandy beard, and he looked harmless enough, but you never know.

Randall opened the door on its chain, just enough to get a better glimpse of his visitor, and the young dude squinted at him.

"Charles Randall?" he said.

"Yeah."

"I'm Milton Desmond."

Desmond—that was the magician's name. This must be one of his sons.

"Please, Mr. Randall. I've got to see you—"

Randall took off the chain, opened the door. He led young Desmond into the front room and sat down behind the desk.

"You're early," he said. "I thought you weren't coming back from South America until later this week."

Desmond blinked. "Then you know?"

"Lumley told me." Randall nodded, poker-faced. "Where's your brother?"

"Mike stayed to wrap up the final performance. But when we didn't hear from Lumley over the weekend, he told me to hop a plane and find out what happened."

"You know what happened if you read the papers."

"Yes." Desmond stared at him. "But how did it happen?"

Randall shrugged. "Accident. He was okay when he left here."

"Then he did see you."

"We talked."

"What about?"

Randall shook his head. "Let's cut the stalling," he said. "He made a pitch and I turned him down. The camera's right here in the drawer."

"You haven't taken any pictures yet, have you?"

Randall played it very straight. "What difference does it make?"

"None." But Milt Desmond looked plenty worried. "The thing is, my brother and I want that camera and we're prepared to pay for it."

"How much?"

"Anything within reason. Five hundred dollars."

Randall felt a little shiver of excitement tingle along his spine. He'd been right about his hunch.

But when he spoke his voice faked surprise. "For a forty-dollar camera?" he said.

"I'm sure Mr. Lumley told you why we're interested—the last purchase dad made for his collection—it's a matter of personal sentiment—"

“Don’t give me any scam,” Randall said. “There’s got to be something more for that kind of money.”

Desmond frowned. “All that Mike and I know is that my father was into magic.”

“Sure. Lumley told me he was a magician.”

“I’m not talking about stage illusions. His hobby was occult phenomena.”

“He believed that stuff?”

“Not at first. As a performer he exposed fake mediums and phoney mystics. But the more he investigated, the more he was convinced that some psychics had genuine powers. There was one man—I don’t even know his name—that dad worked with closely. He claimed he could predict the future.”

“Fortune telling?”

“More than that. He believed there are forces controlling our lives which science refuses to recognize. When palmists, astrologers or clairvoyants make accurate predictions, it’s put down as guesswork, coincidence. But he felt that if such powers could be demonstrated by some kind of mechanical device, it would be accepted as real proof. He was working on a method when he died of a heart attack, just weeks before dad passed away. In his last letter to Mike and me, dad said he had something important to show us when we got back.”

“The camera?”

“I don’t know. Maybe it’s all a hype, but Mike thinks—” Desmond broke off and took a deep breath. “I’ll give you a thousand dollars,” he said.

“For something that may turn out to be a fake?” Randall smiled.

“I’ll take that chance.” Desmond reached for his wallet, but Randall shook his head.

“Let me think it over first.”

“But Mr. Randall—”

“You staying in your father’s place over on Clairmont? Okay, suppose I get in touch with you tonight.”

"Couldn't you make it sooner?"

"Tonight." Randall stood up and escorted his visitor to the front door, then watched him move down the walk and enter his car. Desmond smiled, but Randall stood waiting.

As Desmond started the engine and moved off, his smile vanished; his bearded face freezing into a grimace of anger and frustration.

Randall turned away. Good thing he'd waited—there was no mistaking that look. The dude was plenty shook up, probably blaming himself for spilling what he knew about the camera and wondering what Randall was going to do.

Well, that made two of them. Because he didn't know what to do. A thousand bucks was a thousand bucks. But on the other hand, a camera that could predict how you'd die—

Such information could be valuable to the right parties. Old folks, rich people with cancer, heart conditions—they'd want to know. Suppose there was a doctor who could really call the shots for them, let them know if they'd recover from illness or pull through an operation without a hitch? Word about such an M.D. would get around fast, and it would be worth a hell of a lot more than a thousand dollars to have such power.

That's how he figured, and the Desmond brothers must have come up with the same answer. No wonder they were so hot to get hold of the camera. The look on Milt Desmond's face was a dead giveaway.

Dead giveaway.

Randall scowled as the idea hit him. Suppose he went to Desmond tonight and said the deal was off. Just how far would this dude go to get what he wanted?

There was one sure way of finding out.

Randall went over to the desk, took out the camera, carried it to the bedroom. He stood in front of the big mirror set in the bathroom door, focusing on his own image.

He hesitated, conscious of the sudden uneasiness surging and churning within him, and the hands holding the camera began to shake. Did he really want to know his own future?

But he had no choice. Randall steadied himself, then pressed the button. He pulled the tab, carried the exposed print over to the window. Standing in the sunlight, he watched the outlines of the photograph emerge.

There he was, clearly established in front of the mirror, holding the camera.

For a moment he felt his panic subside—until he realized the picture was still developing. And now another image came into view behind him; the blurred image of a man in motion. Randall stared at the brown hair, the neatly trimmed sandy beard, and recognized Milt Desmond. Milt Desmond—with fury in his face and an upraised knife in his hand.

Pictures don't lie, and what he'd suspected was true. Milt Desmond was going to kill him.

Unless, of course, he gave him the camera. Gave him something that could be worth how much—maybe a million?

"No way," Randall muttered.

Then he thought of the way, and grinned.

That night be climbed into his car, drove over to the Desmond house on Clairmont, and knocked on the door. Milt Desmond let him in.

"You alone?" Randall asked.

"Of course." Desmond's face relaxed in relief as he noted the brown paper bag Randall held in his gloved hand.

"You brought the camera," he said. "Let's see it."

Randall shook his head. "Let's see the money first."

Desmond smiled and reached for his wallet, and Randall pulled a revolver out of the brown paper bag to shoot him through the heart.

It was all very neat. At a three-foot range there was no chance of missing, and the silencer worked perfectly. The silence wasn't even broken by a thud, because Randall caught the body before it hit the floor.

He lugged it out the back way to where his car was parked in the alley, trunk already unlocked. The neighboring houses were dark—Randall had checked them out before he came in—and in less than a minute the body was safely stowed away as the car moved off.

It had been a long trip to the quarry when he disposed of Butch, and this time it seemed even longer. But Randall had a chance to relax and case the scene carefully before he drove in to tumble Desmond's corpse over the side. It was hard work climbing down the slope and even harder work covering the body with those big hunks of loose shale, but it had to be neatly done.

When he finished he clambered to the top, backed his car out on the lonely side road, then took a rake from where he'd stashed it on the rear seat. He carried it into the quarry and carefully smoothed loose dirt over tire tracks and footprints. Neatness counts.

Neat work and neat thinking. That was the answer, and Randall began to unwind as he drove home. He took a shot of Scotch before he went to bed and slept like a baby.

It wasn't surprising, because in a way he was a baby—he'd just been reborn. Picture or no picture, magic or no magic, he had nothing to fear now. Milt Desmond was snuffed and he was alive.

In the morning he made some calls, setting up buys for the customers he'd neglected last night. Then he stocked his merchandise under the car mats and went to work.

Daytime dealing always involved extra precautions and took a lot more time. It was dark when Randall finished up and got back to the house. He'd put the whole affair out of his mind while he was gone, but now he was ready to figure the next move.

The first thing he did was check on the camera and prints. They lay undisturbed in the desk drawer, and Randall carried them into the bedroom, spreading them out on the bed so that he could see the whole lot at the same time. It always helps when a salesman knows exactly what he's selling, and this would be the biggest sales-pitch he'd ever planned.

If he could get together with the right doctor, he could forget about dealing from now on—no more scuffling, no more risks, no more long hours and short money. He began to think about the M.D.s he knew, wondering which one to approach first and just how he'd make his pitch.

That's where the pictures would come in—they were his samples, his proof. Gazing at them now, he began to run through the routine.

First Butch, of course—then Lumley in his car—then Josie and the bottle of pills. Whichever doctor he contacted, he'd show the photos and let him check them out. He could only give his word about what happened to the dog, but the newspapers would back him up on Lumley and Josie.

Randall's eyes went to the last photo and he frowned. This picture he wouldn't show, because it could blow the whole deal. Milt Desmond hadn't killed him—which meant the camera wasn't always right. Matter of fact, he'd better not mention Desmond at all or repeat that talk about magical powers.

And maybe that's what it was, really—just talk. Dogs do get rabies, people die in car accidents or wipe themselves out with pills. Taking these pictures beforehand could still be coincidence. That's what it had to be, because what the last one showed had never happened. It never could happen now unless Milt Desmond rose from the dead, climbed out of the quarry and came after him with a knife.

Randall stared again at the last photo, seeing himself in front of the mirror with the camera in his hand while Milt Desmond loomed up behind him ready to strike.

The camera never lies. But it had lied about him.

Why?

He picked up the camera and carried it over to the light. Once again he debated about opening it up, taking it apart to see what was inside; there must be something he could find. But then he'd run the risk of damaging it or not being able to put the pieces back together again.

Still he had to know. Magic or gimmick, there was a secret here, and he needed the answer. Maybe the first step before doing anything drastic was just to take another shot of himself and see how it compared with the other one. That might give him a clue. Randall moved up to the mirror, focusing on his reflection.

It was then that the bedroom door opened silently and the figure loomed up swiftly behind him—the figure of the brown-haired man with the neatly trimmed beard. There was fury in his face and an upraised knife in his hand.

Randall just had time to recognize Milt Desmond as the knife came down.

Nobody comes back from the dead.

That was Randall’s last thought before he died, and of course he was right.

But the camera doesn’t lie.

And Milt Desmond’s brother Mike was an identical twin.

Oo Say Can You See—

There are many uses for invisibility.

Not all yo-yos come on strings.

This one came on the end of a metal chain, linked to a pair of handcuffs.

The yo-yo's name was Arthur Hale. He'd been shot in the right hand, which was bandaged, and cuffing him to a security officer wasn't practical.

At least that's what Dr. Osgood told me. "You understand the problem, Chief. Cuff his right hand to the security officer's left and every movement would cause him severe pain."

"That's nothing compared to the pain you're causing me," I said. "Why didn't you cuff his left hand to the security officer's right?"

"Because the officer is right-handed."

"You couldn't find a left-handed security officer?"

Dr. Osgood bit his lip. "Sorry, there wasn't time to check. You seemed to be in such a hurry—"

"No matter." Truth to tell, sometimes I think they're all yo-yos, Dr. Osgood included. But I wasn't about to quibble; the main thing was that Arthur Hale was here in my office.

I glanced at the security officer holding the end of the chain attached to the handcuffs. "Let go," I said.

He frowned. "But, Chief—"

"Let him go."

He released the chain and Arthur Hale gave me a grateful smile.

“Sit down, Mr. Hale.”

“Thank you.”

“Now then, Mr. Hale. I understand you have something to tell me.”

Hale nodded quickly, then hesitated, eyeing the officer standing beside him.

I got the message. “Officer, you can wait outside.”

“But, Chief—”

“Outside,” I said. “This is no place for a man with a limited vocabulary.”

The officer went out, closing the door behind him.

I smiled at Arthur Hale. “Okay?”

He looked at Dr. Osgood, but I shook my head. “Doc stays. Anything you have to say to me can be said to him. Besides, if it’s as important as you claim, a witness might be helpful.”

Hale didn’t say anything.

“Don’t be difficult,” I said. “We’ve already made every concession you insisted on. You wanted to talk to the top man in the Bureau, and that’s what you’re doing. You stipulated there’d be no transcript, no taping, no bugging, and I agreed. Go ahead, check out the room if you like.”

“I’ll take your word for it.”

“Good.” I leaned back and smiled at him. “You can trust Doc and you can trust me. And if your information is as valuable as you say it is, maybe we can work out a state’s evidence deal. After all, in matters like these, there’s a precedent for granting immunity to citizens—”

“I’m not a citizen,” said Arthur Hale. “I’m an alien.”

“Illegal alien, eh?”

“Not illegal, either. Just an alien.”

I looked at Dr. Osgood and he nodded. “What did I tell you?”

“Never mind what you told me,” I said. “I want to hear it from him.”

Arthur Hale sat there, a plump little man with brown hair, fair complexion, and all the usual appendages—two arms, two legs, and only one head. It didn’t even rattle when he shook it.

"I come from Vespix," he said.

"Never heard of it."

"Near Cygo, only a few million light-years away from—"

"Spare me the geography lesson."

"We have been observing your planet for some time, of course, from our transmittal craft. Once our hetchors completed their observations and gathered sufficient data, they decided on a policy of infiltration. It was then that they hatched me."

"Hatched?"

"Figure of speech. There's no exact word for the process in any of your languages. The first step combined artificial insemination with—"

"No biology lessons, either. Get on with it. Your people decided to take over?"

"Infiltrate," said Arthur Hale. "That's what I was conditioned for. Endless fizors of study and training, until I was ready for my mission. Our ptyra is a perfectionist, and once I satisfied him I knew I could pass for human anywhere." He smiled at Dr. Osgood. "I fooled you, didn't I?"

"You didn't fool anybody," said Osgood. "We've got the lab tests, X rays, EEGs, EKGs, the works. You're human, all right."

Arthur Hale shrugged. "What about the invisibility?" he said.

Dr. Osgood frowned at me. "You see? That's the other delusion I told you about—"

"Never mind," I said. I nodded at the little man with the bandaged hand. "So your people made you invisible, eh?"

"Not made me. They perfected a method I could use. It's a technical thing, involving optical occlusion."

"Something he saw on a television show," Dr. Osgood muttered. "That's where a lot of them get their ideas from. Once it was witchcraft legends. Now it's TV, the new mythology—"

"It's not like that at all," Hale told me. "There's no mechanical device, no so-called force field, and no time limitation. All I do is will myself to vanish."

“Then why didn’t you vanish when they caught you?” Osgood snapped.

“Because I was unconscious. The bullet wound in my hand—”

“And afterward, in the hospital?”

“I don’t know. You injected me with something that disturbed the body-chemistry balance.”

“Antibiotics.”

“Whatever it is, as long as it’s in my system, I can’t function.”

“You’re functioning, all right! Making a big stink about seeing the chief, handing out that hype about a matter of life and death—”

“Shut up!” I said. “Shut up and let him talk.” I gestured at Arthur Hale. “Let’s begin at the beginning. Your people sent you here to infiltrate. That’s a polite term for an espionage assignment, isn’t it?”

“Correct. A spying mission.”

“They equipped you with the power of rendering yourself invisible as a protection and set you down on earth. You’d been programmed to learn the language and customs, your frame of reference had been tested, your cover was foolproof.”

“Exactly.” Hale nodded. “It had to be that way if I expected to survive. There could be no margin of error if I was to make a firsthand study of the rulers of this planet.”

“You knew who these rulers were?”

“Naturally. We have monitored your society quite thoroughly. I was set down at a spot where I could make immediate contact with the top leadership.”

“Where was this? Washington—Moscow—Peking?”

“Ramapo Mountains.”

“Never heard of the town.”

I frowned. “But what does some godforsaken spot in the mountains of New Jersey have to do with the rulers of this planet?”

“Everything,” said Arthur Hale. “That happens to be Mafia headquarters.”

I listened to Arthur Hale's story without comment and that's the way I will report it here.

Just how long the Vespixians had been observing earth or by what exact means, he did not say. Perhaps their arrival touched off the so-called flying saucer scare following WWII. According to him, their probing and scanning devices were highly sophisticated—some sort of advanced computer hardware that picked up, interpreted, correlated and stored data on a worldwide scale. Since their avowed purpose was to eventually establish contact with the highest authorities, they studied their findings accordingly.

At first, Hale said, the answer seemed obvious. Since the world is divided into nations, the heads of state controlled it.

Upon examination, however, the heads of state did not appear to be superior specimens of humanity. A Teutonic madman, a Slavic thug, a Latin megalomaniac, a Chinese warlord, Japanese fanatics and an opposing array of egomaniacal chauvinists hardly qualified as top intellects, and their political mistakes had led to a global holocaust. Still, the war had been waged at their command, a war in which millions had perished. And then—again at their command—peace was finally proclaimed. Surely this demonstration of power showed their supremacy.

Not so, said the data. War had been declared only when the national leaders were confident of their weaponry. And peace had come only when that weaponry was overshadowed by a still greater weapon—the so-called atomic bomb.

The real rulers of the world must therefore be those controlling the weapons—the military establishment.

So military minds were studied. And the generals and admirals, the tactical geniuses and masters of strategy, were judged according to their deeds and decisions. What emerged was a record of blunders and confusion which resulted in wholesale massacre; errors which led entire armies to their doom; confusion and stubborn refusal to face facts, arrogant ignorance and blind determination that ended in utter chaos. Surprise attacks and ill-planned invasions had not won a war, nor had the generals who ordered them.

Perhaps control of weaponry was not the answer. The real rulers were those who devised those weapons—the scientists, the inventors.

But further research disclosed a fallacy. If science was the seat of power, then why were scientists so powerless? Why did they labor so obediently in the cause of destruction; why were the so-called greatest intellects willing to devote themselves to the concoction of napalm, nerve gas, bigger aircraft to carry bigger bombs, and all the other devices of destruction? Even in peace, their rocketry and spacecraft came under governmental control, and so did their major experimental projects, including medical research.

No, it was not the scientists who ruled, nor the academicians—for educators also functioned under close restrictions, teaching only those truths which were self-evident to the best interests of those in power.

Who, then, was in power?

Again the Vespixians consulted their findings. And came, inevitably, to the consideration of religion. All through the ages men had fought and died for their beliefs, sacrificing themselves gladly for a thousand different gods. But none of the gods had prevailed, and those who commanded the sacrifices were singularly and significantly quite powerless to stop secular warfare. And when a scan of recorded history reached the point where Napoleon impatiently snatched the imperial diadem from the Pope and crowned himself with his own hands, the Vespixians regretfully eliminated another possible power source.

What then was left? Mankind’s existence depended on his food supply, and food was controlled by agriculture. But agriculture depended on industry to implement production, and industry depended on commerce for distribution of its goods, and commerce depended on monetary exchange and monetary exchange depended upon banking and financial institutions. Money makes the world go round; perhaps that was the answer!

The trouble was that banks operated under governmental controls, and government was itself controlled by politicians and politicians were controlled by pressure groups, lobbies, labor unions, and other forces representing special interests of the population. All of these factions seemed to employ the same methods to achieve their ends: public relations and propaganda.

Which led inevitably, as the Vespixian theorists discovered, to the mass media. Newspapers, magazines, motion pictures, radio, television—these were the real makers and shakers, the powers in the land.

For one glorious moment, they thought they had found the answer: the real rulers of the world were Walter Cronkite and Johnny Carson. Until further research disclosed that most of the moving and shaking was just waste motion. The great religious books had not reformed mankind, the ethnic problem had not been solved by Harriet Beecher Stowe, and Karl Marx's ideology had nowhere been put into actual practice by the nations professing to embrace it. Theater and film offered a choice of sensationalism or inanity. Radio and the visual media pimped for whatever products paid the bills, catering to the taste of the masses or the growing lack of taste of the self-proclaimed intelligentsia. Shortly after hearing their first singing commercial, the Vespixian research team turned off and dropped out.

Humanity, they concluded, was a far more complex condition than they had thought. A survey of its strengths had failed to disclose the source of the power which controlled it.

But what about its weaknesses?

Some humans strove for virtue, and a few actually achieved it. But the majority were addicted to vice. Lying, cheating, and stealing seemed obvious enough; not so obvious was the fact that these were mechanisms, mere means to an end. And the end was the gratification of impulse.

In every stratum of every culture the common denominator was a desire for self-indulgence. The indiscriminate satisfaction of prohibited forms of sexual activity, a preoccupation with violence and brutality rationalized and ritualized as spectator sports, a mania for gambling, an addiction to alcohol and hallucinogenic drugs.

And in every society there was a so-called criminal element which catered to such needs and controlled their supply.

This control, the Vespixians realized, was the supreme source of power.

At one time such power rested in many hands; at first individuals, then small groups or gangs. But then the gangs united in larger alliances—and under the pressures of modern technology, the national criminal leaders combined forces with one another to form an international organization.

“And that,” Arthur Hale said, “is how we finally discovered the Mafia.”

“But that’s not exactly a secret.” Dr. Osgood frowned. “Everybody knows about the Cosa Nostra. They’ve been publicized, investigated by the government. And they’re not all that powerful; plenty of their top men have been put away—”

“We found that out too.” Hale stirred in his seat, rattling the chain which dangled from his cuffed wrists. “But what interested us is a point which everyone seems to overlook. In spite of the publicity, the Mafia continued to flourish. In spite of the investigations, the Mafia kept on expanding, moving into so-called respectable businesses, taking over control of management through dummy corporations and workers through secret domination of unions, even combining forces with high-level governmental agencies for various illicit activities. As for the so-called top men that have been convicted and imprisoned—are you sure this isn’t just what your slang designates as window dressing? Because the organization is still growing. Now it has learned to hide beneath the cloak of respectability—and no one really knows just how far it has penetrated into legitimate enterprise and established government everywhere. Our findings pointed to an obvious conclusion: the supposedly top leaders are front men, figureheads. Somewhere behind them is a supreme force, and he’s the one with the power.

“My mission was to infiltrate the organization and find the leader.”

I stared at Arthur Hale. “Don’t lie to me,” I said. “Your people found him for you. That’s why you were set down in the Ramapo Mountains, equipped with the power of invisibility.

"Your real mission was to kill him."

Finding the man had not been easy, Hale said. It was like searching for a needle in a haystack—a haystack of history dating back to 1262, when the first mafiosi banded together as an underground political organization against tyrannical rule in Palermo. Sicilian governments rose and fell, but the Mafia remained, growing in secret strength.

In 1889 it surfaced in this country, in New Orleans, as a small group specializing in terrorism and extortion. Vigilante activity disposed of some of its members, but others survived to prey on Italian immigrants pouring into the metropolitan centers of the nation.

The Vespixians researched its growth and pinpointed its changeover from a purely Sicilian operation to an international crime syndicate with members from every ethnic group and every level of society—and its secret takeover of society as a whole.

The transition was a staggering phenomenon, but what they finally zeroed in on was the constant element.

One thing had never changed, and that was the Mafia hierarchy, the Mafia tradition.

The pyramidal structure had a broad base. At the bottom were the allies, the owners of small businesses, the seemingly respectable citizens who fronted for those above and paid them tribute.

Next came the petty criminals—the "juice men," as the loan sharks were called; the smugglers, go-betweens, pimps, pushers, thieves, bookmakers, and gamblers.

They in turn were protected by a higher echelon of "muscle" which enforced their extortions and quieted complaints.

Above them were the hit men, the specialists in murder who took over the "contracts" to kill.

Once they had been numbered among the "soldiers" or "button men"—the general middle-class membership. But in recent years such members had actually become middle-class, venturing into real estate, entertainment, hotel management, financial corporations, and large-scale retail merchandising, positions of control in the fields of labor relations and management.

Their leadership consisted of families, each headed by a caporegime and advised by a consigliere who issued the orders.

But the source of those orders was the apex of the pyramid—the supreme ruler, the Don.

"This much we knew," Arthur Hale said. "And nothing more. The identity of the Don was the insoluble mystery. No matter how thoroughly we checked and hunted, we simply couldn't locate him. Our search led us to the top of the pyramid, but the figure enthroned upon it was lost in an impenetrable cloud."

"Then how did you find him?" I said.

"I told you there were two things that never changed—the Mafia hierarchy and the Mafia tradition. Tracing the hierarchy brought us to our man. But it was by tracing the tradition that we finally identified him.

"The mafiosi live by an ancient code, a way of life riddled with ritual. The most modern method of killing a traitor or informer is still preceded by the customary kiss of death. Orders are transmitted in time-honored terms. Even today the cry of revenge remains—Livarsi na petra di la scarpa!—meaning, Take the stone out of my shoe!' And part of that grand tradition is ceremony and protocol, the deference and courtesy shown to one's superiors. The greatest homage, of course, is paid to the Don.

"Monitoring the movements of the capiregime, we discovered a common phenomenon. Once or twice a year the head of every family made a trip to New Jersey, to a little motel in the Ramapo Mountain area. Obviously this was a summit meeting, and obviously the Don would be present. And when we learned that such a gathering was scheduled for last Sunday, I was sent down to attend it."

"Invisibly?"

"Of course. How else would I be able to move undetected, to see and hear—"

"And to kill."

Arthur Hale shrugged. "To destroy the serpent, one must first cut off its head."

"Another mafioso saying?"

"Vespixian."

Dr. Osgood gave me one of those how-long-are-you-going-to-humor-this-weirdo looks, but I ignored him.

"Tell me what happened," I said.

They set him down, Arthur Hale told me, shortly before dawn.

For a moment the Vespixian vessel hovered overhead, then disappeared into the stratosphere. Hale was left alone, shivering in the early morning mist, as he crouched in the bushes across the road from the Sunny View Motel.

The front office was dark and no lights shone from the L-shaped units grouped about the swimming pool, or from the gas station and cafe next door. Hale settled down to wait, watching the narrow road and checking his revolver.

"Revolver?" Osgood frowned. "Isn't that a bit primitive? One would at least expect some sort of death ray—"

Hale ignored the sarcasm. "Naturally we have our own weapons. But if someone discovered a melted body that disintegrated at a touch, it might cause a certain amount of comment. Secrecy was the vital consideration and death from a bullet wound was the safest method; it would look like just another gangland slaying.

"You see the implications, of course. The Don is killed by a shot from an invisible source. No one knows who fired the weapon. There is confusion, then panic. The mafiosi flee—but from that moment on, fear becomes their constant companion. Who killed the Don? Who is the traitor in their ranks? And who will be the next to die?

“Others would die soon enough. I’d have the license numbers of the cars: tracing them, I’d pick off the capiregime one by one. Morale would collapse, there’d be total disintegration. That’s when the hetchors would send others like myself—hatched and trained to take over the power structure of the organization as visible, apparently human leaders. But it would all begin with the revolver I held in my hand as I waited.”

Arthur Hale huddled in the bushes for a long time as the sun rose, the birds twittered, the insects buzzed and circled in the tall grass.

Then the cars began to arrive—the flashy foreign sports models of the young hoods, the modish Mercedeses of the executive echelon, the conservative Caddies and Continentals of the elderly Mustache Petes.

Dutifully Hale noted the numerals on the license plates of a dozen states, eagerly he scanned the faces of the figures emerging from each vehicle. Which one of these men was the Don?

He had no clue. But by noon the motel driveway and parking area was choked with cars, and no more appeared.

Each passenger had entered the motel office, then proceeded to one of the units behind it. And now, on the stroke of twelve, the guests came forth and trooped into the little cafe next door.

Hale waited until all had gone inside, then rose and crossed the road.

Invisibly, undetectably, he edged the door ajar and entered the cafe, revolver poised and ready.

For a moment he stood there in the doorway, eyes scanning the room. Where was the Don?

The cafe was crowded with circular tables covered by red-and-white checkered cloth and already heaped high with bottles, bowls of salad, and platters of pasta.

Every table was occupied by four or five diners, and from each arose a polyglot babble of cultured accents, street vernacular, fluent Italian, Sicilian dialect.

Portly and paunchy middle-aged men in business suits were seated buttocks-cheek by jowl with long-haired youths in trendy outfits; flashily dressed sporting types gesticulated with diamond-studded fingers; burly oldsters with no apparent neckline between bullethead and beefy body stared stolidly at their plates as they forked food into moving mouths.

But who was the Don?

“It was then,” said Arthur Hale, “that I realized I must rely on tradition. The grand tradition of humbleness and humility to one’s superiors.

“And as I stood there, watching and waiting, I found my answer.

“For now, from time to time during the meal, various men rose from their seats. One by one they moved quietly and unobtrusively to the swinging door at the far end of the cafe—the door leading to the kitchen.

“I had noticed two waiters entering and leaving that kitchen with trays of food. Suddenly I realized that only when those waiters were here in this room did anyone quit a table and venture through the swinging door. Their disappearance was always brief, their return swift—before the waiters left again.

“Now both waiters were here, in the cafe. And for a moment no one had risen to pass through to the kitchen beyond.

“Quickly, I made my move. Threading invisibly between the tables, I reached the swinging door.

“Now came the moment of risk. I had to open that door without detection.

“I stood there, hesitating, glancing around the crowded cafe until I made certain—as surely as I could—that no one was directing his gaze toward the door.

“Then, gripping the revolver, I eased my way through and darted into the kitchen.

“It was a hot and steamy little room, reeking of garlic, fettucine, and the scent of peppers which rose from the pots and cauldrons simmering on the huge old-fashioned wood stove at its center.

“And it was deserted.

“No kitchen help stood at the serving counter, no scullery men were at the sink. No cook presided over the big stove.

“I stared, perplexed, gazing across the kitchen in utter confusion. Through the swirling vapor rising from the stove I saw a pantry entrance at the far end.

“Now, through that entrance, the cook appeared. Not a fat and jolly mustachioed man in a tall chef’s hat—just a little wizened figure in a wrinkled black suit, with a soiled white apron tied around his waist. He shuffled into the room carrying a jar of tomato sauce. Moving to the stove, he opened the jar and prepared to dump its contents into a pasta pot.

“Was this the Don—this tiny wrinkled old man cooking spaghetti in the kitchen of a cheap cafe? Would the overlord of the organization hide away here in the wilderness, living in simple obscurity as he ruled the powers that controlled the world?

“At first glance, at first thought, it was obviously impossible.

“But on second thought—why not? What better cover, what better disguise than this? When one has power—real power over life and death and destiny—one can relish it without riches.

“Second thought demanded a second glance. As the little old man stood over the stove I moved closer.

“And it was then that he looked up. He looked up, and for a moment I saw his eyes; deep, dark, glittering like ink-black ice.

“As I stared into those eyes I knew that this was indeed the Don.

“And he was staring at me.

“I knew he didn’t see me—he couldn’t possibly see me—but something about that glittering gaze revealed his awareness of my presence.

“Still watching those eyes, I raised the revolver. And that was my mistake.

“Because I should have been watching his hand instead—his hand, moving in a blinding blur as he lifted the jar of tomato sauce and splashed its contents over my body.

“The invisible sheath extended, of course, to my clothing and to the weapon I held. But whatever splashed against it would be seen—and now my red and dripping face and arms were suddenly and clearly outlined to his vision.

“It was then, as I reeled back to wipe the stinging liquid from my eyes, that the little old man pulled a pistol from under his apron and shot the revolver out of my hand.

“I fell to the floor. But just before I fainted I caught a final glimpse of the Don standing over me.

“Standing. Shimmering. And disappearing.”

Arthur Hale sighed. “You know the rest,” he said. “The shot must have scared the mob in the cafe. They’d all taken off by the time the sheriff arrived and found me lying alone and unconscious on the kitchen floor.

“There’d been no question of rescue: my people had monitored the proceedings and when I failed them they left for good. My invisibility ended with the introduction of a foreign body—the bullet which pierced my hand.

“So I was still in the infirmary of the county jail when the Feds came by and picked me up. After that all I could do was make the kind of noises which would bring me here to you.”

“Why me?” I said.

“Because you’re the head of the Bureau. You’re the only one in a position to help.”

“Against the Mafia?”

“You don’t understand. They’re not Mafia. Not the top leaders, anyway. The little old man is one of them, but there must be others.

“Others who had the same idea we Vespixians did. Extraterrestrial life forms who came here in vessels of their own, realized who controlled the world, and gradually infiltrated into Mafia ranks just as we planned to do.

"They must have the same powers of invisibility and the same purpose. But they got here first and now they rule." Hale's voice rose shrilly. "You've got to stop them, don't you see that? Find them and destroy them before it's too late—"

Dr. Osgood had already pressed the buzzer and now the security officer was back in the room, yanking at the metal chain and pinioning Hale's arms. Hale was still threshing and screaming as he was dragged out into the corridor.

Osgood listened as the echoes died away, then shrugged. "Poor devil! Talk about paranoid fixations—"

"You'd better look after him," I said.

"Yes. He'll need sedation."

Osgood started for the door, opened it, then stood hesitating on the threshold. "You don't think—Could there possibly be some distorted element of truth in what he told us?"

"Invisible Vespixians and disappearing Mafia?" I shook my head. "No, I don't think."

Osgood went out, closing the door behind him.

For a moment I sat back. But as I had told Osgood, I wasn't thinking. There was no need to think, because the answer was obvious.

It was just an example of the law of averages at work.

What did the astronomers and astrophysicists say? Out of millions of galaxies and billions of solar systems, there had to be thousands of planets capable of supporting life—thousands with life forms more intelligent than those on earth.

Given this possibility, it was quite conceivable that Vespixian aliens could come here bent on conquest. And discover that a similar alien race had preceded them with the same purpose, even using the same method of invisibility to attain their goal.

It was strange, though, that both had arrived at the identical conclusion about the Mafia being the real rulers.

Apparently neither had considered another possibility—that the true secret might lie within the established government itself. Not with dictators and presidents but with those behind them; the shadowy organization of secret police and official espionage agencies who operate above the law and who, by blackmail and intimidation, control the public figureheads.

Theirs was the real power in the world today.

I glanced at my watch. The entity which called itself Arthur Hale would be back in his cell by now and Osgood would be administering an injection. This would be the best time, when they were still together.

Rising, I opened the desk drawer and took out my revolver, checked the silencer. Then I moved to the door.

It was an ugly business and I didn't want to do it, but that's a cop's job—to pressure peace, prevent the possibility of panic. Besdies, I had a duty to myself.

That is, if I wanted to stay in power . . .

PIcture

Robert Bloch.

The name itself is an introduction that should need no elaboration.

If the field of fantasy has its surfeits, they must include vampires and werewolves and chain-dangling ghosts . . . and at the top of the list, deals with the devil. The main problem with the latter is that once the trick has been worked, the story is done. The devil either wins or loses, depending upon the wits of the protagonist dumb enough to enter the deal in the first place. The story hangs, then, on how it is done.

Robert Bloch, like all those in the field, has done his share of deals with the devil. Unlike the others, however, this time he has constructed a story that does not end with . . . the end. Once again we have a lingering, an afterimage, an unwritten line that provides more punch than . . .

Farley found the Devil through the Yellow Pages.

Of course, he had to make inquiries first. He haunted the reserved section of the public library until he found an old book containing the right spells. Then he shopped around for chalk and candles and a lot of smelly herbs. By the time he drew a pentagram and set the candles out and burned the herbs Farley was pretty beat.

Next he chanted the spells and conjured up Astaroth—a rather ugly customer who rode a dragon, carried a viper in his left hand, and seemed very uptight about being disturbed.

But Farley kept safely inside the pentagram and told him what he wanted.

Astaroth shook his head. “Not my department,” he said. “You’ll have to talk to the boss.”

“And where can I find him?”

“Locally he goes by the name of Dr. Horner. He’s in the book.”

“Can I tell him you sent me?”

“Tell him and be damned,” said Astaroth. “I’m getting the hell out of here.”

And he did.

It took Farley two days just to air out the place afterward, and he had a rough time squaring things with the landlady when she complained about the noise. But finally he picked up the phone book and located Dr. Homer’s name.

Not too surprisingly, he turned out to be a Beverly Hills psychiatrist.

Getting an appointment was a hassle; the receptionist did a number about being all booked up until a year from next Thursday. Then he mentioned Astaroth’s name and it turned out to be the magic word.

“Come in tonight,” she said. “Ten o’clock.”

So finally Farley found himself in the private office, face to face with Astaroth’s boss.

Dr. Homer turned out to be elderly and a bit on the short side. The eyes peering from behind heavy glasses seemed quite normal and there were no unnatural growths sprouting from his forehead.

“You don’t look like the Devil,” said Farley.

Dr. Homer blinked. “You don’t look like a man suffering from delusions,” he said. “But of course when my receptionist mentioned Astaroth I knew it was my professional duty to see you as quickly as possible. Would you like to talk about your problem?”

“I’m frustrated,” said Leo Farley.

“Aren’t we all?” Dr. Homer nodded. “Taxes, inflation, wholesale corruption, retail violence. And on top of everything else, this damned business about malpractice insurance.” He broke off abruptly. “Sorry,” he said. “Suppose you sit down and tell me.”

So Farley told him. About his unhappy childhood—not making top grades in school, not making the team, not making girls. How the war in Nam kept him from college, and how he couldn’t enroll when he returned. His parents died in a car crash and he had to go to work in a paint store, even though he was allergic to turpentine.

Then he got into his marriage. Margaret wasn’t much for looks and she couldn’t cook anything but TV dinners, and though he wanted kids she turned out to be sterile. She was also frigid, a nagger, and a compulsive folk-singer. This latter affliction brought about her death from hepatitis, following the purchase of a secondhand guitar with an infected pick.

So for the past six months Leo Farley had lived alone, a pudgy, middle-aged man whose hair—since he was not a politician—was turning gray. He still worked at the paint store, still ate TV dinners, and it seemed as though all he got out of life was older.

“Ever thought about suicide?” asked Dr. Horner.

“Frequently,” said Farley. “Is that your best offer?”

Dr. Homer shook his head. “I’m not suggesting—just wondering. With all the rotten luck you’ve had through the years, what kept you going?”

“This,” said Farley.

He opened his wallet and took out the picture.

Dr. Homer squinted at it through his thick lenses. The three-by-three photo was obviously old and the color was slightly faded, but even so there was no denying the beauty of its subject. The teen-age girl posing full-length in a brief bikini had a voluptuous figure and a sensual, provocative face framed by an aureole of flaming red hair.

The psychiatrist reacted with an unprofessional but highly appreciative whistle. “Who is she?”

“Linda Duvall,” said Farley. “That’s how she looked when she won the beauty contest back in high school. Actually, she was even prettier. I cut this picture out of the annual.”

"Your girlfriend?"

"I never even met her." Farley sighed. "She only dated jocks. The football team, the basketball team, the track team, guys like that. And, of course, the substitutes."

"Promiscuous, eh?"

"I prefer to think of her as democratic," Farley said. "Though that's just a wild guess. Like I say, I didn't know her."

"But you had a schoolboy crush on her, right?"

"Wrong. A man doesn't carry a picture of a girl in his wallet for twenty years just because of an adolescent hangup. I've looked at it night and day and it still drives me up the wall."

"I see," said Dr. Horner. "So that's why you came to me. You want to get rid of those erotic fantasies."

"No. I want you to make them come true."

Dr. Horner stared at Farley for a long moment. "Then you really did see Astaroth?"

"That's right. And he said you were the boss."

"Astaroth has a leaky mouth." Dr. Horner frowned. "But suppose I could help. Are you prepared to pay the price?"

"Anything you ask. Just get me Linda Duvall."

"What do you intend to do with her?"

Farley explained in detail.

"My, my," said Dr. Homer. "I hope you're up to it! That's a pretty heavy schedule for just one night."

"One night?" Farley scowled. "But I was thinking more along the lines of seven years—"

Dr. Horner shrugged. "Sorry, that's the old contract. We don't use it anymore. In the old days, with only a few clients—people like Faust, you know—we could afford to give them personal attention. But now there's just too many deals to keep track of. I'm afraid one night is all I can offer."

Farley picked up the picture of the red-haired girl and studied it. The sound of heavy breathing filled the room. "I've got to have her," he said.

“Got to.”

Dr. Homer smiled. “I understand.”

“Do you?”

“Of course. They don’t call me Old Horny for nothing.” He reached into a desk drawer and produced a parchment covered with crabbed handwriting. “Sign here,” he said.

Farley’s eyes narrowed as he scanned the document. “I can’t read Latin.”

“Too bad. It’s really the only civilized language.” Dr. Homer shook his head. “You needn’t worry, though—it’s a standard contract. Covers everything except acts of God. We have the services of some pretty big attorneys.”

“That figures,” said Farley.

“What’s bugging you then? If it’s the sight of blood, don’t worry. We can dispense with that formality.” Dr. Homer held out a pen. “Here. All I want is a legal signature.”

Farley took the pen, then hesitated once more.

“Now what?” said Dr. Homer.

“I’ll level. You have a reputation for cheating on your bargains.”

“That’s a damnable lie!” Dr. Homer said. “I’m not a crook.”

“Seems to me I’ve heard that before,” Farley told him.

Dr. Homer shook his head. “You’re getting a fair deal. One night with the girl in the picture, Linda Duvall. How could I cheat you?”

“Lots of ways,” Farley said. “I tried to locate her myself, you know, but I came up with zilch. And then I realized twenty years must have changed Linda as much as they’ve changed me. Suppose you find her and I end up with a fat, middle-aged klutz?”

“She won’t be, I promise you.”

“For all I know she might even be dead. I don’t want a revived corpse, either.”

Dr. Horner chuckled. “Don’t worry. She won’t be dead, and she won’t be a day older or younger than she is in the picture. And to anticipate your other objections, I also guarantee that she won’t be mentally or physically ill, she won’t be frigid, and she won’t be a lez. Tell you what I’ll do—just to sweeten the deal, I’ll make her a virgin.”

“Yeah.” Farley licked his lips, then frowned again. “But suppose she hates me?”

“I’ll take care of that, too. I give you my word she’ll be just as eager as you are.”

“You won’t make me impotent?”

“What a suspicious mind you have!” Dr. Horner beamed at Farley appreciatively. “I promise you’ll be able to perform indefinitely. And definitely, too.”

“Then what happens?”

“I’ll come for you at dawn.”

“But we’ll have the night together?”

“Assuredly.”

“Exactly.”

Farley gripped the pen and signed.

Dr. Horner picked up the parchment and put it back in his desk drawer. “There we are,” he said.

“But where is she?”

Dr. Horner smiled. “Linda is waiting for you now—in your apartment.”

Leo Farley smiled then too, for the first time. “I hate to eat and run,” he said. “Or vice versa. But if you’ll excuse me—”

“By all means.” Dr. Horner waved Farley to the door. “Drive carefully,” he said.

Farley drove very carefully.

One thing he had to say for himself: He was always careful. That’s why he’d taken such pains to make sure about the contract—he had no intention of being outwitted. As a matter of fact, he was a little surprised that the Devil didn’t have more smarts. The truth was that Farley had cheated him.

Now, driving home, it was his turn to chuckle when he thought of how his life story had gone down so easily. Because it hadn’t really been such a bummer after all.

His childhood was never unhappy; his parents spoiled him rotten and he was always the biggest bully in the neighborhood. The only reason he didn't do well in school was because he preferred goofing off to studying. He could have been on the football team if he wanted, but he used his time to set up a betting pool instead and made a bundle off his fellow students. His service in Nam was a crock; he'd spent all his time in Saigon as a company clerk by day and a black-market operator by night, which got him an even bigger bundle. And when gambling wiped him out, his parents' death left him a nice chunk of inheritance after he returned. Sure, he'd worked in the paint store, but actually as a silent partner who got 50 per cent of the take. With the chicks through the years he got 100 per cent of the action. And that's what really blew his marriage, when Margaret found out. Slipping her the infected guitar pick was his own idea; it solved all his problems.

Except for Linda Duvall. That part—about the twenty years of frustration—was true. He had the hots for her in school, he had the hots for her all these years, and he had the hots for her now. She was the only thing he wanted that he hadn't been able to get—but he was getting her tonight.

Farley grinned. He'd already damned himself a dozen times over, so there'd been no need for the Devil to make such a bargain. Farley had ripped him off.

Just to make sure, he reviewed the terms of the contract, but he found no loopholes. He was going to get just what he asked for—Linda Duvall, the way she was in her picture, alive, willing, eager. And then—

The mere thought of what was going to happen then set his heart pounding as he parked the car, set his hands trembling as he unlocked the apartment door, set his blood racing as he entered.

But the living room was silent and empty.

For a moment Farley wondered if the Devil had lied to him after all. Then he saw the light in the hall, streaming forth from under the bedroom door.

Of course—that’s where she’d be waiting for him. Well, she wouldn’t have to wait long.

He ran down the hall, flung the door open, entered.

And there she was.

Farley stared at her. Linda Duvall, in the flesh—a gorgeous redhead, stark naked, sprawled across the bed and smiling up at him in invitation.

The Devil hadn’t lied; she was as pretty as a picture. In fact, she was just like her picture.

Leo Farley turned away with a sob and stood waiting for the dawn. There was really nothing else he could do.

Not with a girl who was exactly two inches tall.

The Spoiled Wife

Jerry Clayborn wasn't exactly a prince, but he knew a Sleeping Beauty when he saw one.

"I want her," he said, pointing his finger at the face behind the frost-rimmed glass.

The director frowned. "Are you sure? Remember, you have thousands to choose from."

And so there were. The block-long chamber was bordered by solid walls of glass; behind them, in three tiers of compartments measuring six feet high and two feet wide, the bodies floated.

In spite of the frosting on the glass, Jerry could still see the occupants of each compartment bobbing face forward in their freezing solutions. They came in all colors, all shapes, all sizes: male and female, young and old, ugly and attractive. The one Jerry pointed at had long red hair, exquisitely fineboned features, and a voluptuous figure.

"That's for me," Jerry said. "Talk about your frozen assets—"

"Now, now," the director murmured. "Remember the rules. Releasing a cryogenic subject for purely sexual purposes is against regulations. Each and every one has paid handsomely for the privilege of preservation. And if and when we restore them to life, they are entitled to their full rights as citizens. They cannot be physically abused, used as slaves, or treated as mere sex objects."

"I know that," said Jerry. "I read the law."

"Then you also know the reason for these precautions," the director told him. "Cryogenic experiments date back to the late twentieth century. The problem of maintaining subjects without physical decay had been solved, but the idea that they could some day be revived, free of disease or ailments, seemed a wild dream. Then medical advances made that dream come true, and the result was a nightmare.

"Thousands of people scrimped and saved to go the cryogenic route. They were expected to be thawed out and released now that it was possible.

"But some had been frozen for sixty or seventy years; their families and friends were dead, they had no homes, no possessions. Once freed from the freezer they simply became charity cases, a burden on the economy."

Jerry Clayborn was still staring at the redhead behind the glass. He licked his lips.

"That's when the government took over," the director said. "Abolished private facilities and laid down the rules. No subject can be restored unless his or her upkeep is guaranteed by a citizen of the state."

"Sure, sure." Jerry nodded, goggling at the glass.

The director followed his gaze. "Might I ask what sort of employment you have in mind for this subject?"

Jerry smiled. "I'm going to marry her."

"Really, Mr. Clayborn—"

"What's the matter? It's legal, isn't it?"

"But not advisable." The director pursed his lips. "Experience has shown that such marriages present many difficulties. Cryogenic restorees return to life with a different value system, the product of past cultures. The longer they've been preserved the harder it is to adjust to today's standards." The director pressed a button and a tiny spool of microfilm popped out of a slot below the compartment housing the redhaired girl. He pulled a scanner from his jacket, inserted the film, then frowned.

"The young lady's name is Robin Purvis," he said. "A very early subject dating way back to the 1970s—frozen by her family after an accidental overdose of narcotics. Of course any physical damage will be fully repaired before release."

"So what's wrong?" Jerry said.

"I told you. It's a matter of compatibility. Now if you were to select someone of more recent vintage, so to speak—"

Jerry shook his head. "I want this one."

The director shrugged. "Remember, you were warned."

"No problem." Jerry grinned. "Unless she turns out to be frigid."

She wasn't.

Jerry discovered that during the very first night of their honeymoon on the spacecraft. Robin Purvis was obviously glad to be alive again, grateful to the man responsible for restoring her, and eager to make the most of the situation.

During the flight she quickly adapted herself to gravitational changes and enthusiastically explored all the possibilities of free-floating fulfilment—sex in midair, sex upside down, sideways, and on the ceiling.

But after they landed and shuttled to the honeymoon suite Jerry had rented at the Aldeberan Hilton, Robin looked disappointed.

"What kind of a joint is this?" she demanded. "Where's the television?"

"Reception isn't possible here," Jerry told her. "This is a hard-rock planet."

"Super," said Robin. "Let's get with it."

So Jerry booked a guided tour, they rented insulators, and off they went. Trouble was, Robin found her outfit bulky and cumbersome, the oxygen intake and artificial-gravity unit were difficult to control, and—worst of all—the helmet mussed her hair. But she tried to be a good sport, and it wasn't until the guide conducted them to the caverns that she really blew her cool.

"Let me call your attention to these unusual geological formations," he said, through his speaker grid.

"Never mind that," Robin murmured. "Where's the hard rock you were talking about?"

"This is it," Jerry said. "These outcroppings—"

Robin glared at him through the peepholes in her helmet. “What’s with you, man? Rock is to hear, not to see!”

The rest of the honeymoon wasn’t much better. Robin didn’t like the synthetic meals in the hotel dining room and she didn’t care for the other tourists—particularly the ones from Rigel and Betelgeuse. “All those slimy tentacles,” she said. “How can you stand looking at them? And eating through tubes stuck in their belly buttons or whatever—blecch!”

“Sorry, darling,” Jerry said. “I thought you might find space travel an interesting experience.”

“Going billions of miles just to see a bunch of creepy-looking monsters—who needs it?” Robin shook her head. “If that’s your bag, all you’ve got to do is drop a little acid at home.”

So they went home, but Jerry didn’t drop any acid. He sat down on the posturpad bed in the center of the room while Robin glanced around curiously.

“No more hard drugs, remember?” he told her. “You’re clean now and you’re going to stay that way. Besides, there are no hallucinogens nowadays—they’ve all been outlawed.”

“But what about that pill you make me take every night?” Robin said. “What is it, some kind of birth-control thing?”

“The director gave me a supply when we left,” Jerry told her. “You must take one every twenty-four hours for your life-support level.”

“So what’s for kicks?” Robin surveyed the four walls of the apartment. “Living in one room is for the birds. Come to think of it, I haven’t seen any birds.”

“Extinct,” Jerry said. “With food and oxygen rationed, we can’t afford to maintain unproductive life forms.”

“How about rich people; don’t they have pets?”

“I’m rich enough. That’s why I can afford to live on the four hundredth floor of the best condominium in town.” Jerry gestured at the four walls.

"We have everything we need here. Look—this wall has your dial-a-meal unit. That wall has an automatic atmosphere-recycler installation. Over there is your complete cleaning-and-disposal mechanism. And the fourth wall houses the communications system. I'll show you how they work in the morning." He patted the bed, smiling. "Right now I want to show you how this works." Robin smiled. "Okay. But I kind of figured things would be, you know, different, when I came out of the fridge."

"You'll find a lot of changes, I promise you," Jerry said. "Here—before I forget—take your pill."

Early next morning Robin shook Jerry until he awakened. "Hey, man—get up!"

Jerry blinked into awareness. "What for?"

"Like don't you have to go to work?"

"I suppose so."

Jerry yawned, staggered to the wall housing the communications unit, and pressed a button. A green light flickered across its surface, then vanished.

"There." Jerry nodded. "All finished."

Robin stared at him. "You call that work?"

"I'm a maintainence engineer. I'm responsible for seeing that every mechanism in this condominium functions properly. Once a day I press the button. If it flashes green, then everything's in order."

"You mean it's all done by machinery?"

"Computerized servomechanisms," Jerry said. "Programmed from the control center in Washington AC/DC."

"Then you just stay home here twenty-four hours a day?"

Jerry smiled. "We can be together all the time, darling. Isn't that great?"

"Dynamite," said Robin. But she didn't smile back. And no smile came to her face as the hours passed.

Jerry showed her how to operate the dial-a-meal and order the instant breakfast which popped out of the wall on two disposable trays. It took just an instant to get rid of the leftovers in the disintegrator tube on the adjoining wall, and the apartment itself was antiseptically cleaned in less than two minutes flat.

"You see how simple it is," said Jerry. "If you want to, you can order lunch and dinner and set the timer for delivery. Then you're free for the rest of the day."

"But what are we going to do?"

Jerry patted the bed. "I was thinking—"

"Not now." Robin frowned. "Can't we go for a walk or something?"

"Where?"

"Outside—down below—"

Jerry shook his head. "Ground level to floor one hundred is off limits. Nothing down there but maintainence equipment."

"Couldn't I at least take a look at it?"

"Air pollution's too heavy. Dangerous."

"Don't you ever leave this room?"

"Certainly. I travel, visit friends. Like to meet a few?" Robin nodded, so Jerry punched buttons on the communications unit until a print-out slid from a slot. "All set," he said. "My thyrox is on the roof."

The two-seater thyrox rose vertically, then sped forward, bouncing like a glass bubble between the towering high-rises below. There were hundreds of similar bubbles whizzing past on all sides and Robin stared at them, gripping Jerry's shoulder.

"Watch how you're driving!" she said. "Look out; you almost hit that one—"

"Don't worry," Jerry told her. "We can't collide. Every thyrox is on a computerized course."

But Robin closed her eyes and kept her head down; all Jerry could see was a mass of copper curls until they landed on another rooftop.

“Who we visiting?” she asked as they stepped from thyrox to airlock to interior corridor.

“Lee and Varda Thorek,” Jerry said. “Nice people; you’ll like them.”

It proved a poor prediction. Lee and Varda were well preserved but there was still the generation gap. As Robin pointed out on the way home, what could she rap about with people who were a hundred and fifty years old?

“I’m sorry,” Jerry said.

“If all your friends are like that, we might just as well stay home.”

“Suits me,” Jerry told her. “Let’s go to bed.!”

Robin hesitated. “Well—if you insist—”

“I do. Here, take your pill.”

The next morning Jerry punched the button and Robin dialed their meals. The cleaning apparatus whined for two minutes and then fell silent.

“Now what?” Robin asked.

Jerry pointed at a wall. “You haven’t tried the communications system yet. Let me show you how it works.”

“Is it like TV?”

“Better. We’ve got holography.”

“What’s that?”

“You’ll see.”

Robin saw. The huge wallscreen lit up and beamed forth life-sized figures in three dimensions, so natural that they seemed to be real presences in the room. Jerry switched from band to band, giving Robin a chance to enjoy each program. There was a lecture on hygronomy, a lecture on hydroponics, a lecture on hydrodynamics, and a lecture on hydraulic engineering.

“Is that all?” Robin murmured. “Where’s the car chases and shoot-outs? That’s what I’m into. And what about seeing something exciting—like people jumping up and down and wetting their pants when they win an electric toaster on a game show? You know, entertainment!”

“I’m afraid our programming is structured more along educational lines,” Jerry said, switching off the wall system. “Still, if it’s entertainment you want—” He patted the bed.

Robin nodded and undressed. But when she joined him on the bed and he reached out to embrace her, she turned away.

“Please,” she whispered. “Not now. I’ve got a terrible headache.”

“All right.” Jerry sighed, then reached for the plastic container on the end table. “But before you go to sleep, take your pill.”

The next morning Jerry punched his button and Robin punched hers; in a few moments they’d eaten and cleaned up the apartment.

“See how convenient the walls are?” Jerry said.

“One more day like this and I’ll be climbing them,” Robin told him. She paced the room. “Don’t you ever do *any*thing?”

“What would you like? More space travel? I have other friends you could meet, and there’s a choice of new lecture programs whenever you want. It’s a full life.”

“I’ll tell you what it’s full of,” Robin said.

“If it seems dull to you, I apologize,” Jerry told her. “Now why don’t we just stop arguing and go back to bed?”

Robin pouted. “Is that all you ever think about?”

“But this is why I got married! My psych told me I needed an outlet.”

“You tell that turkey I’m not an outlet! I’m a human being, and I’m entitled—”

“Of course you are, darling.” Jerry nodded. “Just be patient. I know this is a whole new life-style, but you’ll get used to it.”

“Call this a life-style?” A frown furrowed Robin’s face. “No uppers, no downers, no rock, no soap operas on TV, no place to go shopping or get your nails done; you don’t even have any beauty parlors!”

“You don’t need one,” Jerry said. But now, looking at Robin closely, he realized that the flame was fading from her red hair, leaving drab streaks of mousy brown; her makeup and eye shadow had worn off to reveal the mass of freckles and splotchy blemishes beneath. And when she scowled like this she was positively ugly.

Robin’s voice was ugly too, as it rose to a whining screech. “Don’t tell me what I need. You and your life-style make me sick!”

“But that’s just the point, darling,” Jerry said. “Look on the bright side. Thanks to modern hygienic conditioning and a simple, leisurely existence, no one is ever sick. If you’ll only make an effort to adjust, you can live to be two hundred.”

“Another hundred and seventy-seven years of this drag?” Robin’s eyes blazed. “No way!”

Jerry didn’t say anything, but he thought it over. When Robin finally stopped screeching at him and flopped down on the bed, he tried to take her in his arms. She pushed him off onto the floor.

“Dirty male chauvinist pig!” she screamed.

Somehow, in all the excitement, Jerry forgot to remind her about taking a pill.

“Sorry about that,” the director murmured. “I did warn you—”

“Not your fault.” Jerry shook his head. “But it’s quite a shock waking up in the morning with something like that next to you in your bed. Not just the puddle, but the smell—”

“That’s what the pills were for,” said the director. “Remember, a restoree is basically still a piece of meat that’s been thawed out. Only an artificial preservative can halt the process from continuing its natural course. I’m afraid you spoiled your wife.”

Jerry sighed. “What’s done is done. Better luck next time.”

“You mean you’re going to try again?”

“Why not?”

The director rose, smiling. “Excellent.” He led Jerry into the glass-walled chamber, nodding as they moved along the aisle. “I admire your perseverance. Not every man would have the courage and determination to make another such attempt. You do plan on another marriage, I take it?”

“Yes.” Jerry nodded and halted at one of the frost-rimmed glass compartments as its occupant caught his eye. “Call me a romantic,” he said.

The director glanced at him hesitantly. “A word of caution,” he said. “This time I hope you’ll benefit from your experience and make a better choice.”

“Right,” said Jerry, pointing. “I’ll take that fellow over there.”

HIs and Hearse

RANDY DOUGLAS WAS HANDSOME, WELL-DRESSED, THIRTYISH, AND not accustomed to squirming.

But Randy was squirming now—and paying fifty dollars an hour for the privilege—on the couch of a Beverly Hills psychiatrist.

“It’s no use, Doc,” he said. “You may be a good headshrinker, but my head is sanforized.”

The psychiatrist leaned forward in his chair. “Let’s stop playing word-games,” he murmured. “We both know why you’re here. You came to see me because you have a problem. Something’s troubling you, and you want help. But I have to know the facts. So suppose you relax now. Tell me about it, get it off your conscience—”

Randy sat up abruptly, turning away so that the psychiatrist couldn’t see his frown, or the fright behind it. “Maybe that’s what’s wrong,” he said. “I don’t have a conscience.”

Randy was still frowning as he drove into the driveway of his attractive country home high in the hills above the Santa Barbara area.

Susan was waving to him from the doorway, and the afternoon sunshine haloed her brown hair.

Somewhere within himself Randy had found a reserve supply of charisma sufficient to turn his scowl into a smile. He moved away from the car and into his wife’s embrace. Randy summoned more charisma for their kiss.

“Darling, you’re home!” Susan had a talent for stating the obvious, but then she was the obvious type. Even her attempts at makeup and replacing glasses with contact lenses couldn't disguise what she was. Just a quiet, demure and domesticated female who had never even heard of Women's Lib. And that, Randy reminded himself, was why he'd married her.

Sometimes it was hard for him to realize Susan was five years younger than himself. Entering the living room now, for example; its setting was modern in decor, but there were touches straight out of 1910.

The fire going in the fireplace. The slippers placed beside his chair. The pillow which Susan tucked behind his shoulders as Randy seated himself. If he'd been a pipesmoker, she would have had it ready and waiting on the table beside him. The loving wife, prepared for the master's return at the end of a long day.

"How did the day go, darling?"

Randy settled back in the chair as Susan removed his shoes and replaced them with slippers.

"All right. Just one of those lunches, usual thing."

Susan beamed up at him, then sobered. "What's the matter?" she murmured.

Randy made a grab for his charisma, but it eluded him. He was conscious that the smile had oozed away from his face.

All he could do was shake his head hastily—but not hastily enough to stop Susan.

"Is it something I've done? Please, I want you to tell me. You know I'd never do anything intentionally—"

Even her dialogue was 1910. A vintage year for the obvious. Randy reached for her hand, squeezed it quickly to halt her.

"It isn't you. How often must I tell you that this past year has been the happiest one in my entire life?"

"Poor baby." Susan rose. "You're tired. No wonder, fighting all that traffic on the freeway. Let me fix a drink."

She moved to the bar and busied herself behind it. Randy stared off into the den beyond the living room, scanning the rows of bookshelves.

Bookshelves. That's what started it. He couldn't tell this to the shrink much as he'd wanted to. But maybe he could tell it to Susan.

Maybe? He had to.

When a man runs out of charisma, he has to face himself. Not his image, but his reality. And he had to talk about it to someone, so why not Susan? She was the obvious person. Obvious Susan. Take a chance, tell her, let it all hang out.

"Here you are."

Susan handed him his glass, then carried her own over to the sofa.

"Cheers." Randy took a long sip.

When he glanced up from his glass, Susan was watching him.

"Want to talk about it now, darling?" she said.

Randy met her gaze. "I'm warning you. What I have to say may come as a shock."

Susan shook her head. "Don't worry about me. Whatever it is, I'll understand."

Randy took another gulp of his drink. Then, slowly, he lowered his glass and took a deep breath as a chaser.

"All right. It started six years ago—"

Six years ago. Randy Douglas had been just another struggling young actor, then; another bland, blond profile in the Academy Players Directory, listed somewhat hopefully and totally inaccurately under Leading Men.

Randy wasn't playing leads, or even second leads. In fact he wasn't playing, period. That's why he got so excited when his agent, Jeff Griffiths, told him about the possibility of a role in an upcoming TV western series at ABC.

Between the time he got Jeff's phone call and the time he actually entered his office, Randy had everything all worked out. Sure television didn't carry the prestige of movie work, but it often paid better. And, more important, it lasted longer. A lead or running part in a successful show might be good for five years or more—and look at some of the westerns that had lasted for double that! With more money every season, according to contract, plus all the extra goodies; personal appearances in summer, a rake-off on merchandise tie-ins, guest shots on the big variety shows, instant fame and acclaim that led to star billing in films in the future. Plus all those years of residuals on the reruns. Not that Randy fancied himself as a cowboy; he was more of the white-tie-and-tails type. But in a case like this, he'd be willing to make a concession.

He explained all this to Jeff Griffiths, and the little agent smiled and nodded quickly.

"You won't have to concede," Jeff said. "It's not a cowboy role."

"Then what do I play?"

"An Indian."

Randy blinked. "Indian? Hey, wait a minute—what kind of running part is that?"

"It's not a running part. Just a one-shot." Jeff noted Randy's frown, waved it aside. "Now don't get excited. All you have to do is report to Makeup next Monday morning and work your day—"

"One day?" Randy's frown deepened. "What do they expect to get out of me in one day's work?"

"Your line." Jeff handed him a mimeographed script, opened to a page in the middle. Randy stared at it.

"Ugh!" said Randy.

"That's your line." Jeff nodded. "Read it on camera and go home."

Randy stood up. "I'm going home now," he said. "For months you've been telling me to be patient, don't worry, I'll line something up for you. And what do I get?" He extended the script. "Well you can just take this and file it with my contract—"

"Now just a cotton-picking minute here—"

"Never mind." Randy turned away. "I know what you're going to tell me. The old bit about how there are no small parts, only small actors."

"Not always true." Jeff stood up and he wasn't smiling now. "Sometimes it's a case of a small part, but no actor at all."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"It means the reason you haven't worked is that nobody would touch you. One look at those film clips from your tests and they ran away. Ran, not walked. I had to stick my neck out further than a giraffe just to get you this one chance, and you're blowing it. Face the facts, Randy. You're no trouper."

"And you're no agent." Randy opened the door. "Not mine, anyway. As of now."

It was a good exit line, and the slam of the door behind him added a note of emphasis, but somehow Randy had the feeling that the scene didn't play. Jeff had upstaged him. And now he was offstage, off-camera, out of the action, maybe out of show biz entirely. Certainly he was out of bread, and at the end of the month he'd be out of his apartment too, the way things were going.

Randy stalked past the reception desk, shoulders sagging.

"Oh, Randy—Mr. Douglas—"

The receptionist's voice halted him. He turned, straightening his shoulders automatically at the sound. No actor, eh? Well, it took an actor to respond on cue Eke that; to make with the big boyish grin as he glanced over at the receptionist. Little brown-haired chick with nothing really going for her, unless you dig the wholesome type. He'd made it a point to rap with her whenever he came to the office because you never know when these things pay off—sometimes the help can put in a good word for you. Now what was her name? Susan. Susan something—"

She was smiling at him, indicating a sheaf of papers on her desk. "Mr. Griffiths must have forgotten to buzz me. But I have your contract ready and I know he wanted you to sign before you left."

Randy shook his head. "I don't think he forgot. But I turned down the part."

"Oh—"

"No. Ugh. That's the part." Randy revved up the smile to take the sting out of his words. "And I don't want any part of it. Or your boss, either."

"I'm sorry."

"Don't be." He played it cool and casual. "I've got something else lined up." Here was a scene he could handle, the charm-boy routine. "Actually, the only thing I'll be losing is the pleasure of seeing you."

Susan said something and at first Randy didn't catch it, because he was watching her blush. Randy hadn't seen a woman blush in years—even though he had frequently observed them in situations which would warrant it. What was with this bird, anyway? He picked up her conversation midway.

"—so I thought if you were free, perhaps you'd join me—just a home-cooked meal—"

How about that? She was inviting him up to her pad for dinner!

Randy couldn't believe his ears. "Home-cooked meal." Nobody talked like that any more. Was this straight little bird making a play for him, or did she feel sorry because she suspected he was scuffling for bread?

Ordinarily Randy would have enjoyed finding an answer to the question, but not right now. Right now was something else.

"Sorry," he said. "I'd love to, but I'm tied up for the evening."

He said it with a smile, but Susan was the one who looked sorry. Which meant she probably did know his setup. That was the crunch, when you got to the stage where you were pitied by receptionists. Randy decided to change all that.

"Believe me, I'd break the date if I could, but it's too late. I'm having dinner with Elaine Ames."

Name-dropping, but it worked. Susan believed him, or at least she pretended to. And when Randy asked for a raincheck on the invitation, she met his smile and nodded.

"Thanks again," Randy said. "I'll be in touch." He glanced at his watch. "Got to cut out now. I'm meeting her at eight, at Chasen's."

The funny part of it was, Randy did have a date at Chasen's with Elaine Ames. But after he met her, and they slid into their cozy corner booth, it wasn’t funny any more.

This was, Randy reminded himself, strictly business. And that’s what he gave Elaine—the business.

Rapping with her over their drinks, he remembered the first time he’d ever seen Elaine Ames. On Broadway, starring in one of her hit shows—a musical version of A Streetcar Named Desire, entitled Hello, Trolley!

But that was a dozen years ago and now Elaine Ames was just a flashy, garish, aging brunette. Her star had long since faded; tonight, only her diamonds glittered.

Randy kept sneaking peeks at them as he held her hand during dinner. She liked having her hand held and she liked his attentiveness and she liked drinking brandy with coffee in the company of a big, handsome stud. Even though her constant conversation centered almost entirely on the show biz world of twenty years ago, it was obvious that Elaine was trying to retain her youth—and the youth in question was Randy.

“You’re dazzling,” he told her.

She didn’t realize he was talking to the diamonds. “What do you mean?” she murmured.

Randy stared into her mascara, trying to find her eyes. He squeezed her hand, and his voice was low, almost as low as his intentions. And then he spoke.

“I remember when I was a little boy, we had this marvelous Christmas tree one year. And way up at the very top was a beautiful angel—an angel with long, dark hair. She kept smiling down at me, and I wanted to touch her. Just touch her, more than anything else in the world. But I was too small, and I couldn’t reach her.” Randy smiled and leaned forward. “Funny, isn’t it? All my life I’ve dreamed about her. And now, for the first time, I dare to hope that I can reach my angel—”

Only a fuddled, infatuated egomaniac like Elaine could go for such a pitch, but she embraced it—and, later that evening, Randy—eagerly.

Less than a week later, Randy picked up his raincheck, or meal ticket, actually, and had dinner at Susan's apartment. Plain fare, nothing fancy; a description that could apply to Susan herself. But Randy found himself relaxing, and it was easy to talk. Before he knew it he was telling her about Elaine.

"We're going to get married," he said.

The minute it came out he knew he'd made a mistake. The poor kid looked positively clobbered.

"Congratulations," she said, meaning no such thing. "But isn't it rather sudden?"

Whoever wrote her dialogue would never be a candidate for an Oscar, Randy told himself. But a scene is a scene, and he knew how he was going to play this one.

"It's not a matter of choice." Then the brave smile. "When someone cries out to you for help—"

"Elaine Ames needs help?" Susan looked puzzled. "With all her money —"

"It's not a matter of money, either." Randy shook his head. "When you're in the theater, your dedication is to your career. Elaine had a great one, everything was going for her, and then something happened."

"I know," Susan said. "It's called middle age."

"That's what she thinks," Randy said. "But she's wrong. She's not that old. What happened to her is that she lost confidence. The first time she noticed a wrinkle, she panicked. And it's wrong, all wrong. Sure, I'm a few years younger than she is, but that's exactly what she needs now. Someone with a youthful outlook who can help restore her own faith in herself. Why, she could go on to a whole new career out here—"

"And so could you." Susan was staring at him now. "Haven't you thought about that?"

"What do you mean?" said Randy, who had thought about nothing else.

"Elaine Ames isn't a star any more. But she is rich, and she still has friends in the business. With her help, you could go places."

"I suppose you're right." Randy forced a frown. "It's just that I never considered it—"

"Of course not. Because you were too busy being self-sacrificing and noble." Susan smiled at him across the table. "Look, Randy. In a way, I'm part of show biz myself. I don't have your good looks or your ability, but if I did I'd go the same route you're going. I'd marry someone with money and connections and become a star."

"But that's sheer opportunism—"

"Nonsense." Susan was animated now. "You told me yourself that this marriage could help to restore Elaine's confidence. You'll be giving her something money can't buy. So you're entitled to a few benefits in return. It's a fair exchange. Be practical."

Square she was, but not stupid. Randy nodded. "I'm glad you feel that way. I was afraid you thought I was doing the wrong thing."

"It's the right thing," Susan said. "As long as you're doing it for the right reason." She smiled at him. "So congratulations again, Randy. And this time I really mean it."

"Thanks." Randy rose. "I won't forget this evening."

"Neither will I." Susan's eyes were bright. Too bright. "Don't worry," Randy said. "We'll keep in touch."

Promises, promises. How quickly they get lost in the welter of wedding vows!

Randy got lost in them himself and he never did manage to extricate himself long enough to give Susan a call. After the honeymoon he might have invited her out to the house, but he really didn't think she'd feel at home there.

He certainly didn't.

Randy had looked forward to living in a Malibu beach house, until he actually saw the place. Elaine's home was very much a reflection of herself: gaudy, over-decorated, and just a little too rundown. It somehow resembled the set of an old Busby Berkeley musical—and her friends seemed to have stepped out of the cast.

He had already made up his mind to adjust himself to Elaine. With an added effort, he thought he could tolerate her home—with its all-white living room, filled with the kind of furniture Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers used to dance on, including the piano. He could tolerate the floppy French dolls and stuffed animals littering the bedroom, and even her two live dogs, three cats, four budgies and a dozen goldfish. But he soon found he couldn't take her friends.

The animals stayed in the bedroom, but Elaine's friends were all over the house. Most of them were fugitives from Broadway, including a large assortment of ex-chorus girls old enough to have put the sex in the Floradora Sextette.

Randy met them all at the first party Elaine gave after the wedding. He tried to make himself agreeable and kept passing drinks to the crowd, even though he privately felt that most of them should be served nothing but Geritol. But it did shake him up a trifle when he got into conversation with one elderly showgirl who seemed to be under the impression that Randy was Elaine's son.

He was even more shaken up when he realized how little progress he was making on his career. Every time he tried to broach the subject to Elaine she turned him off.

"I couldn't bear the thought of you slaving away in those dreary studios," she told him. "Besides, I need you here, darling. You're such a perfect host for my parties. Which reminds me, we're having a real fun thing tonight—an old-fashioned Charleston contest, for all the girls. With trophies and everything. If it goes over I was thinking about a Marathon Dance—"

It was a Marathon Dance for Randy, all right, but he didn't see any prizes. If anything, he was a prize himself: Elaine's personal trophy, to be exhibited to her Charleston-dancing contemporaries. At the very best his status was that of a pet, to be kept with the others in her boudoir.

Elaine spent a good deal of time in her boudoir. Rising promptly at the crack of noon, she devoted most of the day to a complicated makeup routine with curlers, cream, cosmetics, and corsets, to say nothing of Celia. Celia was her maid and had been since the old Broadway days. She clucked over her mistress like an elderly mother hen, but she pecked at Randy. When Elaine got him into the act to assist her—getting the corset on was a job for at least two people, to say nothing of a derrick—it was plain that Celia resented his intrusion. She muttered under her breath, which was faintly perfumed with the odor of juniper berries, and Randy retreated.

He kept trying to get Elaine away from her influence, urging her to take a trip, or at least go into town for the evening. But Elaine didn't even want to leave the house.

"Why don't we go down to the beach and swim?"

"Really, darling, it's impossible—the sun is bad for the complexion. And I've never learned to swim. Water is bad for the complexion too, you know. Which reminds me, it's time for my bath. Would you help Celia with the goat's milk?"

Elaine bathed only in goat's milk, as Randy discovered—the hard way—when he had to assist Celia in milking the goat.

But milking the goat was child's play compared to milking any money out of Elaine. "Let me handle the finances, darling," she told him. "You just relax and enjoy."

Randy didn't follow her advice. He was too busy worrying about whose head currently appeared on a dime; it had been so long since he'd seen one that he couldn't remember.

Unable to finance a career on Elaine's loot, Randy decided on another approach to the problem. The logical first step would be to cultivate some of the people who attended Elaine's parties. Although her friends were decrepit, quite a few seemed to have imposing connections. Randy scanned the guest lists for VIP's until he found his pigeon.

Actually the pigeon was more of a bald eagle—a big-name producer of costume epics named Cedric Schlokmeister.

Cornering him alone at a garden party one afternoon, Randy made his pitch. He casually mentioned his acting experience to the producer and hinted at his desire to return and make a contribution to the art of the cinema.

Schlokmeister seemed interested. He not only listened, he asked questions. But just as Randy really warmed up, the producer glanced at his watch and frowned. “Sorry,” he said. “I’ve got to go now. I’m due at the unemployment office in half an hour.”

“Unemployment?” Randy said. “A big producer like you?”

“That’s right,” Schlokmeister sighed. “What good is a producer of costume pictures? Nowadays most of the actors in movies run around naked.”

Randy had no answer for him, or for himself. He was beginning to face the truth.

Elaine’s friends were nothing but has-beens. Just hitchhikers on Memory Lane.

Elaine herself was a lazy slob; the only exercise she took was having her face lifted.

And Randy was her prisoner, here in this beach house where no one even used the beach. She cut off his money, cut off his communication with the world. He didn’t even dare call Susan on the phone. It was almost like one of those situations in the paperback mysteries he’d been reading lately.

That’s how he spent his time: reading mysteries he borrowed from Celia, the maid.

And this, oddly enough, was how Randy found a solution to his problem—in an idea that came to him while reading mystery fiction.

One afternoon Elaine was lolling in the pool. Not in it, exactly, but on top of it—floating over the surface on an air mattress under a parasol. The parasol shielded her from the sun and the air mattress kept her from contact with the water.

It was Celia’s day off, and Randy had the place to himself. After a bit he wandered out to the pool, scanning a paperback book.

Elaine glanced up at him and frowned. “Still reading that trash?” she murmured.

Randy smiled and shook his head. “It’s not trash, my love. I happen to be studying theology.”

“Theology?” Elaine stared at him, puzzled, as he moved up to the edge of the pool.

“That’s right.” Randy tossed the book aside. “A fascinating subject. For example, that old religious dispute about how many angels can dance on the head of a pin. I’ve just discovered the answer.”

From his jacket pocket, Randy produced a pin.

Elaine shrugged. “All right, suppose you tell me. How many?”

“One,” said Randy. “One angel—you.”

And, reaching out with the pin, Randy punctured the air mattress.

It hissed and collapsed.

And Elaine gurgled down into the watery depths of the pool.

After a while, she just bubbled.

And then even the bubbles stopped.

Elaine’s funeral was a real production. All her theatrical friends were there. And each one, approaching the casket banked with oversized floral displays, put on her own special act. There was a sobbing spell, a fainting scene, an attack of hysterics—everyone trying to top the others. Some of the old girls hadn’t done a turn since they’d played the Palace, but they were in there now, wowing them at Forest Lawn.

Only Susan remained calm and unmoved. She showed up quietly and uninvited, ready to comfort Randy, and he was glad of her presence. After all, he had an act of his own to play now—the role of the bereaved husband who would inherit all of Elaine’s money after her tragic accident in the pool.

And it had been an accident, of course. “Poor darling—she never learned to swim. The mattress just collapsed, and I didn’t even hear her call out.”

That's what Randy told the coroner, and he believed him. Which made it all a perfect setup to collect the inheritance. Like the old saying has it, prosperity is just around the coroner.

But when Randy confronted Otis Grabb, Elaine's attorney, he lost faith in old sayings.

"Money?" Grabb said. "I thought you knew. Your wife had nothing left but a trust fund. It ends with her death."

"The house—" Randy began.

"Read the will," Grabb advised, scanning a copy. "I hereby bequeath my house to my long-time personal maid, Celia Kronsky, as a token of my appreciation for services rendered—"

Randy gulped. "What about all her jewelry?"

"Paste." Grabb sighed. "The real gems were pawned long ago. No, I'm afraid there's nothing. You'll have to sell the furniture to pay funeral expenses."

Randy walked out. And he walked home, too. Because even Elaine's big car was, he'd discovered, actually the property of a major studio and had been lent to her for old time's sake by a sentimental executive. Now it had been repossessed.

A month later, Randy was back in his old pad—and his old rut. If it hadn't been for a few home-cooked meals at Susan's he would have flipped out completely. As it was, she was right on hand to comfort him in his great loss. Even she didn't know how great the loss was. Seeing Elaine gurgle into the pool was one thing; what Randy couldn't stand was watching his career go down the drain.

Susan did her best to console him. One evening, in order to take his mind off his troubles, she took him with her to a party.

It was a charity affair at a big mansion in Pasadena; Susan got the tickets from her boss at the talent agency. He had no interest in attending, because there was no connection with show biz. As a matter of fact, Randy didn't recognize a single Hollywood celebrity in the crowd. This was the society set: people with "old" money and inherited position. Here in the grand ballroom he could sense the scent of real wealth. Dignity, gentility, breeding, and oil-depletion allowances.

Randy was charmed by it all, and decided it wouldn’t hurt to do a little charming in return. The beneficiary was his hostess, Mrs. Worthington, a grand dame of the old school—possibly the old Pasadena High School, class of ’26. Susan made no objections when he danced with the dowager, and over buffet dinner Mrs. Worthington responded to his courteous attentions with senile abandon.

Randy was out to impress her for what it was worth, and it turned out to be worth a great deal. Because the old bat was saying she wanted him to meet this niece of hers who had this terrible problem—it seems she was simply besieged by fortune-hunters and parasites who were after her money. The poor helpless girl really didn’t know where to turn.

“Oh, here she is now,” said Mrs. Worthington, waving in the direction of the dance floor. “Constance, my dear—”

Constance Maitland didn’t seem to fit Mrs. Worthington’s description at all. Poor she certainly wasn’t, and there was nothing about the tall, aristocratic, golden-haired presence which suggested a helpless girl. As for not knowing where to turn, that too seemed unlikely—for she turned to Randy quickly enough. And clung to him the remainder of the evening.

“You’ve made a conquest,” Susan said, as she drove him home.

“Nonsense,” Randy told her. “Can you picture me in society?”

It was a purely rhetorical question, or perhaps an impurely rhetorical one. For Randy didn’t care if Susan could picture himself in society; it was enough that he pictured himself, and this he did quite easily.

In. In society and out of the rat race. Who needed a career in that phoney theatrical world when you could already enjoy every benefit that could possibly be obtained from struggling to get ahead? Here was a chance to get off the treadmill and onto the A list for dinner invitations.

So Randy spent the next few weeks commuting on the Pasadena Freeway. It was a new experience for him, wooing someone in Who’s Who, but he kept after Constance—constantly. Inevitably the time came when she too heard the Christmas tree story—with a blond angel, this time—and the rest was easy.

Constance admitted she had rotten luck with her first four husbands, to say nothing of her last five analysts, but she was willing to try again.

If poor Susan was disappointed at the news, she managed to conceal it with good grace. Randy bid her a regretful farewell and prepared to move into the Pasadena mansion. This time there were no mistakes, no misconceptions; the money was there and it was real.

Real money. Real luxury. Gracious living, travels with the international set, invitations to Greek yachts—maybe even a possibility of getting good seats at the Rose Bowl Game—it seemed almost too good to be true.

But it was. Randy had a good seat that New Year's Day at the Rose Bowl, because Constance was keen on sports.

The problems arose only on the other three hundred and sixty-four days of the year. That's when Randy discovered the meaning of gracious living.

Gracious living is remembering how to dress for the Hunt Breakfast, the Club Luncheon, and the Formal Dinner. Gracious living means not sitting down on the antique furniture because it's roped off. Gracious living is having the servants follow you around and empty the ashtray the moment you flick your cigarette into it. Gracious living is wandering through two dozen drafty, high-ceilinged rooms of an old mansion and listening to the endless echo of a hundred clicking, ticking clocks until you want to climb the walls—but people who live graciously don't climb walls, now, do they?

Not that Randy needed the wall-climbing for exercise. Constance saw to that. She was, he soon discovered, not only a sports enthusiast but a physical-fitness buff. Randy didn't like her preoccupation with health—there was something sick about it.

Even more distressing was Constance's insistence that he join her in exercising. Before he knew it, Randy was doing everything from standing on his head in upside-down Yoga to sliding on his derriere while jogging down a mountain.

A typical day found Randy rising at five a.m. for a brisk canter on the bridle path—followed by a brisk toss into the bushes. After breakfast there'd be a few sets of tennis; following lunch came a round of golf on a private course. By the time dinner was over, Randy felt ready to collapse into bed with Constance. And the dogs. Elaine had liked pets, but at least she'd kept them in their place. Constance's love for animals knew no bounds, and she set no bounds on them. As a result, each night a different dog shared their bed; everything from a poodle to a Great Dane. He never knew quite what to expect, except that the dogs all adored Constance and hated him. His efforts to bar them from the bridal chamber were useless; Constance and her dogs were inseparable. Randy soon realized that his wife's favorite perfume was Kennel Number Five.

He also came to learn that Constance kept a very tight hold on the pursestrings. She had been brought up in the time-honored tradition of established wealth, and its first rule was never to dip into capital; one lives on interest.

With a staff of household servants to support—including one elderly retainer whose sole duty was to make the rounds of the mansion and keep winding the clocks—even Constance's income from investments didn't stretch too far. At least it didn't stretch far enough for Randy's grasp.

To his surprise, he found himself more pinched for cash than ever, and soon he was reduced to reading only those paperback mysteries he could acquire from second-hand bookstores. Quite often now he read them in bed, but neither Constance nor the dogs objected. In fact, Constance rather encouraged him.

"You're really a dear," she told him. "So completely house-broken—I mean, domesticated. I rather think my marital problems are solved at last."

For Randy, however, they were just beginning. He would have given a great deal to consult Susan, but Constance was not about to permit it. The tight hold she kept on the pursestrings was nothing compared to the tight hold she kept on Randy. And now that she'd made up her mind to stay married to him, she meant to keep him in line. Unlike Elaine, Constance didn’t entertain; she was quite content to spend all her time with her husband.

Unfortunately for Randy, this was all she was willing to spend. He’d thought he was landing in the lap of luxury, but now he found himself on the hot seat. Or, at very best, serving a life sentence.

He seemed to be picking up a good deal of criminal argot from his mystery reading. Enough to know that confinement here in the mansion was driving him stir-crazy.

One day, during their Yoga exercises, he spoke to Constance. “I was thinking it might do us both good to get away for a while. We need a change.”

To his amazement, Constance nodded. Which wasn’t easy to do, since she was standing on her head at the time.

“We could take a vacation,” he continued. “Maybe a nice long trip around the world.”

“I’m afraid that’s not practical,” Constance said, going into the double-lotus position. “There’s one of those dreary board meetings coming up at the bank, you know.”

“Acapulco?” Randy ventured.

“How utterly vulgar!” The double-lotus blossomed. “Why don’t you let me surprise you? There’s a perfectly marvelous desert resort—”

Randy brightened. Desert resort? That probably meant Palm Springs, one of those plush pads for the private-jet set, the beautiful people.

But Constance really did surprise him. They didn’t jet to the desert; Randy drove them down in the town-and-country wagon, which was loaded with sports equipment. And it wasn’t Palm Springs or anywhere near Palm Springs, geographically or otherwise.

The place was called Mesa Chistic, and the weather-beaten old inn was authentically Spanish architecture; in fact, judging from the age of the hostelry it might well have been built by one of the original conquistadores. Nor did Randy notice any beautiful people; this resort was so exclusive that scarcely no one ever came there. The truly wealthy, he was discovering, have a passion for privacy. “Isn’t it quaint!” Constance exclaimed, as Randy unloaded their gear. “Look—not even a bell captain to bother us!” Randy could have used a bell captain, plus three bellboys and a pack mule to help him lug their luggage up the stairs, but Constance was obviously enchanted. Besides, she didn’t have to give him a tip.

The truly wealthy sometimes have a passion for penury, too. Randy found that Constance was quite careful about expenditures; she always checked the tab before signing for meals in the dining room. And while riding the desert trails was rather pleasant, Randy didn’t enjoy returning to the stable and grooming the horses.

“No sense throwing money away,” Constance told him. “Besides, it’s good exercise.”

Golf was good exercise too, in her opinion—but Randy didn’t appreciate having to serve as caddy. He said as much.

“You really shouldn’t complain,” Constance chided. “Perhaps the bag is a trifle heavy, but this is really the best course.”

It wasn’t the best course for Randy. And the longer they stayed, the more he fetched and carried and waited on Constance, the more he began to wonder just what the best course really was.

Going on this way was out of the question. A life sentence of penal servitude wasn’t what he’d bargained for, and there didn’t seem to be any chance of getting time off for good behavior.

On the other hand, there was always bad behavior.

Randy thought about it as he scanned through some of the mysteries he’d stashed away in his luggage. He thought about it some more while sneaking a drink with Mike Forester, a traveling salesman who showed up in the otherwise deserted bar that afternoon. Forester wasn’t exactly the type Randy would have chosen as an old drinking buddy, but at least he was company. “You really know how to belt ’em,” Forester told him, as he watched Randy down his third double scotch. “We’ll have to get together and tie one on.”

“It’s a date,” Randy said. “Maybe tomorrow—”

At which point Constance entered the bar and dragged him away.

“Really, how could you?” she murmured, as she led him upstairs to their room. “Drinking in public with that dreadful, common creature.”

“I needed a drink. Had a headache all day. Maybe I’m coming down with something.”

“A good night’s rest will do more for you than alcohol,” Constance decided. “And tomorrow, we’ll tone up your system with a nice round of golf.”

But Randy didn’t get a good night’s rest. While Constance slept, he crept out of the room, left the hotel, and with a heavy canvas sack, ventured a way into the surrounding desert.

The next morning, when she awoke, Constance found him tossing and turning in bed.

“I really do feel sick,” he told her. “Guess I’d better spend the day in the sack here and let you golf alone.”

It took some persuading to keep Constance from calling a doctor, but in the end Randy managed to convince her to go out to the course while he rested.

And while she was dressing, he also managed to pull the sack out from under the bed and transfer its contents to another receptacle.

As soon as Constance left, Randy got on the phone with Mike Forester.

“About that little drinking date of ours,” he said. “How soon would you like to meet me in the bar?”

“Any time now.” Forester hesitated. “But are you sure your wife won’t object?”

“Don’t worry about my wife,” Randy said. “It’s in the bag.”

And so it was.

At that very moment Constance stepped onto the deserted desert golf course, ready to tee off. Reaching into her golf bag she pulled out a club—around which was coiled a live and angry rattlesnake—

Constance's funeral was a tasteful study in black and white; a cavalcade of black limousines discharging white-haired dowagers. As they moved in stiff and stately procession to the graveside, Randy was grateful for Susan's company. There were no dramatic performances at this sedate burial, only proper and precise condolences.

Randy took more comfort in Susan's sensible expression of regret. She reminded him that accidents do happen and one must accept them. Now he must dismiss the sad past and consider a happier future. This time, as he already knew, there were no financial problems. He had inherited Constance's estate and he would be free to settle down as he pleased.

But settling down didn't please Randy. Wealth and position had brought him nothing but misery, and he wanted no part of that; social activity was as empty as show biz. Nor did he intend to dwell on Constance's passing, mourning noon and night. It was time to live a little.

With that in mind, one evening he dragged a somewhat reluctant Susan to a rock joint on Sunset Strip. And it was there he saw Penny.

Penny Nichols was something to see—and hear. The teenaged, red-headed guitar-playing singer worked with four male accomplices in a folk-rock conspiracy against the eardrums called The Iron Marshmallow.

The moment Randy saw her he realized Penny was What's Happening, Where It's At, Like It Is. And before Susan quite realized his reaction, he was off and running.

The next night he returned to the place alone, and during intermission he managed to have Penny join him for a drink. Half-blinded by psychedelic light shows and half-deafened by electronically amplified rock, he had a little trouble seeing and hearing the girl clearly, but he managed. What impressed him about Penny was that she had none of the theatrical phoniness of Elaine or the artificial gentility of Constance. Penny was spontaneous, outgoing, and her breathless enthusiasm concerned itself with the basic realities of existenceloving, sharing, giving. This was the sort of attitude an older man appreciates in an attractive young girl, and Randy was no exception. It was a trifle awkward to explain this to Susan, but she seemed to understand.

"Whatever makes you happy," she said. "But if it's what I think it is, I really don't think you have to marry the girl in order to obtain it."

"I'm talking about a whole new way of life," Randy said. "Free. Honest. Open. A youthful outlook. You can understand that."

"I can understand you," Susan told him. "And if this is what you really want—"

Randy wanted, no doubt about it. Only a few nights later he found himself telling Penny a groovy version of his Christmas tree story, involving an angel with red hair.

As usual, Randy's charm won the day.

They were married—quite legally, and for a fifty-dollar fee—by a bearded guru. Penny's four musical associates, Tom, Dick, Harry and Irving, all acted as best men at the ceremony. And then Randy took his bride home to the new house he'd bought high in the Hollywood Hills.

Randy had indeed won the day. But not the war.

Penny's first reaction to the house disappointed him a little.

"It's square," she said, wrinkling her nose.

"Of course. Actually, it's more of a rectangle—that's the way they build ranch houses."

"I'm talking about the furniture. We've got to get rid of this junk, make the place comfortable."

Randy was willing to indulge Penny's taste, but he was a little disturbed by her lack of it. Her efforts as an inferior decorator soon transformed the. ranch house into a raunch house, and when Randy surveyed the mattresses scattered across the bare floor in front of the random accumulation of incense burners, Pop Art posters and Pot Art paintings, he shook his head.

"Looks like a hippie pad," he said.

"Don't you want my friends to feel at home?" Penny asked.

Randy really didn't—not after he learned that Tom, Dick, Harry and Irving were going to occupy the guest house in back.

“But we’re a group,” Penny explained earnestly. “A family. I told you I wasn’t about to give up my work. And now with them all together here, we won’t have to worry about rehearsals.”

Randy worried about rehearsals. Even earplugs didn’t help. As the weeks went by he came to realize that Penny was still a swinger, and he began to get a trifle dizzy as he tried to swing with her.

In this marriage, unlike the others, he was the Older Generation, and it was tiring to leap the Generation Gap in such fast company. He had hoped for a life of fun and games, but the name of this game was Penny Anti. Anti-Establishment, that is.

Penny and her weirdo-beardo companions took over the house, and inevitably Randy retreated to his den. It was stocked with brand new mystery thrillers now, and he did his best to concentrate on his reading amidst the din.

Sometimes, during Penny’s absence, it was harder to concentrate amidst the silence.

It was during one of those silences that Randy, venturing forth in search of his wife, discovered that she had decided to continue practicing in the guest house. But what she was practicing—with Tom, Dick, Harry and Irving—didn’t please him.

“All this talk of loving, sharing, giving,” he muttered. “I might have known.”

“You’re too straight to know anything,” Penny said, defiantly. “I’m one of the Flower Children.”

“Slightly wilted,” Randy said.

But when he mentioned divorce, Penny shook her head. “You’re out of your skull. I like it here. And if you try anything like that, I’ll take you for all the bread you’ve got.”

“On what grounds?”

“Mental cruelty, the works. And don’t forget, I can make it stick. I’ve got four witnesses—Tom, Dick, Harry and Melvin.”

“Irving.”

"Oh, yeah, Irving. Melvin was last season, I forgot." Penny shrugged. "But you just remember this. You lead your life and I'll lead mine and we'll make it okay. I'm not about to split."

So the only splitting involved Randy's ears as he retreated to his den and listened to the freaked-out sounds of rehearsal. The electric guitar, Randy decided, is not a musical instrument.

Penny informed him that she and her creepy crew had taken an engagement at a far-out joint which was far out geographically too, in the southern beach area.

Randy nodded agreeably at the news. "Mind if I come along for the opening?"

"You're making the scene?" Penny was a trifle surprised. "I sort of figured you'd object to me working again."

Randy smiled. "Whatever turns you on," he said.

So the scene was made. Randy even lugged her electric guitar backstage for her and helped the boys set up their amplifying equipment. Then he went out front to a table, opening a brand new mystery thriller to read while waiting for the show to begin.

He closed it only when Penny opened her mouth. She and the group came out on the platform, the lights dimmed, and the first number started.

Penny gripped her guitar, ready to sing. Her lips parted, but no sound emerged. Penny stood there, rigid, her hair rising and standing on end. From the red curls streamed blue sparks. This time her electric guitar was really turning her on—with a short circuit. It was a shocking performance.

Penny's funeral was a swinging affair, with few flowers but plenty of weed. Hippie musicians formed a procession to the cemetery—sports cars, microbuses and motorcycles snaking out to the graveside. Here they did their thing instrumentally, speeding the dear departed to That Big Pad Up In The Sky.

Randy watched silently, then turned away and walked back along the path into the shadows where Susan was waiting.

It was over now, all over, and he'd never been so glad to see anyone in his life. From now on, he knew, his life would be her life. Their life. Impulsively, he embraced her . . .

Randy was embracing her now, here in the living room, as he concluded his confession.

"Please," he said. "Try to forgive me. If you could only understand—"

"But I do." Susan managed a smile. "I know how Elaine made you suffer, and of course Constance was impossible. As for Penny—well, after all, as you say, you really didn't have a choice. I'm not saying I approve, but you did what you felt was necessary."

"It was necessary, believe me," Randy sighed. "There was no other way out."

Susan nodded, brushing a stray tear from the edge of her right contact lens. "Besides, it's all over and done now," she said. "You've had your experience with ambition, wealth, youth. Perhaps you've learned your lesson."

"Thanks to you." Randy reached for his drink. "Now I know that what I really wanted was the warmth and comfort of the simple life. The life you've given me."

Susan glanced at him. "One question, darling."

"Yes?"

"About that Christmas tree angel. What was the real color of her hair?"

Randy shrugged. "When I was a kid I never had a Christmas tree," he said.

He gulped the rest of his drink, set it down. When he turned to Susan his jaw was set. "One thing more. I didn't go into town for a luncheon date today. I went to see a psychiatrist."

"Oh?"

“I hadn’t intended to tell you this, Susan, but you’ve been so understanding—I feel I must.” Randy hesitated, eyes lowered, then met Susan’s gaze. “You see, I wanted to kick my habit.”

“Habit?”

Randy shook his head. “No, it’s not drugs. It’s another kind of addiction. After reading all those mysteries I began to develop a sort of pattern—I seemed to start thinking in terms of, well, ways and means. Ways and means I used to dispose of three wives. And even afterwards, I found that I couldn’t stop. Without knowing it, I’d gotten hooked on this kick.”

Susan’s eyes widened. “Go on,” she said.

“That’s just the trouble. I did go on.” Randy gestured toward the book-lined den beyond the open doorway. “In one of my books I ran across a description of a new chemical derivative. It’s a colorless, odorless poison that leaves no trace in the tissues or bloodstream. Depending on the amount of the dose, it works in anywhere from an hour to a day. The symptoms resemble a sudden stroke—the victim goes rigid, completely paralyzed.”

“Randy—”

Randy’s gaze fell. “I couldn’t help it,” he said softly. “I even found myself purchasing ingredients to concoct the stuff. That’s when I knew I had to go and see a shrinker. But it was no good. I just wasn’t able to tell him, he’d never believe me.”

Randy rose and moved across the room, behind the bar. “Maybe you don’t believe me either, but I can prove it to you. I put the stuff in a bottle and stashed it away. Under here.”

Reaching down, he pulled out a small bottle. As he raised it the blood drained from his face. He gasped.

“Empty—”

Susan smiled. “Of course. I found it when I was cleaning, after you left. I realized it must be some kind of poison.”

“Thank God!” Randy murmured. “You disposed of it?”

“In a way.” Susan’s smile didn’t waver. “I poured it into the drink I gave you.”

Randy’s jaw dropped. He stared over at his empty glass, then back at Susan.

She wasn’t smiling now. “Your little confession didn’t really shock me, darling. Somehow, I’d always suspected that you got rid of your former wives.”

“But you never said anything!” Randy gestured helplessly. “You waited for me, you married me yourself—you were so innocent—”

“Patient,” Susan said. Her eyes narrowed, “Has it ever occurred to you that perhaps I might want the same things you did—riches, position, a chance to have younger partners? But I was willing to wait, darling. I let you do the dirty work for me. Knowing that in the end I’d marry you, get rid of you, and have everything for myself.”

Randy stumbled back to his seat, her voice ringing in his ears. But when she stopped talking the ringing continued, and now he could feel the numbness creeping through his limbs. He sank back in the chair, his paralysis mounting swiftly. It was all he could do to speak, but he forced the words out.

“You should have waited a little longer. Until I told you the rest. About how murdering wives becomes a habit. That’s why I really went to the psychiatrist—when I knew the habit was too strong for me. Because after I mixed the stuff up, I couldn’t help it. I used the poison on you—”

“But that’s impossible!” Susan whispered.

With an effort, Randy shook his head. “Not in a drink. A smaller dosage—takes longer to work—but you should be feeling the effect by now—”

Susan tried to rise, and failed. She managed to turn her head toward Randy, asking a question with her eyes.

“Yes.” Randy’s voice was faint but clear. “Your eyes. Before I left the house today—I poured some of the poison—into your contact lens solution—”

Sunset summoned shadows to shade the house as Sally and Jim approached the front door.

“I know they’re not expecting us,” Sally told her husband. “We’ll just surprise them.” And she rang the bell.

There was no answer. Sally waited and rang again.

“What did I tell you?” Jim shrugged. “They’re not home.”

Sally shook her head. “Oh, they’re home all right. But you know how it is with Randy and Susan at cocktail time. They’re probably both stiff by now.”

Inside the living room, staring at one another in mutual astonishment in the firelight, Randy and Susan were very stiff indeed.

Freak Show

In which we learn about some pretty awful doings at a mud show at the Goober City Fairgrounds from a master of the horror story. A new Bloch collection, SUCH STUFF AS SCREAMS ARE MADE OF, was published recently.

Goober City Fairgrounds lay out in the boondocks and came to life only during the county fair. Nothing ever happened on the premises the rest of the year, aside from a few muggings and an occasional rape.

But on this particular morning, as Sheriff Higgs drove up in the patrol car, he noticed signs of other activity.

Parked right spang in the middle of the main arena was a big red van. And standing next to it was a man.

Sheriff Higgs knew every fourwheeled contraption or two-legged critter in Mayhem County, but he'd never seen this van or man before. He pulled up about fifty feet away, climbed out, and walked over slow and easy.

The van was unmarked and had an out-of-state license, so that didn't give him much to go on. The man was nothing to write home about, either—tall, on the skinny side, dark hair and eyes—he could be young or well into middle age, depending on the face under the beard. But his shirt and pants were too clean for a hippy-type, and there just wasn't anything about him you could get a handle on.

Sheriff Higgs decided to feel his way. “Morning,” he said. “Mighty warm day and fixing to get worse. Folks say it’s so hot you can fry eggs on the sidewalk.”

“Bad for your health,” said the man. “Too much cholesterol.”

“Don’t worry about my health,” the sheriff told him. “I’m here on official business.”

The stranger smiled. “And what might that be?”

Sheriff Higgs held up a printed placard and squinted at its bright red lettering in the sunlight. Carnival Of Life, he read. The Greatest Show On Earth. Adults Only—Fairgrounds, Tonight.

The man nodded. “Went up late last night when I arrived. You’ll find them on every telephone pole in Goober City. Forty-seven, as I recall.”

“That’s forty-seven violations,” the sheriff told him. “Law says you can’t post bills in public property without a permit.”

“Sorry,” said the man. “I thought that was merely a formality. And since my stay is short I’m rather pressed for time. But I suppose law and order is the name of the game.” And he winked.

Sheriff Higgs looked him straight in the eye. “It’s not a game with me. Like I said, I’m here on business.”

“I agree,” said the stranger. “Let’s shake on it.” He stuck out his hand and Sheriff Higgs took it, feeling the crisp crackle of folding-money against his palm as he slid the bill into his trouser pocket.

The man turned away. “Now that the proprieties are observed I must ask you to excuse me. There’s work to be done.”

“Hold it,” said the sheriff. “I got to know a little something about this carnival of yours before I give you the go-ahead.”

The man shrugged. “No problem. It’s just a mud-show. Been doing these one-night stands for years, like Dr. Lao or Cooger and Dark.”

“Never heard of them,” the sheriff said. “Or you either. Mind giving me your name?”

“Fall,” said the stranger. “Fall’s the name—though I’m a man for all seasons, so to speak.”

Sheriff Higgs cocked his head at the red van. “Where’s the rest of your outfit, Mr. Fall?”

“They’ll be along shortly. Once I get the tent up—”

“Not so fast. Suppose you tell me just what goes on inside that tent of yours. Handbill here says Adults Only. Is this here one of them sex shows?”

“Certainly not.”

“What about gambling?”

“I’m not partial to games of chance.”

“You bringing in any wild animals?”

“I have no dealings with animals.”

“Then just what do you deal with?”

“What kind of freaks?”

“Come back tonight and see for yourself.” Mr. Fall smiled. “I think you and the good people of Goober City will find it a most unusual attraction.”

The good people of Goober City must have expected sex, gambling and wild animals, because they came swarming onto the fairgrounds right after dark.

Sheriff Higgs saw that just about everybody was there, from the folks who worked in the mill to the big wheels who lived on the hill—banker Fence, lawyer Tudd, even Mayor Stooldrayer. Brought their wives along, too; it wasn’t the kind of a show they’d choose for their girlfriends.

The arena lights were on and loud music blasted from an amplifier outside the tent. But that’s all Sheriff Higgs noticed—there weren’t any rides or shooting galleries or guess-your-weight outfits, no fortune-teller booths, no Keeno concessions, not even a stand where you could buy a chiliburger or a Dr. Pepper.

There was just this one tent, not all that big, either. It had a platform out front, and the sheriff spotted Mr. Fall standing on it with his back turned, putting up banners all along the side of the canvas wall. When Fall turned around, the sheriff saw he was wearing a fancy red suit that looked to be velvet, with shirt and tie to match. Even his shoes were red and he carried a red cane in the crook of his arm. He'd slicked his hair back with little puffs standing up on either side of his forehead, and with that beard of his he was a dead ringer for the label on a bottle of Pluto Water.

"Good evening," he said, coming down to the edge of the platform. "Glad you could make it."

"That's some getup you're wearing," Sheriff Higgs told him. "You look like one of those old-time stage magicians."

"All part of the act." Mr. Fall smiled. "If you mean to succeed in this world, you've got to cater to your customers' wants. And what they want most is illusion."

"What kind of tricks do you do?"

"Just the basics. No complicated gimmicks, no phoney effects, no walking on water or changing water into wine. I leave cheap miracles to the opposition. Experience has shown me that most people don't require much in order to be fooled. All they need is the opportunity for self-deception."

Sheriff Higgs frowned. "Well, you don't put over anything on me with that scam," he said. "Notice you still only got one tent. Where's the other stuff you said was coming?"

"Everything's inside," Mr. Fall told him. "And the show is ready to begin."

He turned away and walked to the center of the platform, pounding on the wooden planks with his cane.

The cane must have been rigged up with some kind of remote-control amplifier because it made quite a racket. And Mr. Fall's voice came through loud and clear.

"This way," he called out. "This way, ladies and gentlemen, for the free show."

The ladies and gentlemen began to gather around the platform, pushing and shoving and fighting for a place up front, the way people aways do when they figure on getting something for free.

There was quite a bit of cussing, and some of the older folks got their toes tromped on, but no one was seriously hurt, from what Sheriff Higgs could see. He was right up front himself, of course; nobody gets ahead of the law.

"Good evening one and all," said Mr. Fall. "And welcome to the Carnival of Life."

"Some carnival!" mumbled a voice from behind the sheriff. "Where's the belly-dancers?"

Sheriff Higgs didn't bother to look around; he knew who was speaking because he could smell his breath. Clay Tolliver, the mortician's son, always got pretty well bombed by this time of evening.

Mr. Fall smiled and nodded. "In answer to the question regarding the performers, allow me to call your attention to the pictorial displays directly behind me. In the quaint jargon of the old-time carny, they are known as 'the bloody banners.' If there happen to be any Englishmen in the audience, I trust they will take no offense."

There were no Englishmen or any other foreigners present and no offense was taken; everyone peered up at the painted panel of an enormously fat woman indicated by Mr. Fall's cane.

"Big Bertha," he said. "Five hundred pounds of pulsing pulchritude—a quarter of a ton of solid human flesh—the fattest female figure in the firmament."

Down in front, Mrs. Agatha Crouch stood bulking before the billowing poster, one hamlike hand gripping her husband's arm and the other encircling an open jar of garlic dills. Raising the jar to her gaping mouth, she snagged one of the pickles between her teeth and began to munch on it.

Mr. Crouch was a feisty little man and he swore a blue streak as a squirt of pickle juice sprayed the top of his head.

"God-diddly-damn-it!" he yelled. "You dribbling all over me!"

"Okay, then you hold it," said Mrs. Crouch, thrusting the jar into his hand and fishing another dill from the brine with her pudgy fingers.

Mr. Crouch scowled. “Bringing pickles to a carnival,” he muttered. “Eat, eat, eat, that’s all you ever do. Don’t you get enough food at home?”

Agatha Crouch’s chins quivered with righteous indignation as she popped the pickle into her mouth. “I don’t get me enough of anything at home, you miserable runt! Now shut up and listen to the man.”

The man was indicating another portion of the panel, where a tiny figure rested on the fat woman’s lap, almost obscured by her bulging belly.

“Big Bertha’s diminutive darling,” he chanted. “Little Leo—a minuscule mite of mankind mated to a mountain—a marvel of mirth and merriment!”

“Haw!” remarked Agatha Crouch, squinting at the small shape lost in the flabby folds of the fat lady’s lap. “Sure looks funny, don’t it?”

“Yeah.” Mr. Crouch nodded as he craned his neck to see the banner. But he was staring at the picture of the fat woman.

Up on the platform Mr. Fall moved to another panel. This one depicted a strangely garbed, grinning creature with a chinless face, pointed ears, pale skin and a shaved, oddly pointed skull. As a fanciful touch the poster artist had added a dozen white mice crawling over the creature’s head and shoulders; a thirteenth dangled by its tail from between his teeth.

“Pooky the Pinhead!” said Mr. Fall. “Actually a microcephalic—one of Mother Nature’s little mistakes. But as you can see by his smile, he’s a cheerful fellow and doesn’t mind playing the game of life without a full deck.”

Somebody in the crowd let out a cackle, and the sheriff turned to see who was responsible. But it was only Junior Dorkin; you couldn’t hardly call him responsible, seeing as how he was the village idiot and an albino to boot. He just kept laughing and pointing up at the picture, same as usual. Junior laughed just about all the time, even when he was cutting up a stray cat.

“Huh-huh-huh!” he wheezed, wiping a gob of spittle from his receding chin. “Wanna see him eat mouses—”

Now Mr. Fall was gesturing at another banner, even more lurid than the others. It showed a hulking hairy monster with ape-like features, leering down at a cowering, scantily clad girl.

"Out of the primeval past," he was saying. "A bestial being emerges from the misty mystery of prehistoric time. Behold the living, breathing ancestor of human kind—Homeo Pomeo, the Wild Man of Borneo!"

"Man, that's weird!"

Sheriff Higgs glanced around to see Fuzz Foskins grinning up from his place in the crowd, wearing his usual outfit of tank top and soiled jeans. Bushy hair sprouted from his head in an enormously unnatural natural, a bushy beard tangled with the matted hair on his chest. His armpits were bushy too, and from them welled a fetid scent which mingled with the reeking odor emanating from his open mouth.

Probably high on angel dust again, the sheriff figured. If Fuzz's father wasn't the county judge, he'd have been busted long ago.

Sheriff Higgs recognized the girl clinging to Fuzz's arm—Mamie Keefer, a sallow-faced little snip with stringy cornsilk hair. Worked in the mill off and on when she wasn't riding shotgun on Fuzz's motorcycle.

"Whaddya mean, weird?" she said. "Look at that built!"

"I am looking," Fuzz told her. And he sniggered at the half-naked girl on the poster. "Some built, man! This I gotta see."

Several of the older people standing nearby started to frown disapprovingly—mostly the wives, of course. Sheriff Higgs took note of it and so did Mr. Fall up on the platform. He moved along to a row of banners hanging before the entrance of the tent and gestured again with his cane.

"If you folks will kindly move in a little closer, I'd like to give you a glimpse of our more cultural attractions," he announced.

"That must be the belly dancers," Clay Tolliver murmured. "Now we're getting somewhere!"

Mr. Fall's eyes narrowed slightly, just enough to indicate that he'd heard the remark, but his smile never wavered. "All that is strange or unusual in the world derives from two sources," he continued. "The curiosities of nature originate in mystery, while the idiosyncracies of mankind are found in history."

“What’s he saying?” sniffed Mrs. Tudd.

Lawyer Tudd shrugged. “Doubletalk,” he said. “Sounds like one of those smartass civil rights troublemakers to me.”

Mr. Fall didn’t miss a thing. He nodded down at the solid citizens in the front row. “I assure you there is nothing political about this spectacle. Naturally I cannot reproduce the actual events of a bygone era. These are merely representations, a few simple samples of man’s freakish pastimes in the past.” His cane stabbed out at one of the canvas panels behind him. “May I have your attention, please? Here, from long ago and far away—King Atahualpa and the Room of Gold!”

There must have been a light behind the banner, for now its colors blazed forth so brightly that the crowd gasped.

What they saw was a regal-looking man in flowing robes, standing with arms upraised in the center of a stone chamber.

“Awful dark-complected for a king,” Mrs. Fence whispered to her husband. “Looks like some kind of a nigra to me.”

Banker Fence just nodded but did not reply. He was staring at the gold heaped around the figure—the glittering glut of jewelry, ornaments, plate, goblets, coins and virgin ingots crammed into the chamber from wall to wall and rising halfway to the ceiling.

“I’m sure you all remember Francisco Pizarro, the conqueror of Peru,” Mr. Fall was saying. “In 1532 he captured the Inca, Atahualpa, and imprisoned him in Cajamarca. As a ransom for their king’s release, his faithful followers promised to fill the prison chamber—measuring ten feet long and sixteen feet in width—with enough gold to reach the level of Atahualpa’s raised arms.”

“Do tell,” breathed banker Fence.

Mr. Fall nodded towards the panel. “Loyal followers came from all over the land, bringing their most precious possessions to lay at the feet of the Inca, impoverishing themselves to secure the freedom of their living god. The task took many months, but at last it was completed. Never before and never since did men behold such an array of radiant riches—this roomful of glittering gold. Still, they kept their word and the bargain was fulfilled."

"Great God in the morning," banker Fence murmured. "What happened then?"

Mr. Fall shrugged. "The inevitable," he said. "Pizarro had King Atahualpa strangled to death in the marketplace. Not too long afterwards, Pizarro himself was murdered."

"Never mind the details," said banker Fence. "What became of the gold?"

"No one knows," Mr. Fall said.

"Somewhere along the line it just disappeared."

"Poor security," banker Fence grunted to his wife. "Gold is a bad risk anyway. Now you know why I keep telling the kids to invest in comics."

"I'd still like to see that room," said Mrs. Fence. "With that jewelry and all, it sounds real educational."

But now the light was flickering up behind another banner, and again the crowd gasped at what appeared—a gigantic bulldozer cutting a swath through a mountainous pile of naked, emaciated human corpses.

"For those who prefer something more contemporary," Mr. Fall proclaimed. "Auschwitz—the Holocaust!"

Lawyer Tudd nodded. "Concentration camp," he told his wife. "Read about it in law school. Some monkey business of a trial over in Nuremberg, as I recall."

"Oh, how horrible!" his wife murmured. "Look at those poor people!"

"Now don't go getting so uptight. Like he says, it's only history."

"Well, in that case I suppose it's not so awful." Mrs. Tudd stared intently at the bodies, and her tongue flicked over her parted lips as her breathing quickened. "You know, I always wondered just how they did such things, all those tortures and such. I hear tell they used to make lampshades out of the skins, stuff like that."

"Legal points involved," said lawyer Tudd. "Might be kind of interesting at that."

He turned to seek Mayor Stooldrayer's opinion, but that dignitary and his wife were both gaping at another blazing banner directly over the entrance to the tent.

Mr. Fall was already pointing up at the familiar figure, bearded and nude except for a loincloth, hanging impaled upon a cross.

"No monstrosity spawned by nature, no man-made marvel, can possibly compare to the fantastic reality of divine inspiration," he said. "Ecce Homo—the Passion Play!"

Mrs. Stooldrayer turned and whispered to her husband. "Icky homo? Does he mean Jesus was some kind of morphodite, like? And what's all this stuff about passion?"

"It's just a play," the mayor told her. "Well, I'm not sure I want to see it," Mrs. Stooldrayer mused. "After all, I'm working with the PTA and we're supposed to be against violence, to say nothing of gays." She hesitated. "On the other hand, we don't get a chance to see a real live play around here very often."

"That's the spirit," said Mayor Stooldrayer. "Way I figure, we're entitled to a little entertainment."

Mr. Fall must have been listening, because now he tapped his cane on the platform and nodded.

"Entertainment!" he cried. "It's all waiting for you here on the inside. Step right up, ladies and gentlemen—the show is about to begin!"

Mr. Fall jumped down from the platform and parted the curtain flaps before the entrance as the crowd began to surge forward.

"What about tickets?" Sheriff Higgs called out to him.

"Law always gets a free pass," Mr. Fall murmured. Then he raised his voice. "As you folks can see, I'm a little short-handed here and there's no one operating the ticket booth. So just keep moving, go right ahead—you can pay on the inside."

"Didn't say how much," banker Fence muttered to lawyer Tudd. "Think we ought to take a chance?"

Lawyer Tudd nodded. “No problem.” He grinned. “Law says you got to establish a price in advance. We don’t have to pay him a red cent if we don’t want to.”

Chuckling, he moved into the tent, holding his wife’s arm tightly to keep from being separated from her in the jostling throng. Behind him came the banker and the mayor with their spouses, Mr. and Mrs. Crouch, Junior Dorkin, Mamie Keefer, and all the rest.

The assorted effluvia of Fuzz Foskins and Clay Tolliver mingled in the darkness of the tent’s interior as the rest of the crowd pushed on inside until the tent was packed solid, wall to wall.

For a moment everyone stood silent, and then little indications of irritation began to arise.

“Hey, what gives?” somebody grumbled. “I can’t see.”

“Lights!” yelled Clay Tolliver.

Sheriff Higgs was always prepared for such emergencies and he responded now, pulling forth a flashlight from his pocket.

The beam played over the sea of faces scowling across the confines of the tent, then came to rest on the rear wall.

The wall was blank. Below it stood the sole object of furnishing—a bare platform.

The crowd stared and its murmurs rose to a roar.

“Hell!” someone shouted angrily. “What kind of a show you call this? They ain’t no freaks in here!”

“There are now,” murmured Mr. Fall, as he finished sewing the entrance flaps together from outside and poured the kerosene.

Then, smiling, he lit the match.

The Rubber Room

Emery kept telling them he wasn't crazy, but they put him in the rubber room anyway.

Sorry, fella, they said. Only temporary, we got a space problem here, overcrowded, move you to another cell in a couple hours, they said. It's better than being in the tank with all them drunks, they said. Okay, so you had your call to the lawyer but just take it easy until he gets here, they said.

And the door went clang.

So there he was, stuck way down at the end of the cell-block in this little room all by himself. They'd taken his watch and his wallet, his keys and his belt, even his shoelaces, so there was no way he could harm himself unless he bit his own wrists. But that would be crazy, and Emery wasn't crazy.

Now all he could do was wait. There wasn't anything else, no choice, no options, no way, once you were here in the rubber room.

To begin with, it was small—six paces long and six paces wide. A reasonably active man could cover the distance between the walls in one jump but he'd need a running start. Not that there was any point in trying, because he'd just bounce harmlessly off the thick padding.

The windowless walls were padded everywhere from floor to ceiling and so was the door. The padding was seamless so it couldn't be torn or pried away. Even the floor was padded, except for a ten-inch square at the left far corner which was supposed to serve as a toilet facility.

Above him a tiny light bulb burned dimly behind its meshed enclosure, safely beyond reach from the floor below. The ceiling around it was padded too, probably to deaden sound.

Restraint room, that’s what they said it was, but it used to be called a padded cell. Rubber room was just popular slang. And maybe the slang wouldn’t be so popular if more people were exposed to the reality.

Before he knew what he was doing, Emery found himself pacing back and forth. Six paces forward, six paces back, over and over again, like an animal in a cage.

That’s what this was, actually—not a room, just a cage. And if you stayed in a cage long enough you turned into an animal. Ripping and clawing and smashing your head against the walls, howling for release.

If you weren’t crazy when you came in you’d go crazy before you got out. The trick, of course, was not to stay here too long.

But how long was too long? How long would it be before the lawyer arrived?

Six paces forward, six paces back. Grey spongy padding muffled his footsteps on the floor and absorbed the light from above, leaving the walls in shadow. Shadows could drive you crazy too. So could the silence, and being alone. Alone in shadows and silence, like he’d been when they found him there in the room—the other room, the one in the house.

It was like a bad dream. Maybe that’s the way it feels when you’re crazy, and if so he must have been crazy when it happened.

But Emery wasn’t crazy now. He was perfectly sane, completely under control. And there was nothing here that could harm him. Silence can’t harm you. What was the old saying? Violence is golden. No, not violence. Where had that come from? Freudian slip. To hell with Freud, what did he know? Nobody knew. And if he kept silent nobody ever would. Even though they’d found him they couldn’t prove anything. Not if he kept silent, let his lawyer do the talking. Silence was his friend. And the shadows were his friends too. Shadows hid everything. There had been shadows in the other room and no one could have seen clearly when they found him. You just thought you saw it, he’d tell them.

No, he’d forgotten—he mustn’t tell them, just let the lawyer talk. What was the matter with him, was he going crazy here after all?

Six paces forward, six paces back. Keep walking, keep silent. Keep away from those shadows in the corners. They were getting darker now. Darker and thicker. Something seemed to be moving there in the far corner to the right.

Emery felt the muscles tightening in his throat and he couldn't control them; he knew that in a moment he was going to scream.

Then the door opened behind him and in the light from the corridor the shadow disappeared.

It was a good thing he hadn't screamed. They would have been sure he was crazy then, and that would spoil everything.

But now that the shadow was gone Emery relaxed. By the time they took him down the hall and into the visitor's room he was quite calm again.

His lawyer waited for him there, sitting on the other side of the grille barrier, and nobody was listening.

That's what the lawyer said. Nobody's listening, you can tell me all about it.

Emery shook his head and smiled because he knew better. Violence is golden and even the walls have ears. He wanted to warn his lawyer that they were spying on him but that would sound crazy. The sane thing to do was not to mention it, just be careful and say the right things instead.

He told the lawyer what everybody knew about himself. He was a decent man, he had a steady job, paid his bills, didn't smoke or drink or get out of line. Hardworking, dependable, neat, clean, no police record, not a troublemaker. Mother was always proud of her boy and she'd be proud of him today if she were still alive. He'd always looked after her and when she died he still looked after the house, kept it up, kept himself up, just the way she'd taught him to. So what was all this fuss about?

Suppose you tell me, the lawyer said.

That was the hard part, making him understand, but Emery knew everything depended on it. So he talked very slowly, choosing his words carefully, sticking to the facts.

World War II had happened before he'd been born, but that was a fact.

Emery knew a lot of facts about World War II because he used to read library books when Mother was alive. Improve your mind, she said. Reading is better than watching all that violence on the television, she said.

So at night when he couldn't sleep he read for hours sitting up in his room. People he worked with down at the shop called him a bookworm but he didn't care. There was no such thing as a bookworm, he knew that. There were worms that ate microorganisms in the soil and birds that ate worms and animals that ate birds and people who ate animals and microorganisms that ate people—like the ones that ate Mother until they killed her.

Everything—germs, plants, animals, people—kills other things to stay alive. This is a fact, a cruel fact. He could still remember the way Mother screamed.

After she died he read more. That's when he really got into history. The Greeks killed the Persians and the Romans killed the Greeks and the barbarians killed the Romans and the Christians killed the barbarians and the Moslems killed the Christians and the Hindus killed the Moslems. Blacks killed whites, whites killed Indians, Indians killed other Indians, orientals killed other orientals, Protestants killed Catholics, Catholics killed Jews, Jews killed Our Saviour on the Cross.

Love one another, Jesus said, and they killed him for it. If Our Saviour had lived, the gospel would have spread around the world and there'd be no violence. But the Jews killed Our Lord.

That's what Emery told the lawyer, but it didn't go down. Get to the point, the lawyer said.

Emery was used to that kind of reaction. He'd heard it before when he tried to explain things to girls he met after Mother died. Mother hadn't approved of him going with girls and he used to resent it. After she was gone the fellows at work told him it would do him good. Get out of your shell, they said. So he let them set up some double-dates and that's when he found out that Mother was right. The girls just laughed at him when he talked facts.

It was better to stay in his shell, like a snail. Snails knew how to protect themselves in a world where everyone kills to live, and the Jews killed Our Saviour.

Facts, the lawyer said. Give me some facts.

So Emery told him about World War II. That's when the real killing began. Jewish international bankers financed the Napoleonic wars and World War I, but these were nothing compared to World War II. Hitler knew what the Jews were planning and he tried to prevent it—that's why he invaded those other countries, to get rid of the Jews, just as he did in Germany. They were plotting a war to destroy the world, so they could take over. But no one understood and in the end the Jew-financed armies won the war. The Jews killed Hitler just like they killed Our Saviour. History repeats itself, and that's a fact too.

Emery explained all this very quietly, using nothing except facts, but from the way his lawyer looked at him he could see it was no use.

So Emery went back into his shell. But this time he took his lawyer with him.

He told him what it was like, living alone in his house, which was really a big shell that protected him. Too big at first, and too empty, until Emery began to fill it up with books. Books about World War II, because of the facts. Only the more he read the more he realized that most of them didn't contain facts. The victors wrote the histories and now that the Jews had won they wrote lies. They lied about Hitler, they lied about the Nazi Party and its ideals.

Emery was one of the few people who could read between the lies and see the truth. Reminders of the truth could be found outside of books, so now he turned to them and started to collect them. The trappings and the banners, the iron helmets and the iron medals. Iron crosses were reminders too—the Jews had destroyed Our Saviour on a cross and now they were trying to destroy the crosses themselves.

That's when he began to realize what was happening, when he went to the antique shops where such things were sold.

There would be other people in these shops and they stared at him. Nobody said a word but they were watching. Sometimes he thought he could hear them whispering behind his back and he knew for a fact that they were taking notes.

It wasn't just his imagination because pretty soon some of the people down at work started asking him questions about his collection—the pictures of the party leaders and the swastika emblems and badges and the photographs of the little girls presenting flowers to the Fuhrer at rallies and parades. Hard to believe these little girls were now fifty-year-old women. Sometimes he thought if he met one of those women he could settle down with her and be happy; at least she'd understand because she knew the facts. Once he almost decided to run an ad in the classified section, trying to locate such a woman, but then he realized it might be dangerous. Suppose the Jews were out to get her? They'd get him too. That was a fact.

Emery's lawyer shook his head. His face, behind the grille, was taking on an expression which Emery didn't like. It was the expression people wear when they're at the zoo, peering through the bars or the wire screens at the animals.

That's when Emery decided he'd have to tell his lawyer the rest. It was a risk, but if he wanted to be believed his lawyer must know all the facts.

So he told him about the conspiracy.

All these hijackings and kidnappings going on today were part of it. And these terrorists running around with ski-masks over their faces were part of the plan too.

In today's world, terror wears a ski-mask.

Sometimes they called themselves Arabs, but that was just to confuse people. They were the ones behind the bombings in Northern Ireland and the assassinations in South America. The international Jewish conspiracy was in back of it all and behind every ski-mask was a Jewish face.

They spread throughout the world, stirring up fear and confusion. And they were here too, plotting and scheming and spying on their enemies. Mother knew.

When he was just a little boy and did something naughty Mother used to tell him to behave. Behave yourself or the Jew-man will get you, Mother said. He used to think she was just trying to frighten him but now he realized Mother was telling the truth. Like the time she caught him playing with himself and locked him in the closet. The Jew-man will get you, she said. And he was all alone in the dark and he could see the Jew-man coming through the walls and he screamed and she let him out just in time. Otherwise the Jew-man would have taken him. He knew now that this was the way they got their recruits—they took other peoples' children and brainwashed them, brought them up to be political terrorists in countries all over the world—Italy, Ireland, Indonesia, the Middle East—so that no one would suspect the real facts. The real facts, that the Jews were responsible, getting ready for another war. And when the other nations had destroyed themselves, Israel would take over the world.

Emery was talking louder now but he didn't realize it until the lawyer told him to hold it down. What makes you think these terrorists are after you, he asked. Did you ever see one?

No, Emery told him, they're too clever for that. But they have their spies, their agents are everywhere.

The lawyer's face was getting red and Emery noticed it. He told him why it was getting so hot here in the visitor's room—their agents were at work again.

Those people who saw Emery buying the flags and swastikas and iron crosses had been planted in the stores to spy on him. And the ones down at work who teased him about his collection, they were spies too, and they knew he'd found out the truth.

The terrorists had been after him for months now, planning to kill him. They tried to run him down with their cars when he crossed the street but he got away. Two weeks ago when he turned on the television there was an explosion. It seemed like a short-circuit but he knew better; they wanted to electrocute him only it didn't work. He was too smart to call a repairman because that's what they wanted—they'd send one of their assassins instead. The only people who still make house-calls today are the murderers.

So for two weeks he'd managed without electricity. That's when they must have put the machines in the walls. The terrorists had machines to make things heat up and at night he could hear a humming sound in the dark. He'd searched around, tapping the walls, and he couldn't find anything, but he knew the machines were there. Sometimes it got so hot he was soaked with sweat, but he didn't try to turn down the furnace. He'd show them he could take it. And he wasn't about to go out of the house because he knew that's what they wanted. That was their plan, to force him out so they could get at him and kill him.

Emery was too smart for that. He had enough canned goods and stuff to get by and it was safer to stay put. When the phone rang he didn't answer; probably someone at the shop was calling to ask him why he didn't come to work. That's all he needed—come back to work so they could murder him on the way.

It was better to hole up right there in his bedroom with the iron crosses and the swastikas on the walls. The swastika is a very ancient symbol, a sacred symbol, and it protected him. So did the big picture of the Fuhrer. Just knowing it was there was protection enough, even in the dark. Emery couldn't sleep any more because of the sounds in the walls—at first it had been humming, but gradually he could make out voices. He didn't understand Hebrew, and it was only gradually that he knew what they were saying. Come on out, you dirty Aryan, come out and be killed.

Every night they came, like vampires, wearing ski-masks to hide their faces. They came and they whispered, come out, come out, wherever you are. But he didn't come out.

Some history books said Hitler was crazy, and maybe that part was true. If so, Emery knew why. It was because he must have heard the voices too and known they were after him. No wonder he kept talking about the answer to the Jewish question. They were polluting the human race and he had to stop them. But they burned him in a bunker instead. They killed Our Saviour. Can't you understand that?

The lawyer said he couldn't understand and maybe Emery should talk to a doctor instead. But Emery didn't want to talk to a doctor. Those Jew doctors were part of the conspiracy. What he had to say now was in the strictest confidence.

Then for Christ's sake tell me, the lawyer said.

And Emery said yes, he'd tell him. For Christ's sake, for the sake of Our Lord.

Two days ago he'd run out of canned goods. He was hungry, very hungry, and if he didn't eat he'd die. The terrorists wanted to starve him to death but he was too smart for that.

So he decided to go to the store.

He peeked through all the windows first but he couldn't see anyone in a ski-mask. That didn't mean it was safe, of course, because they used ordinary people too. The only thing he could do was take a chance. And before he left he put one of the iron crosses around his neck on a chain. That would help protect him.

Then, at twilight, he went to the supermarket down the street. No sense trying to drive, because the terrorists might have planted a bomb in his car, so he walked all the way.

It felt strange being outside again and though Emery saw nothing suspicious he was shaking all over by the time he got to the store.

The supermarket had those big fluorescent lights and there were no shadows. He didn't see any of their spies or agents around either, but of course they'd be too clever to show themselves. Emery just hoped he could get back home before they made their move.

The customers in the store looked like ordinary people; the thing is, you can never be sure nowadays. Emery picked out his canned goods as fast as possible and he was glad to get through the line at the checkout counter without any trouble. The clerk gave him a funny look but maybe it was just because he hadn’t shaved or changed clothes for so long. Anyway he managed, even though his head was starting to hurt.

It was dark when he came out of the store with his bag of groceries, and there was nobody on the street. That’s another thing the Jew terrorists have done—made us afraid to walk on the street alone. See what it’s come to? Everyone’s scared being out at night!

That’s what the little girl told him.

She was standing there on the corner of the block when he saw her—cute little thing, maybe five years old, with big brown eyes and curly hair. And she was crying, scared to death.

I’m lost, she said. I’m lost, I want my Mommy.

Emery could understand that. Everybody’s lost nowadays, wants someone to protect them. Only there’s no protection any more, not with those terrorists around waiting for their chance, lurking in the shadows.

And there were shadows on the street, shadows outside his house. He wanted to help but he couldn’t risk standing out here talking.

So he just went on, up the porch steps, and it wasn’t until he opened the front door that he realized she had followed him. Little girl crying, saying please Mister, take me to my Mommy.

He wanted to go in and shut the door but he knew he had to do something.

How did you get lost, he asked.

She said she was waiting in the car outside the market while Mommy shopped but when Mommy didn’t come back she got out to look for her in the store and she was gone. Then she thought she saw her down the street and she ran after her only it turned out to be another lady. Now she didn’t know where she was and would he please take her home?

Emery knew he couldn’t do that, but she was crying again, crying loud. If they were anywhere around they’d hear her, so he told her to come in.

The house smelled funny from not being aired out and it was very hot inside. Dark too with all the electricity turned off on account of the terrorists. He tried to explain but she only cried louder because the dark frightened her.

Don’t be scared, Emery said. Tell me your Mommy’s name and I’ll phone her to come and get you.

So she told him the name—Mrs. Rubelsky, Sylvia Rubelsky—but she didn’t know the address.

It was hard to hear because of the humming in the walls. He got hold of the flashlight he kept in the kitchen for emergencies and then he went into the hall to look up the name in the phone book.

There weren’t any Rubelskys listed. He tried other spellings—Rubelski, Roubelsky, Rebelsky, Rabelsky—but there was nothing in the book. Are you sure, he asked.

Then she said they didn’t have a phone.

That was funny; everybody has a phone. She said it didn’t matter because if he just took her over to Sixth Street she could point out the house to him.

Emery wasn’t about to go anywhere, let alone Sixth Street. That was a Jewish neighborhood. Come to think of it, Rubelsky was a Jewish name.

Are you Jewish, he asked her.

She stopped crying and stared at him and those big brown eyes got wider and wider. The way she stared made his head hurt more.

What are you looking at, he said.

That thing around your neck, she told him. That iron cross. It’s like Nazis wear.

What do you know about Nazis, he asked.

They killed my Grandpa, she said. They killed him at Belsen. Mommy told me. Nazis are bad.

All at once it came to Emery in a flash, a flash that made his whole head throb.

She was one of them. They’d planted her on the street, knowing he’d let her into the house here. What did they want?

Why do you wear bad things, she said. Take it off.

Now she was reaching out towards the chain around his neck, the chain with the iron cross.

It was like that old movie he saw once long ago, the movie about the Golem. This big stone monster got loose in the Jewish ghetto, wearing the Star of David on its chest. A little girl pulled the star off and the Golem fell down dead.

That's why they sent her here, to pull off the iron cross and kill him.

No way, he said. And he slapped her, not hard, but she started to scream and he couldn't have that, so he put his hands around her neck just to stop the screaming and there was a kind of cracking sound and then . . .

What happened then, the lawyer asked.

I don't want to talk about it, Emery said.

But he couldn't stop, he was talking about it. At first, when he didn't find a pulse, he thought he'd killed her. But he hadn't squeezed that hard, so it must have happened when she touched the iron cross. That meant he'd guessed right, she was one of them.

But he couldn't tell anyone, he knew people would never believe that the terrorists had sent a little Jew-girl here to murder him. And he couldn't let her be found like this. What to do, that was the question. The Jewish question.

Then he remembered. Hitler had the answer. He knew what to do.

It was hot here and even hotter downstairs. That's where he carried her, downstairs, where the furnace was going. The gas furnace.

Oh my God, said the lawyer. Oh my God.

And then the lawyer stood up fast and went over to the door on the other side of the grille and called the guard.

Come back here, Emery said.

But he didn't listen, he kept whispering to the guard, and then other guards came up behind Emery on his side of the grille and grabbed his arms.

He yelled at them to let him go, not to listen to that Jew lawyer, didn't they understand he must be one of them?

Instead of paying attention they just marched him back down the hall to the rubber room and shoved him inside.

You promised you'd put me in another cell, Emery said. I don't want to stay here. I'm not crazy.

One of the guards said easy doe? it, the doctor is coming to give you something so you can sleep.

And the door went clang.

Emery was back in the rubber room, but this time he didn't pace and he didn't call out. It wouldn't do any good. Now he knew how Our Saviour had felt, betrayed and waiting for the crucifixion.

Emery had been betrayed too, betrayed by the Jew lawyer, and now all he could do was wait for the Jew doctor to come. Put him to sleep, the guard had said. That was how the conspiracy worked—they'd put him to sleep forever. Only he wouldn't let them, he'd stay awake, demand a fair trial.

But that was impossible. The police would tell about hearing the little girl scream and breaking into the house and finding him. They'd say he was a child-molester and a murderer. And the judge would sentence him to death. He'd believe the Jews just like Pontius Pilate did, just like the Allies did when they killed Our Führer.

Emery wasn't dead yet but there was no way out. No way out of the trial, no way out of the rubber room.

Or was there?

The answer came to him just like that.

He'd plead insanity.

Emery knew he wasn't crazy but he could fool them into believing it. That was no disgrace—some people thought Jesus and the Führer were crazy too. All he had to do was pretend.

Yes, that was the answer. And just thinking about it made him feel better. Even if they shut him up in a rubber room like this he'd still be alive. He could walk and talk and eat and sleep and think. Think about how he'd tricked them, all those Jew terrorists who were out to get him.

Emery didn't have to be careful now. He didn't have to lie, the way he'd lied to the lawyer. He could admit the real truth.

Killing that little Jew-girl wasn't an accident, he knew what he was going to do the minute he got his hands around her throat. He squeezed just as hard as he could because that's what he'd always really wanted. To squeeze the necks of those girls who laughed at him, squeeze the guys at work who wouldn't listen when he told them about his collection and yes, say it, he wanted to squeeze Mother too because she'd always squeezed him, smothered him, strangled away his life. But most of all he squeezed the Jews, the dirty kike terrorists who were out to destroy him, destroy the world.

And that's what he had done. He hadn't cracked the little girl's neck, she wasn't dead when he carried her downstairs and opened the furnace door.

What he had really done was solve the Jewish question.

He'd solved it and they couldn't touch him. He was safe now, safe from all the terrorists and evil spirits out for revenge, safe forever here in the rubber room.

The only thing he didn't like was the shadows. He remembered how they'd been before, how the one in the far corner seemed to get darker and thicker.

And now it was happening again.

Don't look at it, he told himself. You're imagining things. Only crazy people see shadows moving. Moving and coiling like a cloud, a cloud of smoke from a gas furnace.

But he had to look because it was changing now, taking on a shape. Emery could see it standing in the corner, the figure of a man. A man in a black suit, with a black face.

And it was moving forward.

Emery backed away as the figure glided towards him softly and silently across the padded floor, and he opened his mouth to scream.

But the scream wouldn’t come, nothing was coming except the figure looming up before Emery as he pressed against the wall of the rubber room. He could see the black face quite clearly now—only it wasn’t a face.

It was a ski-mask.

The figure’s arms rose and the hands splayed out and he saw little black droplets oozing from the smoky wrists as the fingers curled around his throat. Emery struck out at the ski-mask, thrusting his fingers through the eye-holes, stabbing at the eyes behind them. But there was nothing under the mask, nothing at all.

It was then that Emery really went mad.

When they opened the door of the rubber room the shadow was gone. All they found was Emery and he was dead.

Apoplexy, they said. Heart failure. Better write up a medical report fast and close the case. Close the rubber room too while they were at it.

Just a coincidence of course, but people might get funny ideas if they found out. Two deaths in the same cell—Emery, and that other nut last week who bit open his own wrists, the crazy terrorist guy in the ski-mask.

The Night Before Christmas

I don’t know how it ends. Maybe it ended when I heard the shot from behind the closed door to the living room—or when I ran out and found him lying there.

Perhaps the ending came after the police arrived; after the interrogation and explanation and all that lurid publicity in the media.

Possibly the real end was my own breakdown and eventual recovery—if indeed I ever fully recovered.

It could be, of course, that something like this never truly ends as long as memory remains. And I remember it all, from the very beginning.

Everything started on an autumn afternoon with Dirk Otjens, at his gallery on La Cienega. We met at the door just as he returned from lunch. Otjens was late; very probably he’d been with one of his wealthy customers and such people seem to favor late luncheons.

“Brandon!” he said. “Where’ve you been? I tried to get hold of you all morning.”

“Sorry—an appointment—”

Dirk shook his head impatiently. “You ought to get yourself an answering service.”

No sense telling him I couldn’t afford one, or that my appointment had been with the unemployment office. Dirk may have known poverty himself at one time, but that was many expensive luncheons ago, and now he moved in a different milieu. The notion of a starving artist turned him off, and letting him picture me in that role was—like hiring an answering service—something I could not now afford. It had been a break for me to be taken on as one of his clients, even though nothing had happened so far.

Or had it?

"You've made a sale?" I tried to sound casual, but my heart was pounding.

"No. But I think I've got you a commission. Ever hear of Carlos Santiago?"

"Can't say that I have."

"Customer of mine. In here all the time. He saw that oil you did—you know, the one hanging in the upstairs gallery—and he wants a portrait."

"What's he like?"

Dirk shrugged. "Foreigner. Heavy accent." He spoke with all of the disdain of a naturalized American citizen. "Some kind of shipping magnate, I gather. But the money's there."

"How much?"

"I quoted him twenty-five hundred. Not top dollar, but it's a start."

Indeed it was. Even allowing for his cut, I'd still clear enough to keep me going. The roadblock had been broken, and somewhere up ahead was the enchanted realm where everybody has an answering service to take messages while they're out enjoying expensive lunches of their own. Still—

"I don't know," I said. "Maybe he's not a good subject for me. A Spanish shipping tycoon doesn't sound like my line of work. You know I'm not one of those artsy-craftsy temperamental types, but there has to be a certain chemistry between artist and sitter or it just doesn't come off."

From Dirk's scowl I could see that what I was saying didn't come off, either, but it had to be stated. I am, after all, an artist. I spent nine years learning my craft here and abroad—nine long hard years of self-sacrifice and self-discovery that I didn't intend to toss away the first time somebody waved a dollar bill in my direction. If that's all I cared about, I might as well go into mass-production, turning out thirty-five dollar clowns by the gross to sell in open-air shows on supermarket lots. On the other hand—

"I'd have to see him first," I said.

“And so you shall.” Dirk nodded. “You’ve got a three-o’clock appointment at his place.”

“Office?”

“No, the house. Up in Trousdale. Here, I wrote down the address for you. Now get going, and good luck.”

I remember driving along Coldwater, then making a right turn onto one of those streets leading into the Trousdale Estates. I remember it very well, because the road ahead climbed steeply along the hillside and I kept wondering if the car would make the grade. The old heap had an inferiority complex and I could imagine how it felt, wheezing its way past the semicircular driveways clogged with shiny new Cadillacs, Lancias, Alfa-Romeos, and the inevitable Rolls. This was a neighborhood in which the Mercedes was the household’s second car. I didn’t much care for it myself, but Dirk was right; the money was here.

And so was Carlos Santiago.

The car in his driveway was a Ferrari. I parked behind it, hoping no one was watching from the picture window of the sprawling two-story pseudo-palazzo towering above the cypress-lined drive. The house was new and the trees were still small, but who was I to pass judgment? The money was here.

I rang the bell. Chimes susurrated softly from behind the heavy door; it opened, and a dark-haired, uniformed maid confronted me. “Yes, please?”

“Arnold Brandon. I have an appointment with Mr. Santiago.” She nodded. “This way. The Señor waits for you.”

I moved from warm afternoon sunlight into the air-conditioned chill of the shadowy hall, following the maid to the arched doorway of the living room at our left.

The room, with its high ceiling and recessed fireplace, was larger than I’d expected. And so was my host.

Carlos Santiago called himself a Spaniard; I later learned he'd been born in Argentina and undoubtedly there was Indio blood in his veins. But he reminded me of a native of Crete.

The Minotaur.

Not literally, of course. Here was no hybrid, no man's body topped by the head of a bull. The greying curly hair fell over a forehead unadorned by horns, but the heavily lidded eyes, flaring nostrils, and neckless merging of huge head and barrel chest somehow suggested a mingling of the taurine and the human. As an artist, I saw in Santiago the image of the man-bull, the bull-man, the incarnation of macho.

And I hated him at first sight.

The truth is, I've always feared such men; the big, burly, arrogant men who swagger and bluster and brawl their way through life. I do not trust their kind, for they have always been the enemies of art, the book-burners, smashers of statues, contemptuous of all creation which does not spurt from their own loins. I fear them even more when they don the mask of cordiality for their own purposes.

And Carlos Santiago was cordial.

He seated me in a huge leather chair, poured drinks, inquired after my welfare, complimented the sample of my work he'd seen at the gallery. But the fear remained, and so did the image of the Minotaur. Welcome to my labyrinth.

I must admit the labyrinth was elaborately and expensively designed and tastefully furnished. All of which only emphasized the discordant note in the décor—the display above the fireplace mantel. The rusty, broad-bladed weapon affixed to the wall and flanked by grainy, poorly framed photographs seemed as out of place in this room as the hulking presence of my host.

He noted my stare, and his chuckle was a bovine rumble.

“I know what you are thinking, amigo. The oh-so-proper interior decorator was shocked when I insisted on placing those objects in such a setting. But I am a man of sentiment, and I am not ashamed.

“The machete—once it was all I possessed, except for the rags on my back. With it I sweated in the fields for three long years as a common laborer. At the end I still wore the same rags and it was still my only possession. But with the money I had saved I made my first investment—a few tiny shares in a condemned oil tanker, making its last voyage. The success of its final venture proved the beginning of my own. I spare you details; the story is in those photographs. These are the ships I came to acquire over the years, the Santiago fleet. Many of them are old and rusty now, like the machete—like myself, for that matter. But we belong together.”

Santiago poured another drink. “But I bore you, Mr. Brandon. Let us speak now of the portrait.”

I knew what was coming. He would tell me what and how to paint, and insist that I include his ships in the background; perhaps he intended to be shown holding the machete in his hand.

He was entitled to his pride, but I had mine. God knows I needed the money, but I wasn’t going to paint the Minotaur in any setting. No sense avoiding the issue; I’d have to take the bull by the horns—

“Louise!”

Santiago turned and rose, smiling as she entered. I stared at the girl—tall, slim, tawny-haired, with flawless features dominated by hazel eyes. The room was radiant with her presence.

“Allow me to present my wife.”

Both of us must have spoken, acknowledging the introduction, but I can’t recall what we said. All I remember is that my mouth was dry, my words meaningless. It was Santiago’s words that were important.

“You will paint her portrait,” he said.

That was the beginning.

Sittings were arranged for in the den just beyond the living room; north light made afternoon sessions ideal. Three times a week I came—first to sketch, then to fill in the background. Reversing the usual procedure, I reserved work on the actual portraiture until all of the other elements were resolved and completed. I wanted her flesh tones to subtly reflect the coloration of setting and costume. Only then would I concentrate on pose and expression, capturing the essence. But how to capture the sound of the soft voice, the elusive scent of perfume, the unconscious grace of movement, the totality of her sensual impact?

I must concede that Santiago, to his credit, proved cooperative. He never intruded upon the sittings, nor inquired as to their progress. I'd stipulated that neither he nor my subject inspect the work before completion; the canvas was covered during my absence. He did not disturb me with questions, and after the second week he flew off to the Middle East on business, loading tankers for a voyage.

While he poured oil across troubled waters, Louise and I were alone.

We were, of course, on a first-name basis now. And during our sessions we talked. She talked, rather; I concentrated on my work. But in order to raise portraiture beyond mere representationalism the artist must come to know his subject, and so I encouraged such conversation in order to listen and learn.

Inevitably, under such circumstances, a certain confidential relationship evolves. The exchange, if tape-recorded, might very well be mistaken for words spoken in psychiatric therapy or uttered within the confines of the confessional booth.

But what Louise said was not recorded. And while I was an artist, exulting in the realization that I was working to the fullest extent of my powers, I was neither psychiatrist nor priest. I listened, but did not judge.

What I heard was ordinary enough. She was not María Cayetano, Duchess of Alba, any more than I was Francisco José de Goya y Lucientes.

I'd already guessed something of her background, and my surmise proved correct. Hers was the usual story of the unusually attractive girl from a poor family. Cinderella at the high-school prom, graduating at the stroke of midnight to find herself right back in the kitchen. Then the frantic effort to escape—runner-up in a beauty contest, failed fashion model, actress ambitions discouraged by the cattle-calls where she found herself to be merely one of a dozen duplicates. Of course there were many who volunteered their help as agents, business managers, or outright pimps; all of them expected servicing for their services. To her credit, Louise was too street-smart to comply. She still had hopes of finding her Prince. Instead, she met the Minotaur.

One night she was escorted to an affair where she could meet "important people." One of them proved to be Carlos Santiago, and before the evening ended he'd made his intentions clear.

Louise had the sense to reject the obvious, and when he attempted to force the issue she raked his face with her nails. Apparently the impression she made was more than merely physical, and next day the flowers began to arrive. Once he progressed to earrings and bracelets, the ring was not far behind.

So Cinderella married the Minotaur, only to find life in the labyrinth not to her liking. The bull, it seemed, did a great deal of bellowing, but in truth he was merely a steer.

All this, and a great deal more, gradually came out during our sessions together. And led, of course, to the expected conclusion. I put horns on the bull.

Justification? These things aren't a question of morality. In any case, Louise had no scruples. She'd sold herself to the highest bidder and it proved a bad bargain; I neither condemned nor condoned her. Cinderella had wanted out of the kitchen and took the obvious steps to escape. She lacked the intellectual equipment to find another route, and in our society—despite the earnest disclaimers of Women's Lib—Beauty usually ends up with the Beast. Sometimes it's a young Beast with nothing to offer but a state of perpetual rut; more often it’s an aging Beast who provides status and security in return for occasional coupling. But even that had been denied Louise; her Beast was an old bull whose pawings and snortings she could no longer endure. Meeting me had intensified natural need; it was lust at first sight.

As for me, I soon realized that behind the flawless façade of face and form there was only a vain and greedy child. She’d created Cinderella out of costume and coiffure and cosmetics; I’d perpetuated the pretense in pigment. It was not Cinderella who writhed and panted in my arms. But knowing this, knowing the truth, didn’t help me. I loved the scullery-maid.

Time was short, and we didn’t waste it in idle declarations or decisions about the future. Afternoons prolonged into evenings and we welcomed each night, celebrating its concealing presence.

Harsh daylight followed quickly enough. It was on December eighteenth, just a week before Christmas, that Carlos Santiago returned. And on the following afternoon Louise and I met for a final sitting in the sunlit den.

She watched very quietly as I applied last-minute touches to the portrait—a few highlights in the burnished halo of hair, a softening of feral fire in the emerald-flecked hazel eyes.

“Almost done?” she murmured.

“Almost.”

“Then it’s over.” Her pose remained rigid but her voice trembled.

I glanced quickly toward the doorway, my voice softening to a guarded whisper.

“Does he know?”

“Of course not.”

“The maid—”

“You always left after a sitting. She never suspected that you came back after she was gone for the night.”

“Then we’re safe.”

“Is that all you have to say?” Her voice began to rise and I gestured quickly.

"Please—lower your head just a trifle—there, that's it—"

I put down my brush and stepped back. Louise glanced up at me. "Can I look now?"

"Yes."

She rose, moved to stand beside me. For a long moment she stared without speaking, her eyes troubled.

"What's the matter?" I said. "Don't you like it?"

"Oh yes—it's wonderful—"

"Then why so sad?"

"Because it's finished."

"All things come to an end," I said.

"Must they?" she murmured. "Must they?"

"Mr. Brandon is right."

Carlos Santiago stood in the doorway, nodding. "It has been finished for some time now," he said.

I blinked. "How do you know?"

"It is the business of every man to know what goes on in his own house."

"You mean you looked at the portrait?" Louise frowned. "But you gave Mr. Brandon your word—"

"My apologies." Santiago smiled at me. "I could not rest until I satisfied myself as to just what you were doing."

I forced myself to return his smile. "You are satisfied now?"

"Quite." He glanced at the portrait. "A magnificent achievement. You seem to have captured my wife in her happiest mood. I wish it were within my power to bring such a smile to her face."

Was there mockery in his voice, or just the echo of my own guilt?

"The portrait can't be touched for several weeks now," I said. "The paint must dry. Then I'll varnish it and we can select the proper frame."

"Of course," said Santiago. "But first things first." He produced a check from his pocket and handed it to me. "Here you are. Paid in full."

"That's very thoughtful of you—"

"You will find me a thoughtful man." He turned as the maid entered, carrying a tray which held a brandy decanter and globular glasses.

She set it down and withdrew. Santiago poured three drinks. "As you see, I anticipated this moment." He extended glasses to Louise and myself, then raised his own. "A toast to you, Mr. Brandon. I appreciate your great talent, and your even greater wisdom."

"Wisdom?" Louise gave him a puzzled glance.

"Exactly." He nodded. "I have no schooling in art, but I do know that a project such as this can be dangerous."

"I don't understand."

"There is always the temptation to go on, to overdo. But Mr. Brandon knows when to stop. He has demonstrated, shall we say, the artistic conscience. Let us drink to his decision."

Santiago sipped his brandy. Louise took a token swallow and I followed suit. Again I wondered how much he knew.

"You do not know just what this moment means to me," he said. "To stand here in this house, with this portrait of the one I love—it is the dream of a poor boy come true."

"But you weren't always poor," Louise said. "You told me yourself that your father was a wealthy man."

"So he was." Santiago paused to drink again. "I passed my childhood in luxury; I lacked for nothing until my father died. But then my older brother inherited the estancia and I left home to make my own way in the world. Perhaps it is just as well, for there is much in the past which does not bear looking into. But I have heard stories." He smiled at me. "There is one in particular which may interest you," he said.

"Several years after I left, my brother's wife died in childbirth. Naturally he married again, but no one anticipated his choice. A nobody, a girl without breeding or background, but one imagines her youth and beauty enticed him."

Did his sidelong glance at Louise hold a meaning or was that just my imagination? Now his eyes were fixed on me again.

"Unlike his first wife, his new bride did not conceive, and it troubled him. To make certain he was not at fault, during this period he fathered several children by various serving-maids at the estancia. But my brother did not reproach his wife for her defects; instead he summoned a physician. His examination was inconclusive, but during its course he made another discovery—my brother's wife had the symptoms of an obscure eye condition, a malady which might some day bring blindness.

"The physician advised immediate surgery, but she was afraid the operation itself could blind her. So great was this fear that she made my brother swear a solemn oath upon the Blessed Virgin that, no matter what happened, no one would be allowed to touch her eyes."

"Poor woman!" Louise repressed a shudder. "What happened?"

"Naturally, after learning of her condition, my brother abstained from the further exercise of his conjugal rights. According to the physician it was still possible she might conceive, and if so perhaps her malady might be transmitted to the child. Since my brother had no wish to bring suffering into the world he turned elsewhere for his pleasures. Never once did he complain of the inconvenience she caused him in this regard. His was the patience of a saint. One would expect her to be grateful for his thoughtfulness, but it is the nature of women to lack true understanding."

Santiago took another swallow of his drink. "To his horror, my brother discovered that his wife had taken a lover. A young boy who worked as a gardener at the estancia. The betrayal took place while he was away; he now spent much time in Buenos Aires, where he had business affairs and the consolation of a sympathetic and understanding mistress.

"When the scandal was reported to him he at first refused to believe, but within weeks the evidence was unmistakable. His wife was pregnant."

"He divorced her?" Louise murmured.

Santiago shrugged. "Impossible. My brother was a religious man. But there was a need to deal with the gossip, the sly winks, the laughter behind his back. His reputation, his very honor, was at stake."

I took advantage of his pause to jump in. “Let me finish the story for you,” I said. “ Knowing his wife’s fear of blindness, he insisted on the operation and bribed the surgeon to destroy her eyesight.”

Santiago shook his head. “You forgot—he had sworn to the pobrecita that her eyes would not be touched.”

“What did he do?” Louise said.

“He sewed up her eyelids.” Santiago nodded. “Never once did he touch the eyes themselves. He sewed her eyelids shut with catgut and banished her to a guesthouse with a servingwoman to attend her every need.”

“Horrible!” Louise whispered.

“I am sure she suffered,” Santiago said. “But mercifully, not for long. One night a fire broke out in the bedroom of the guesthouse while the servingwoman was away. No one knows how it started—perhaps my brother’s wife knocked over a candle. Unfortunately the door was locked and the servingwoman had the only key. A great tragedy.”

I couldn’t look at Louise, but I had to face him. “And her lover?” I asked.

“He ran for his life, into the pampas. It was there that my brother tracked him down with the dogs and administered a suitable punishment.”

“What sort of punishment would that be?”

Santiago raised his glass. “The young man was stripped and tied to a tree. His genitals were smeared with wild honey. You have heard of the fire ants, amigo? They swarmed in this area—and they will devour anything which bears even the scent of honey.”

Louise made a strangled sound in her throat, then turned and ran from the room.

Santiago gulped the rest of his drink. “It would seem I have upset her,” he said. “This was not my intention—”

“Just what was your intention?” I met the bull-man’s gaze. “Your story doesn’t upset me. This is not the jungle. And you are not your brother.”

Santiago smiled. “I have no brother,” he said.

I drove through dusk. Lights winked on along Hollywood Boulevard from the Christmas decorations festooning lampposts and arching overhead. Glare and glow could not completely conceal the shabbiness of sleazy storefronts or blot out the shadows moving past them. Twilight beckoned those shadows from their hiding places; no holiday halted the perpetual parade of pimps and pushers, chickenhawks and hookers, winos and heads. Christmas was coming, but the blaring of tape-deck carols held little promise for such as these, and none for me.

Stonewalling it with Santiago had settled nothing. The truth was that I'd made a little token gesture of defiance, then ran off to let Louise face the music.

It hadn't been a pretty tune he'd played for the two of us, and now that she was alone with him he'd be free to orchestrate his fury. Was he really suspicious? How much did he actually know? And what would he do?

For a moment I was prompted to turn and go back. But what then? Would I hold Santiago at bay with a tire iron while Louise packed her things? Suppose she didn't want to leave with me? Did I really love her enough to force the issue?

I kept to my course but the questions pursued me as I headed home.

The phone was ringing as I entered the apartment. My hand wasn't steady as I lifted the receiver and my voice wasn't steady either.

"Yes?"

"Darling, I've been trying to reach you—"

"What's the matter?"

"Nothing's the matter. He's gone."

"Gone?"

"Please—I'll tell you all about it when I see you. But hurry—" I hurried.

And after I parked my car in the empty driveway, after we'd clung to one another in the darkened hall, after we settled on the sofa before the fireplace, Louise dropped her bombshell.

"I'm getting a divorce," she said.

"Divorce. . .?"

“When you left he came to my room. He said he wanted to apologize for upsetting me, but that wasn’t the real reason. What he really wanted to do was tell me how he’d scared you off with that story he’d made up.”

“And you believed him?”

“Of course not, darling! I told him he was a liar. I told him you had nothing to be afraid of, and he had no right to humiliate me. I said I was fed up listening to his sick raving, and I was moving out. That wiped the grin off his face in a hurry. You should have seen him—he looked like he’d been hit with a club!”

I didn’t say anything, because I hadn’t seen him. But I was seeing Louise now. Not the ethereal Cinderella of the portrait, and not the scullery-maid—this was another woman entirely; hot-eyed, harsh-voiced, implacable in her fury.

Santiago must have seen as much, and more. He blustered, he protested, but in the end he pleaded. And when he tried to embrace her, things came full circle again. Once more she raked his face with her nails, but this time in final farewell. And it was he who left, stunned and shaken, without even stopping to pack a bag.

“He actually agreed to a divorce?” I said.

Louise shrugged. “Oh, he told me he was going to fight it, but that’s just talk. I warned him that if he tried to stop me in court I’d let it all hang out—the jealousy, the drinking, everything. I’d even testify about how he couldn’t get it up.” She laughed. “Don’t worry, I know Carlos. That’s one kind of publicity he’d do anything to avoid.”

“Where is he now?”

“I don’t know and I don’t care.” The hot eyes blazed, the harsh voice sounded huskily in my ear. “You’re here,” she whispered.

And as her mouth met mine, I felt the fury.

I left before the maid arrived in the morning, just as I’d always done, even though Louise wanted me to stay.

“Don’t you understand?” I said. “If you want an uncontested divorce, you can’t afford to have me here.”

Dirk Otjens recommended an attorney named Bernie Prager; she went to him and he agreed. He warned Louise not to be seen privately or in public with another man unless there was a third party present.

Louise reported to me by phone. “I don’t think I can stand it, darling—not seeing you—”

“Do you still have the maid?”

“Josefina? She comes in every day, as usual.”

“Then so can I. As long as she’s there we have no problem. I’ll just show up to put a few more finishing touches on the portrait in the afternoons.”

“And in the evenings—”

“That’s when we can blow the whole deal,” I said. “Santiago has probably hired somebody to check on you.”

“No way.”

“How can you be sure?”

“Prager’s nobody’s fool. He’s used to handling messy divorce cases and he knows it’s money in his pocket if he gets a good settlement.” Louise laughed. “Turns out he’s got private investigators on his own payroll. So Carlos is the one being tailed.”

“Where is your husband?”

“He moved into the Sepulveda Athletic Club last night, went to his office today—business as usual.”

“Suppose he hired a private eye by phone?”

“The office lines and the one in his room are already bugged. I told you, Prager’s nobody’s fool.”

“Sounds like an expensive operation.”

“Who cares? Darling, don’t you understand? Carlos has money coming out of his ears. And we’re going to squeeze out more. When this is over, I’ll be set for life. We’ll both be set for life.” She laughed again.

I didn’t share her amusement. Granted, Carlos Santiago wasn’t exactly Mr. Nice. Maybe he deserved to be cuckolded, deserved to lose Louise. But was she really justified in taking him for a bundle under false pretenses?

And was I any better if I stood still for it? I thought about what would happen after the divorce settlement was made. No more painting, no more hustling for commissions. I could see myself with Louise, sharing the sweet life, the big house, big cars, travel, leisure, luxuries. And yet, as I sketched a mental portrait of my future, my artist’s eye noted a shadow. The shadow of one of those pimps prowling Hollywood Boulevard.

It wasn’t a pretty picture.

But when I arrived in the afternoon sunshine of Louise’s living room, the shadow vanished in the glow of her gaiety.

“Wonderful news, darling!” she greeted me. “Carlos is gone.”

“You already told me—”

She shook her head. “I mean really gone,” she said. “Prager’s people just came through with a report. He phoned in for reservations on the noon flight to New Orleans. One of his tankers is arriving there and he’s going to supervise unloading operations. He won’t be back until after the holidays.”

“Are you absolutely sure?”

“Prager sent a man to LAX. He saw Carlos take off. And all his calls are being referred to the company office in New Orleans.”

She hugged me. “Isn’t that marvelous? Now we can spend Christmas together.” Her eyes and voice softened. “That’s what I’ve missed the most. A real old-fashioned Christmas, with a tree and everything.”

“But didn’t you and Carlos—”

Louise shook her head. “Something always came up at the last minute—like this New Orleans trip. If we hadn’t split, I’d be on that plane with him right now.

“Did you ever celebrate Christmas in Kuwait? That’s where we were last year, eating lamb curry with some greasy port official. Carlos promised, no more holiday business trips, this year we’d stay home and have a regular Christmas together. You see how he kept his word.”

"Be reasonable," I said. "Under the circumstances what do you expect?"

"Even if this hadn't happened, it wouldn't change anything." Once again her eyes smoldered and her voice harshened. "He'd still go and drag me with him, just to show off in front of his business friends. 'Look what I've got—hot stuff, isn't she? See how I dress her, cover her with fancy jewelry?' Oh yes, nothing's too good for Carlos Santiago—he always buys the best!"

Suddenly the hot eyes brimmed and the strident voice dissolved into a soft sobbing.

I held her very close. "Come on," I said. "Fix your face and get your things."

"Where are we going?"

"Shopping. For ornaments—and the biggest damned Christmas tree in town."

If you've ever gone Christmas shopping with a child, perhaps you can understand what the next few days were like. We picked up our ornaments in the big stores along Wilshire; like Hollywood Boulevard, this street too was alive with holiday decorations and the sound of Yuletide carols. But there was nothing tawdry behind the tinsel, nothing mechanical about the music, no shadows to blur the sparkle in Louise's eyes. To her this make-believe was reality; each day she became a kid again, eager and expectant.

Nights found her eager and expectant too, but no longer a child. The contrast was exciting, and each mood held its special treasures. All but one.

It came upon her late in the afternoon of the twenty-third, when the tree arrived. The deliveryman set it up on a stand in the den and after he left we gazed at it together in the gathering twilight.

All at once she was shivering in my arms.

"What's the matter?" I murmured.

"I don't know. Something's wrong—it feels like there's someone watching us."

"Of course." I gestured toward the easel in the corner. "It's your portrait."

"No, not that." She glanced up at me. "Darling, I'm scared. Suppose Carlos comes back?"

"I phoned Prager an hour ago. He has transcripts of all your husband's calls up until noon today. Carlos phoned his secretary from New Orleans and said he'll be there through the twenty-seventh."

"Suppose he comes back without notifying the office?"

"If he does he'll be spotted—Prager's keeping the airport staked out, just in case." I kissed her. "Now stop worrying. There's no sense being paranoid—"

"Paranoid." I could feel her shivering again. "Carlos is the one who's paranoid. Remember that horrible story he told us—"

"But it was only a story. He has no brother."

"I think it's true. He did those things."

"That's what he wanted us to think. It was a bluff, and it didn't work. And we're not going to let him spoil our holiday."

"All right." Louise nodded, brightening. "When do we decorate the tree?"

"Christmas Eve," I said. "Tomorrow night."

It was late the following morning when I left—almost noon—and already Josefina was getting ready to depart. She had some last-minute shopping to do, she said, for her family.

And so did I.

"When will you be back?" Louise asked.

"A few hours."

"Take me with you."

"I can't—it's a surprise."

"Promise you'll hurry then, darling." Her eyes were radiant. "I can't wait to trim the tree."

"I'll make it as soon as possible."

But "soon" is a relative term and—when applied to parking and shopping on the day before Christmas—an unrealistic one.

I knew exactly what I was looking for, but it was close to closing-time in the little custom-jewelry place where I finally found it.

I'd never bought an engagement ring before and didn't know if Louise would approve of my choice. The stone was marquise-cut but it looked tiny and insignificant in comparison with the diamonds Santiago had given her. Still, people are always saying it's the sentiment that counts. I hoped she'd feel that way.

When I stepped out onto the street again it was already ablaze with lights and the sky above had dimmed from dusk to darkness. On the way to my car I found a phone booth and put in a call to Prager's office.

There was no answer.

I might have anticipated his office would be closed—if there'd been a party, it was over now. Perhaps I could reach him at home after I got back to the house. On the other hand, why bother? If there'd been anything to report he'd have phoned Louise immediately.

The real problem right now was fighting my way back to the parking lot, jockeying the car out into the street, and then enduring the start-stop torture of the traffic.

Celestial choirs sounded from the speaker system overhead.

"Silent night, holy night,
All is calm, all is bright—"

The honking of horns shattered silence with an unholy din; none of my fellow drivers were calm and I doubted if they were bright.

But eventually I battled my way onto Beverly Drive, crawling toward Coldwater Canyon. Here traffic was once again bumper-to-bumper; the hands of my watch inched to seven-thirty. I should have called Louise from that phone booth while I was at it and told her not to worry. Too late now; no public phones in this residential area. Besides, I'd be home soon.

Home.

As I edged into the turnoff which led up through the hillside, the word echoed strangely. This was my home now, or soon would be. Our home, that is. Our home, our cars, our money, Louise's and mine—

Nothing is yours. It's his home, his money, his wife. You're a thief. Stealing his honor, his very life—

I shook my head. Crazy. That's the way Santiago would talk. He's the crazy one.

I thought about the expression on the bull-man's face as he'd told me the story of his brother's betrayal and revenge. Was he really talking about himself? If so, he had to be insane.

And even if it was just a fantasy, its twisted logic only emphasized a madman's cunning. Swearing not to blind a woman by touching her eyes, and then sewing her eyelids shut—a mind capable of such invention was capable of anything.

Suddenly my foot was flooring the gas pedal; the car leaped forward, careening around the rising curves. I wrenched at the wheel with hands streaked by sweat, hurtling up the hillside past the big homes with their outdoor decorations and the tree-lights winking from the windows.

There were no lights at all in the house at the crest of the hill—but when I saw the Ferrari parked in the driveway, I knew.

I jammed to a stop behind it and ran to the front door. Louise had given me a duplicate house key and I twisted it in the lock with a shaking hand.

The door swung open on darkness. I moved down the hall toward the archway at my left.

"Louise!" I called. "Louise—where are you?"

Silence.

Or almost silence.

As I entered the living room I heard the sound of heavy breathing coming from the direction of the big chair near the fireplace.

My hand moved to the light switch.

"Don't turn it on."

The voice was slurred, but I recognized it.

"Santiago—what are you doing here?"

"Waiting for you, amigo."

"But I thought—"

"That I was gone? So did Louise." A chuckle rasped through the darkness.

I took a step forward, and now I could smell the reek of liquor as the slurred whisper sounded again.

"You see, I know about the bugging of the phones and the surveillance. So when I returned this morning I took a different route, with a connecting flight from Denver. No one at the airport would be watching arrivals from that city. I meant to surprise Louise—but it was she who surprised me."

"When did you get here?" I said.

"After the maid had left. Our privacy was not interrupted."

"What did Louise tell you?"

"The truth, amigo. I had suspected, of course, but I could not be sure until she admitted it. No matter, for our differences are resolved."

"Where is Louise? Tell me—"

"Of course. I will be frank with you, as she was with me. She told me everything—how much she loved you, what you planned to do together, even her foolish wish to decorate the tree in the den. Her pleading would have melted a heart of stone, amigo. I found it impossible to resist."

"If you've harmed her—"

"I granted her wish. She is in the den now." Santiago chuckled again, his voice trailing off into a spasm of coughing.

But I was already groping my way to the door of the den, flinging it open.

The light from the tree-bulbs was dim, barely enough for me to avoid stumbling over the machete on the floor. Quickly I looked up at the easel in the corner, half-expecting to see the painting slashed. But Louise's portrait was untouched.

I forced myself to gaze down at the floor again, dreading what I might see, then breathed a sigh of relief. There was nothing on the floor but the machete.

Stooping, I picked it up, and now I noticed the stains on the rusty blade—the red stains slowly oozing in tiny droplets to the floor.

For a moment I fancied I could actually hear them fall, then realized they were too minute and too few to account for the steady dripping sound that came from—

It was then that Santiago must have shot himself in the other room, but it was not the sudden sound which prompted my scream.

I stared at the Christmas tree, at the twinkling lights twining gaily across its huge boughs, and at the oddly shaped ornaments draped and affixed to its spiky branches. Stared, and screamed, because the madman had told the truth.

Louise was decorating the Christmas tree.

Bill

Bill Conner fought his way through the early-evening traffic with more than his usual quota of curses as he maneuvered the Ford into the right-hand lane and prepared to make his turn.

Sure enough, just as he slid into position, the light changed!

Story of my life, he told himself. Every time I think I'm getting someplace, there it goes again—they stop me cold.

His fingers drummed impatiently against the steering wheel as he scowled into the headlight glare of the bumper-to-bumper traffic reflected in his rearview mirror. Even before the signal turned green again, his foot hit the gas pedal and he started to swing around the comer.

Through the windshield, his eyes caught a blur of movement, and the sound of a sudden shout mingled with the squeal of brakes as his car halted, barely missing the stream of pedestrians directly in its path along the crosswalk.

Bill leaned out of the window to get a better glimpse of their frightened faces as they scurried by. Black faces, of course.

"Why don't you watch where you're going?" he shouted.

The crosswalk cleared and he completed his turn, sliding into the comparative safety of the side street.

With an effort he forced himself to relax his pressure on the gas pedal. Better slow down, try to take it easy. The last thing he needed now was an accident. Some black steps in front of your car and the next thing you know there's a Jewish lawyer coming at you with a million-dollar damage suit.

Bill leaned forward and switched on the radio. A little music to soothe his nerves, that's what he needed. Just a song at-twilight—

A blast of raucous sound assailed his ears and a high-pitched female voice screamed in song.

Bill cut off the voice, wishing that he could cut her throat instead. Dam blacks. Bad enough they'd taken over the streets—now they'd taken over the air, too. Getting so they didn't even leave a white man room enough to take a decent breath anymore.

What was happening to this country anyway? Things were different when he was a kid. You didn't hear all this stuff about civil rights; those people did their jobs and kept their places. Now the whole world was turning into one big welfare state, nothing but taxes and more taxes, and for what? Nobody had the guts to stop it, nobody even dared to speak out against it anymore. All these newspaper stories about robberies, muggings and murders, crime in the streets—crazy, that's what it was. Just crazy.

Too bad they didn't have someone like himself running things; he could clean up the whole mess in a hurry. Take the crime situation, for example—first thing to do is kill off eighty percent of the lawyers, ninety percent of the psychiatrists, and a hundred percent of the blacks.

Bill shook his head. No sense letting himself go overboard. The way things were going, decent hardworking citizens like himself didn't stand a prayer. All he could hope for was a little rest and relaxation, something to take his mind off his troubles—particularly after a day like the one he'd just had. At least they couldn't take that away from him—not yet, anyway.

The bright lights of a bar flashed ahead on his left. Bill slowed the car, seeking a parking spot alongside the right-hand curb. He finally found one, half a block ahead. Cutting his headlights and turning off the engine, he stepped out into the street, making sure that he'd locked the door behind him. The old neighborhood wasn't safe anymore; leave your car unlocked for a minute and kiss it good-bye forever. That's progress for you.

Bill shrugged, shaking off the thought, then squared his shoulders as he crossed the street and moved in the direction of the entrance beneath the neon light. It was Happy Hour time. No sense walking in with a frown on his face. Remember, you're a salesman, and the first job of a good salesman is to sell himself

The place was crowded with customers, homeward-bound like he was, who'd stopped off en route to unwind for a moment after a long hard day.

Bill turned and scanned the far edges of the crowd, then caught sight of the familiar figures seated in the far comer booth.

The two men were almost mirror images of himself; Ray was perhaps a few years older and Larry a trifle younger, but both wore similar outfits—double-knit suits, white shirts, the kind of conservative necktie calculated to inspire confidence in a potential customer. Two good salesmen, two good buddies.

Now they looked up at him and returned his wave of greeting. Ray moved around to the center of the booth as Bill slid into the seat behind him.

"What took you so long?" he said.

"Heavy traffic. Getting so a guy could make better time walking." Bill glanced down at his watch. "Hey, look, you guys—I can only stay a couple of minutes. The old lady's got some cousins from Florida coming over for dinner."

Larry eyed him across the table. "Then, you better hurry and catch up." He turned and signaled to a waitress as she passed the booth. "Hey, girl! Another beer over here. Better make it two."

Obviously, Larry was feeling no pain. Ray seemed to be the more sober of the two; as Bill spoke, he was conscious of Ray's stare.

"Something biting you?" Ray asked. "What's wrong?"

"The whole world, that's what's wrong."

Across the table Larry met his scowling gaze with a grimace of mock dismay. "Oh-oh!"

Ignoring him, Bill turned to Ray. "Remember that guy Goldman?"

"So that's it. You didn't get promoted." Ray nodded. "What happened?"

"They passed me up for that Jew."

The waitress set two glasses of beer on the tabletop in front of Bill and he turned, his scowl vanishing at the sight of her. Reaching out, he made a grab for her arm. “How’d you like to cheer up an old man?” he murmured.

The waitress pulled away with a deftness born of long practice. “Just drink your beer and you’ll feel better.”

Bill grabbed her again. “Come on, honey—”

The waitress jerked free of his grasp, eyes blazing. “Take your hands off me!”

As she flounced off, Larry started to laugh. “I think she likes you, Bill. You sure got a way with the women.”

Ray didn’t share his mirth. “Too bad about the job,” he said.

Bill’s scowl returned. “I’m better than Goldman. I’ve been there seventeen years.”

Larry fumbled for his glass and raised it tipsily. “Come on, Bill, relax!”

“Relax, nuts! Goldman takes my promotion and I should relax? That’s six grand a year more than I’m earning now.”

Ray shook his head. “Easy, Bill—”

“Easy for him, you mean. The Jews always get more money.”

“How long has Goldman been there?” Ray asked quietly.

Bill shrugged. “So he’s been there longer than me! What of it? I’ve sold more units in the last six weeks than he has moved all year.” As he spoke, he felt the anger rising within him, spilling out. “You know me. I’m a hard worker. I work hard and some smart Jew gets my job! Bunch of smart operators—no wonder they own everything!”

“Come off it, Bill.” Ray leaned forward. “You know better than that. The Jews do not own everything.”

“That’s right,” Larry chuckled, nodding. “The Arabs won’t let ’em!”

“Never mind that,” Bill muttered. “Arabs are just blacks wrapped in sheets.”

Ray glanced at Larry and sighed in weary resignation. “Oh, no—he’s on a roll now!”

Larry snickered, but Bill ignored the reaction. “Life in this country is getting harder and harder.” He thumped his fist down on the tabletop. “And you know why? It’s the Jews and the blacks and orientals, that’s why.”

“You’re raving, Bill.” There was a note of caution in Ray’s reply, a note that Bill ignored as his own voice rose loudly.

“Raving? My house is owned by some oriental bank! I’ve got blacks living just six blocks from my home.”

He broke off abruptly at the sound of another voice rising from behind him.

“Excuse me, mister. You got a problem?”

Bill glanced up into the face of a tall man standing beside the booth. The face was black.

Across the table, Larry muttered under his breath. “Oh-oh!”

Bill stared up defiantly. “Yeah, I do, buddy. I got a lot of problems.”

The black face was impassive. “Look,” he said slowly, “I really don’t care what you gentlemen think, as long as we don’t have to listen to it.”

Before Bill could reply, Ray broke in quickly.

Out of the comer of his eye, Bill caught his warning glance and forced himself to turn, nodding toward the formidable figure standing beside him. “Sure, sure,” he said. “Everything’s under control.”

For a moment the black patron hesitated, his eyes fixed on Bill’s face. Then he turned and moved back to his table. Bill reached for one of the glasses in front of him and downed its contents at a single gulp.

As he reached for the other glass, Ray frowned. “Maybe we ought to cut out,” he said.

Bill shook his head. “You do what you please! I’m not gonna leave until I’m good and ready. If that guy doesn’t like what I got to say, let him get out.”

“Keep your voice down!” Ray set an example with his worried whisper. “You want to get us killed?”

An inner censor modulated the sound of Bill’s voice but not the message it conveyed. “Hitler had the right idea. You just kill all of them.”

He raised his glass and drank as Larry nodded in alcoholic agreement. “That’s where we screwed up, in Vietnam, right there.”

“What?” Ray blinked as Larry nodded again.

“If we just killed them all off, we would’ve won.”

Ray’s gesture mingled disgust with dismissal. “You’re drunk, Larry.”

Larry ignored the observation, waggling a forefinger to emphasize his words of wisdom. “You see, if they were dead, then they wouldn’t be Communists.”

“Oh no? Why couldn’t someone be a dead Communist?”

“Hey, I never thought of that! Those Communists sure are tricky.”

His loud laughter was infectious; Ray’s chuckle responded, but Bill sat stony-faced, immune to the contagion.

Larry glanced at him, concerned. “Come on, Bill. Lighten up!”

Bill downed the contents of his second glass, then banged it down on the table. “You think this is funny?” he said. “Some friends you are! That Jew gets my job, some black threatens me when I speak up, and all you can do is laugh about it. I’m sure one lucky guy to have friends like you.”

Ray reached out and put his hand on Bill’s shoulder. “Let’s split,” he said. “You’re getting loud again.”

Bill pushed his arm away and rose. He was ready to leave, but not before he made his point. “Just remember one thing. While you two guys were fooling around, I was in the war. We were paid to kill Vietnamese.”

“Hey,” Ray said. “Just cool it—”

Bill wasn’t listening. “I thought we won that war but now those same orientals own my house! And then this Jew comes along and grabs my promotion.

I could use that extra money. I was counting on it. Instead I get myself shafted by some rich Jew—”

“Now wait a minute.” Ray shook his head reprovingly. “I know Goldman and you can’t exactly call him rich. Judging by the kind of clothes he wears and that old car of his, you're probably in better financial shape than he is."

"What difference does that make?" Bill made no effort to control his voice now; as far as he was concerned everybody could get the message, loud and clear. "Don't you understand? I'm better than a Jew. I'm better than an African. I'm better than an Oriental. I'm an American! That's supposed to mean something!"

Turning, he started along the row of booths, heading for the door.

Ray's voice rose behind him. "Bill—Wait a minute—"

But there was no time to wait. Yanking the door open, he strode out into the twilit street. Somewhere behind him the door banged shut.

Bill didn't hear it. He was too busy staring; staring into the street before him, where everything was—

Wrong.

The traffic had vanished. So had half the parked cars lining the curb opposite him. And those that remained were—different. Something about their sizes and shapes reminded him vaguely of the old jalopies he'd used when he was a kid; that's what they looked like, but even so he couldn't recognize the models. Behind them, a row of storefronts remained, but even these looked strange and unfamiliar. All of the fronts were dark, closed for the night. Directly across the way was a shop with a broken display window; half of the glass had been shattered and knocked out of its frame. Across the wooden door were two words, their letters scrawled in splotches of yellow paint.

Bill squinted through the dusk, trying to make them out.

Juden, and Juif.

One word was German and the other French, but both had the same meaning—Jews.

What had happened here? Glancing around, he noticed other changes—banners dangling from poles before the shops, each emblazoned with a design that also reminded him of something seen in the distant past: a squiggle of angling inter-locking black lines forming the shape of a swastika.

What gives here? Blinking, Bill turned away to confront a brick wall beside the bar entrance. It was plastered with posters bearing boldfaced lettering in German and French. Once again Bill realized, startled, that he could read and understand the wording.

He shook his head, trying to clear it. Was he drunk? No way—not on just two beers. And even if he'd had a dozen, that still wouldn't explain why he was able to understand foreign languages. And it wouldn't explain why he didn't recognize this street.

What had happened to it? And what had happened to him?

Bill closed his eyes for a moment, shutting out the strangeness. He was uptight, that was it. He shouldn't have let himself get carried away like that back there in the bar. All he had to do now was to get control of himself again. He stood quietly, taking deep breaths, forcing in fresh air to clear his lungs and his head. That should do the trick.

But when he opened his eyes again, nothing had changed.

Nothing—and everything. He was still standing on a strange street, staring at the strange storefronts, the ancient, unfamiliar automobiles, the peculiar posters with their foreign lettering.

Now as he glanced up, he saw a moving vehicle rounding the comer at his left. It too was of ancient vintage, and its side door bore the emblem of a swastika against a circular background. The car screeched to a halt at the curb before him. The rear door swung open and two men emerged quickly. Both were wearing uniforms—uniforms that Bill had seen many times before, but only in old news-photos and movies of World War Two.

Bill stared at them as they approached, stunned by the sudden shock of recognition. These guys were Nazi officers!

"Ou allez-vous?" The first man's eyes were cold, his voice curt. "Who are you?"

"Qui êtes-vous?" Bill turned to face the second officer as he extended his hand.

"Ihre Papiern."

Bill stood silent, suddenly realizing that both officers were addressing him in a foreign tongue; the first in French and the second in German, and yet he understood what they were saying. How could that be?

The first officer was speaking again. Once more the language was French, but Bill understood the words of command all too clearly. "Your papers! Now!"

Bill started to back away. "Vos papiers! Maintenant."

The first officer grabbed his arm, then reached into Bill's coat pocket for his wallet.

Bill shook his head. "Hey, what do you think you're doing—"

The second officer slapped his face. "Sei still!" he shouted.

The stinging blow brought tears to Bilks eyes, and before he could speak again, the first officer had grabbed his wallet; now he was rifling its plastic pockets and examining their contents. He peered down at Bill's Master Charge card.

"Qu' est-ce que c' est que ça?" he snapped.

Bill frowned in bewilderment, then recoiled as the second man slapped his face again.

"AntwortenSie!" the Nazi shouted. "Was meint das?"

Bill forced his voice. "It's a credit card for goodness sake!"

"Sind Sie Englischer?" the second officer demanded. "Was tun Sie hier?"

Bill groped for an answer. What was he doing here? And just where was he? He stared past his two interrogators, stared at the signs identifying the storefront across the street. The signs were in French, but these men were German. Vaguely he remembered his history lessons when he was still a kid in school. The Nazis had occupied France during World War Two. But that was in 1940, a lifetime ago. How could they be here now?

The first officer held up Bill's driver's license. "Vous etes American? Repondez-moi!"

"Was tun sie hier?" the second officer repeated. Stepping behind Bill, he grabbed his arms, holding him fast.

"Let go of me!" Bill shouted.

The first officer shook his head. "Venez avec nous!" He closed the wallet and stuffed it into his pocket, then turned and started across the walk to the waiting car. His companion began to propel Bill forward. As they reached the open car door, Bill yanked himself free and turned quickly, lunging at his captor and pushing him back against the other officer.

The two men collided forcefully, and for a moment they stumbled off-balance. Bill turned and ran down the street.

Shouts rose behind him: "Halt!"

"Arretez!"

Bill did not look back. He ran forward blindly with a speed born of panic.

Again the shouts sounded: "Halt! Ich werde schie Ben!"

Bill opened his eyes just in time to see the entrance to an alleyway yawning to his left. As he swerved into it, he heard the echo of two shots from behind. He raced up the alley, weaving his way amidst a litter of garbage and broken pieces of furniture. In the darkness he stumbled and fell.

For a moment he lay there, trying to catch his breath. Panting, he raised his head and glanced back just in time to see his pursuers appear at the end of the alleyway behind him. Both men were holding pistols now, and as their eyes scanned the darkness they raised the weapons, firing blindly.

Pain lanced Bill's left arm just below the shoulder. He glanced down, shocked at the sight of the bleeding wound. From the darkness beyond came the sound of running feet pounding against the cobblestones.

Glancing around frantically, Bill saw a pile of rubble projecting from the wall directly beside him. Soundlessly, he slid behind it and crouched down, breathing a silent prayer that his hiding place was secure.

Afraid to lift his head, he could only lie silently as the sound and tempo of running feet increased, then diminished in darkness beyond. Only then did he dare to lift his head and peer forward to the other end of the alley. In the light from the street beyond, he saw that the officers had halted, glancing about in confusion.

For a moment Bill felt safe—but only for a moment. Now the air resounded with a shrill shriek of a whistle, summoning aid.

Bill's throbbing arm was warm with blood, his forehead cold with sweat. Peering out from behind the rubble, he saw a wooden door set in the brick wall of the alley directly across from him. Gasping, he rose and dashed toward it. He tugged at the door handle, hoping against hope that he'd find it unlocked. To his relief, the door gave way, opening inward.

He entered, closing the door behind him. Slowly his eyes penetrated the gloom. Directly before him loomed a flight of stairs. He moved toward it quietly, then began to climb.

Halfway between the foot of the stairs and the landing above him he paused, startled by a sudden sound of footsteps overhead.

Again, the cold sweat broke out on his forehead. Someone was coming but there was no place to hide. He stood there, trapped.

Then footsteps faded and he heard the creak of a door opening and closing somewhere above.

Bill waited for a moment, giddy with the wave of pain that pulsed through his left arm. He strained to listen, but no further sound broke the silence.

Slowly he continued his climb. When he reached the landing above, he halted again, glancing from left to right along the small hallway. There were doors at either end. From behind the one at his right, he heard the faint and muffled murmur of conversation. Moving toward it, he could make out the source of the sound more clearly—a woman's voice, speaking French.

Bill couldn't tell what she was saying. The mere fact that she was French and female was enough of a relief to determine his decision.

Slowly, he pushed the door open and entered the room beyond.

He found himself standing in the confines of a shabby kitchen, illuminated by the light from a single bare bulb dangling on a cord above a table. Seated around it were three small children who now glanced up from their supper in surprise as he appeared. Standing before the wood stove at one side was a middle-aged woman, obviously their mother. Her dress was drab, her hair disheveled, her eyes widened in surprise.

Bill turned to her, his own eyes pleading. “Don’t be afraid,” he said. “I won’t hurt you.”

The mother made no reply. The children stared at him silently; then, in response to the woman’s gesture they rose from their seats and moved toward her. The mother stepped before them as they huddled behind her for protection.

“Please—you’ve got to help me,” Bill murmured. “I’ve been shot.”

The woman gave him a puzzled glance, then her eyes darted toward the small window at the far comer of the room as the sound of sirens wailed up from the streets below.

Bill’s voice rose, trying to drown them out. “I don’t know what’s happening to me. It’s like I’m in a dream or something—”

The woman wasn’t listening to him. But now as the screech of the sirens grew louder, her face firmed in sudden decision. In three quick steps she was at the window—raising it—leaning out—shouting down into the street below.

Her words were in French but Bill understood them all too clearly.

“Aidez-nous!” she screamed. “II est ici! Le Juif est ici!”

Bill took a step forward. “Please—don’t let them find me—”

His voice was lost in the sound of her screaming. “Le Juif que vous cherchez est ici! En haut!”

Bill turned and the children cowered, gazing up at him in fright, but their fear was nothing compared to his own as he heard the answering voices shouting up from the street below and the drumming of running feet against the pavement.

He lurched through the opened doorway to the landing beyond. Staring down, he saw the door burst open at the foot of the stairs. A uniformed man glanced up, meeting his startled gaze, then turned to call out to his companion. His language was German.

“Das ist er.”

A rush of footsteps and a babble of voices rose in answer. As soldiers began pouring through the doorway of the landing below, Bill turned and raced back into the kitchen.

Slamming the door, he barred it from the inside. Behind him the woman screamed again and the children started to cry. Bill ignored them, moving to the window and staring out at the drop below. The street was temporarily deserted but he couldn’t chance jumping—at this height the fall could be fatal.

Now the room resounded with frantic echoes as the soldiers began pounding on the door.

There was a sudden crash as one of the upper panels splintered under the impact of a rifle butt.

Bill reached out with his good arm, finding and grasping the cornice above the window. Firming his grip, he swung out and pulled himself upward, his feet braced against the side of the window frame.

Exerting all his strength, he clung to the projection with both hands, not daring to look down at the street below. For a moment he hung swaying, his feet moving pendulum-like in empty air; then he raised himself over the cornice and onto the rooftop. Now a faint babble arose from the street; but Bill didn’t look down. Panting for breath, he rose and ran across the roof, continuing his route across the roof of the building beyond it.

From behind and below, a voice shouted in German. “Er ist am Dach! Ich will schnell eine Licht.”

Glancing down, Bill saw a soldier climbing out of the window of the room he had just vacated.

Dizzy with exertion, he turned and stared across the alley where another rooftop rose. This one was slanted and tiled. Bill glanced at it dubiously but the sound of voices from below firmed his resolution. In a minute they’d be up here and he had no choice, nowhere else to go.

Breathing deeply, he moved to the edge of the roof, forcing himself to look down just long enough to estimate the distance between this building and the next.

Eight feet—maybe nine. He could make it. What was he talking about? He had to make it!

He stepped back, taking another deep breath, then ran forward and leaped from the parapet, landing on the slanted surface opposite with a thump that squeezed the air from his lungs. His fingers found a purchase on the tiles, but even when he exerted all his strength, he was unable to pull himself upward. The darkness had deceived him; the angle of the roof was too steep for him to climb with nothing but tiles to cling to.

Suddenly a beam of light flared across the surface of the roof directly beside him.

Bill glanced down over his left shoulder for a glimpse of the alleyway below. His eyes watered as he stared into the blinding ray of an upturned searchlight resting in the back of an open jeep. As the light swept on, its path was followed by a hail of rifle shots. The soldiers were firing up, guided by the beam.

Frantically, Bill made another effort to edge his way up along the steep slant of the rooftop, favoring his right hand.

There was a sudden splintering sound and Bill glanced up along his arm to its source: the tile he clung to had cracked and broken loose.

“Oh no!” he gasped.

Scrabbling, his fingers clawed nothing but empty air, and he felt himself starting to slide back toward the edge of the roof behind him. And now the beam of the searchlight swooped, then halted directly upon him, pinning him in its harsh glare.

Bill closed his eyes. In a moment now, the shots would come.

Suddenly, from below, a voice sounded in command. “Halt Feurer!”

There were no shots, and no need for them, because they could see what was happening. They could see him sliding down the slant toward the edge of the roof.

Bill clawed out again, gripping another tile to halt his descent, then groaned in dismay as he felt it tear loose from beneath his frantic fingers.

A sudden blast of cold air welled up from below and he realized to his horror that his legs were now dangling over the edge. Then he began to slide faster.

Tiles scraped against his body and tore at the side of his cheek as he slipped backward. As he went over the edge, his right arm rose to grab the drainage gutter; now his fingers closed around it and for a moment he hung swaying over the alleyway below.

Then he fell.

Bill hit the ground with an impact that drove the breath from his body.

Ground. He was lying on the ground.

And that meant he was still alive, still conscious. It was a miracle, that's what it was—a miracle.

That rooftop was at least three stories above the cobblestones of the alleyway.

Cobblestones—

Bill was lying facedown, his left cheek pressed against the ground. And it was ground; not cold, hard stone, but soft, warm grass.

Something was wrong here—very wrong.

Bill started to open his eyes, but before he could do so, hands gripped his shoulders roughly, turning him over and slamming him down on his back.

Now his eyes were open. He stared up into the night sky, into the circle of figures gazing down at him. "No!" he cried.

He was lying on his back in a forest clearing. Flames flickered under the hanging branches of the trees—flames of torches held in the hands of white-robed, hooded figures standing over him.

A shock of recognition surged through him.

White robes—armed men squinting down at him through eyeholes in their hoods. The Ku Klux Klan!

"No!" Bill cried again.

One of the hooded figures laughed. "We got you now, boy!"

What was he talking about?

Bill opened his mouth, but before he could speak, two of the Klansmen grabbed him by the shoulder and pulled him to his feet.

Then he found his voice. “Where am I?”

A hooded man cradling a rifle shook his head. “Shut up!” Turning, he nodded to the man standing at his right. “Tie his hands,” he said.

The hooded figure nodded, then stepped behind Bill to join his companions as they jerked their captive’s wrists out behind his back and pinned them together. Bill felt the rough rope looping around his wrists.

He looked up, shaking his head. “What’s the idea? Why are you doing this to me?”

The Klansman before him raised his rifle in a menacing gesture. “Shut up, boy!”

Bill stared at him, frowning. “What are you talking about? I’m a white man!”

Hands gripped his shoulders from behind, pitching him forward. He fell facedown upon the grassy knoll, and landed hard, unable to break his fall because his wrists were now firmly tied together behind his back.

The Klansman with the rifle moved toward him, and Bill felt a jab of pain as a booted foot emerged from beneath the hem of the white robe, kicking him over on his back again.

“You hear me, boy? I said for you to shut up!” Bill gaped upward, swallowing hard, hoping against hope as he made one last attempt. “I’m white! Can’t you see? Look at me—”

The Klansman with the rifle leaned forward, a mirthless chuckle sounding from behind his hanging hood.

The man above him swung his rifle-barrel down, smashing it into Bill’s stomach. “Don’t talk back to me, boy! We gonna learn you some respect.”

Bill lay silent, fighting the pain, and the nausea welling up behind it.

A low murmur sounded from the half-circle of hooded figures behind him. From their midst one voice rose clearly. “Let’s hang him!”

Clutching hands reached down, yanking Bill to his feet. Holding him tightly, they jerked him around to face the moss-festooned boughs of a huge tree. Something flamed and flared beside it, a burning cross, six feet high, the base wedged into the ground. By its light and by the light of the torches carried by the Klansmen, Bill could see hooded shadows reflected against the treetops of the forest surrounding the clearing.

Hoods . . . torches . . . cross-burning . . . they had to be insane! Either that or he was crazy.

No time to puzzle it out, because now they were already dragging him toward the tree. Staring up, he saw a Klansman standing beside it, his hands busily tying the final knot of a noose. Now he tossed the loose end of the heavy rope over a hanging tree limb. As his captors on either side pushed Bill forward, the man with the noose advanced, holding it out, ready to encircle his neck.

Bill twisted his head to avoid the descending loop, then lifted his right foot. Lunging sideways, he kicked out at the leg of the man at his right.

With a gasp of pain the hooded Klansman staggered off balance, stumbling against the blazing cross. His gasp turned into a scream as his robe caught fire.

Howling, he hurled himself to the ground, writhing and rolling in a frantic effort to extinguish the flame. Shouts of dismay sounded as his companions rushed forward to aid their comrade. Freed from the grip of his captors, Bill turned and plunged out of the firelit circle and into the dark woods beyond.

Hands still tied behind his back, he stumbled forward, darting between the trees at a dead run.

Amidst the outcry and confusion in the clearing behind, a shout arose to speed him on his course. “Look out! He’s getting away!”

Bill didn’t look back. Had he done so, he might have seen one of the hooded figures hurry toward the black bulk of a pickup truck that stood parked at the far side of the clearing and hastily open its rear doors to release what waited within.

Now there was no need to look back. A sudden baying arose, telling all he needed to know.

Dogs.

They were coming after him with bloodhounds!

Bill ran faster. He weaved his way through the darkness, blundering into tree trunks. Low-hanging branches whipped his face, tangles of roots and vegetation impeded his staggering flight. Wheezing, he flung himself forward. Desperation drove him onward in response to the sound of curses and cries, the crashing of running feet, the howling of the hounds bounding behind.

Suddenly he emerged from the woods to find himself standing before the weedy edge of a riverbank. For a moment he halted there, staring down into the turbulent current glittering in the moonlight. Croaking in alarm, frightened frogs splashed into the. rushing water. Bill didn't hear them; he was conscious only of the howling dogs, the whoops and shouts of the pursuing men. Someone's voice rose in a rebel yell: it seemed to come from only a few yards away.

As its echo sounded in his ear, Bill started forward. Taking a deep breath, he dived headlong into the water.

Feet thrashing, he surfaced, twisting and tugging in panic at the cord binding his wrists behind him. To his relief he felt it loosen and give way, freeing his hands. Then he began to swim downstream, moving toward the center of the rushing torrent.

Now, on the bank behind him, the dogs appeared, their howls mingling with the roar of the rushing water. A moment later they were joined by their hooded masters, armed with rifles and shotguns.

One of them called out angrily; "You won't get far, boy!"

Beside him, another hooded man cupped his hand, shouting. "You're one dead man! You hear me?"

A third Klansman brandished his torch, then pointed with his free hand. "There he is! I see him!"

Shotguns and rifles rose, following in the direction of his outflung arm.

Bill swam forward frantically, flinching at the sound of shots whistling overhead. Filling his lungs with air, he ducked his head beneath the surface of the water. Captured by an undercurrent, his body swirled helplessly in the dark depth. Eyes bulging, lungs bursting for want of air, he bobbed to the surface again, gasping for breath.

He inhaled quickly then, tense with anticipation of the sound of gunfire. But no sound came.

No shots. No shouting. No sound of rushing water.

The river was calm.

There wasn't the slightest ripple of movement across its expanse and its surface no longer seemed clear. Instead, he found himself surrounded by floating clumps of rotting vegetation from which a brackish stench arose, steaming into the tropical night.

Tropical.

Bill glanced toward the treetops lining the shore. Their appearance was strangely altered, or changed completely. These trees seemed shorter and more compactly clustered. Ferns rose to rim the base of their gnarled trunks; tall reeds towered against the shoreline.

Dazed and bewildered, Bill swam slowly toward the riverbank at his right. Within moments his feet were touching bottom, kicking up a mixture of mud and weeds to cloud the surface of the water around him. He stood up, feeling his feet sinking into the ooze, sensing the slow swirl of the warm air against his wet skin.

And even that was wrong. The air was too warm now. Bill glanced back toward the river with a rush of recognition. It wasn't really a river at all—the look and the smell of it was more like a swamp; a tropical swamp, steaming in the humid heat of the jungle night.

But how did he get here?

Bill shook his head, then froze abruptly at the sound of soft voices murmuring from the darkness of the trees lining the bank. He crouched down quickly, shielding his body behind the reed-cluster near the shore. Peering between its upthrust stalks, he watched, silent and motionless, as four uniformed men moved forth from the trees in single file. They were short and squat, with dark hair close-cropped beneath the bill-caps pushed back over perspiring foreheads. Their skin was dark and their eyes and cheekbones identified them as Orientals. All wore identical uniforms, splotched with stains of mingled mud and perspiration. In sharp contrast, the rifles they carried were spotless, the steel barrels gleaming in the moonlight.

Abruptly, Bill's memory bridged a gap of twenty years. He was just a kid then, just a young punk, drafted right out of school and into the war to kill the orientals.

Now he knew where he was. This was Nam, and these were Charlies—Viet Cong!

They advanced toward the riverbank still muttering softly, and for one hideous moment Bill thought they'd wade right into the water and through the weeds where he was hiding.

Then they swerved, moving left along the river's edge, following its course until they disappeared into the darkness beyond.

Bill slumped back into the water, exhausted by his fright, his tension, his inability to comprehend what had happened.

Something stirred, rippling the surfaces surrounding him. He turned quickly, staring down in sudden terror at the sight of the green shape wriggling toward his waist. It was a watersnake and a big one.

Now, as its body twisted forward, the reptile's head drew back abruptly, jaws agape and ready to strike.

Bill hurled himself to one side and rose, stumbling and splashing through the reeds along the bank.

Then he halted as voices sounded faintly from the shore beyond. Quickly he lowered himself once again into concealment beneath the topmost level of the reeds. Even though he was soaking wet, Bill could feel the fresh perspiration trickling across his furrowed forehead.

They were coming back. But now, as he hunkered down, the voices rose loud and clear. They were speaking English!

"Charlie's out there—I can hear 'em."

A deeper voice rumbled in reply. "Cool it, man! I don't hear nothing!"

A third voice sounded. “He’s right—there’s something moving.”

Bill rose to his feet, waving his arm toward the darkened trees bordering the riverbank.

“Don’t shoot!” he cried. “I’m an American! Help me—I’m hurt! Over here—”

His eyes searched the shoreline eagerly, waiting for his rescuers to emerge from concealment behind the trees.

Nothing stirred. And now, after a moment that seemed to elongate into an eternity, he heard the voices once more. This time they dropped to a series of harsh whispers.

“What’d I tell you? They’re out there all right.”

“Where?”

“Too close for me, man.”

Bill started to wade through the reeds, moving toward the shore. “Listen to me,” he shouted. “I’m an American! You’ve got to help me—please—” From the bank above came an excited murmur. “Look! There’s one now!”

“You’re right, I see him!”

The rest of his words were lost in the sudden burst of sound—the insane chatter of machine-gun fire.

Bill flung himself back down into the muddy waters, screaming.

“No! Don’t shoot—No!”

Bullets spurted, splashing into the water around him.

Bill ducked under, holding his breath as he swam out through the shallows.

It was only when lack of air forced him to the surface that he ventured to raise his head again, gasping hoarsely as his eyes sought the shoreline.

All was silent; the firing had ceased. Once more his ears strained for sounds to break the stillness.

Frogs croaked querulously from their concealment along the marshy weed-clumps bordering the riverbank. Somewhere deep in the distant jungle beyond, a night bird uttered a raucous cry.

Then, from the shadows amidst the trees bordering the shore, a murmur drifted faintly across the water. Bill recognized the voices of the patrol. “Hear anything?”

“Not me, man. We must’ve got him.”

Bill hesitated, fighting an impulse to call out once again. No use—those trigger-happy guys would only start shooting again. Now all he could do was keep moving, try to get across the river. Maybe it would be safer on the other side.

He began to swim again; moving slowly, with cautious strokes in an effort to avoid disturbing the water in his progress. Don’t make waves.

A sudden sound emerged from somewhere along the bank behind him. He halted his effort, floating on the surface as he turned his head toward shore.

The deeper voice murmured again. “What’s wrong with your ears? He’s still swimming around out there—I heard him!”

“Nothin’s wrong with my ears, man. Only thing I hear out there is frogs.”

A third voice rose excitedly. “Hey, look! There’s his head sticking out of the water! He’s trying to make it to the other side!”

Bill ducked under quickly, his arms flailing. No use worrying about the noise now. They’d spotted him, and all he could do was pray that he could stay beneath the surface long enough to reach the safety of the opposite shore. Another burst of machine-gun fire shattered the surface above his submerged head; the sound sped him on his way.

He swam on, swam until his eyes blurred, his arms ached, his lungs burned. Then, just as he reached the point of no return, his thrashing feet touched bottom.

Unable to endure another airless moment, Bill sought the surface, his head rising just far enough to clear the water. Inhaling deeply, he stared at the sheltering shore directly before him.

He’d made it!

And the gunfire from the other side of the river had ceased; now the only sounds he heard were the gasps accompanying his own intake of breath.

Relieved, he drew himself up and waded through the shallows, then started up the sloping bank to head for the trees beyond.

As he did so, a shout echoed across the waters behind him.

“There he is!”

Bill turned, crouching against the side of the bank, staring back across the river. He could see the shadows of the men moving on the other side, see them all too clearly.

For the first time he realized that the river itself was not all that wide; once they started shooting again, he was done for. He crouched lower, hands digging deep into the mud as he waited for them to fire.

But no shots came. Instead, as he glanced back across the swampy stream, he saw one of the shadows raise an arm, drawing it back like a pitcher preparing to throw a ball.

Something came hurtling down from above and landed in the mud with a dull plop, about a dozen yards to Bill’s left. He turned, staring down at the object half imbedded in the soft mud of the riverbank.

This was no baseball—the size and shape were wrong. As he blinked at the reflection of its shiny surface in the moonlight, Bill heard the hissing.

Baseball? This was a grenade—

He rose, running forward.

Behind him the grenade exploded in a blinding burst of light, its blast shattering the silence. The impact of the explosion sent Bill flying, lifting him into the air to crash headfirst against the barrier of tree trunks directly before him.

He must have blacked out then; maybe for a minute, perhaps for hours. There was no way of knowing, but slowly consciousness returned.

Bill realized that he was still alive, alive and aware, lying on his back against warm grass, arms and legs outstretched. Cautiously he moved his fingers, wriggled his toes. Dull pain shot through his limbs and he felt a throbbing ache in his shoulders, but the muscles responded. He hadn’t been hit after all.

Opening his eyes, he stared up past the encircling treetops toward the night sky overhead. The air above him was moist and heavy with heat. The clothing that clung to him was wet and sticky.

Nothing had changed. He was still in the jungle, still here—wherever here was.

Cautiously he raised himself on his right elbow and glanced back over the riverbank and the deep crater fashioned by the force of the explosion. He peered across the water. No shadow moved along the opposite shore and the only sound rising from it was the chanted litany of the frogs.

Slowly Bill rose, his eyes probing the jungle growth before him. Somewhere within its depths he could detect the drone and buzz of insects on their nocturnal rounds. There was no other sign of life.

Life?

Bill shook his head. How could he be sure that anything was alive? First those Nazis, next the Klansmen, then the VCs and the G.I.s. All of them were gone now, but had they even been real in the first place?

Maybe he was dreaming; maybe he was dying, delirious with fever. Maybe he was already dead.

But the aching in his arms and legs as he moved forward reassured him. Dead men feel no pain. Whatever had happened, wherever he was, he was still alive.

His problem now was to make sure he stayed that way.

Cautiously, eyes and ears alert for any hint of shape or sound, Bill started forward through the trees ahead. He had no hint what lay beyond the jungle; all he wanted to do was get away—away from the river, away from the shapes that prowled his nightmare.

Nightmare—that's what it was—that's what it had to be!

Nothing else made any sense to him. But if it was a nightmare, then why didn't he wake up?

And when had he fallen asleep?

He remembered being with Ray and Larry. That part was real, and he knew he wasn't asleep in the bar. But how long had it been since then?

Was it hours, days, months?

Somehow it seemed like years; yes, it had to be years, because of the Nazis. And when had the Ku Klux Klan stopped lynching blacks? That was years ago, too, and so was the war in Nam.

Bill shook his head. How could it be years ago? It was still going on, and he was in Nam now. Here, in the middle of the night, lost in the jungle.

This was no dream; he could smell the rot, feel sweat break out over his body in the humid heat of the tropical night, feel the stinging of the mosquito swarms surrounding him, hear their angry buzzing as he advanced.

Advanced?

Bill halted, glancing around him at the trees, which loomed in silent circles.

Which way was he going? How could he be sure he was moving in the right direction? There was no trail to follow, nothing to see but the trees stretching endlessly on all sides.

He was lost, lost in the jungle. His lips moved in a silent prayer.

There was no answer, no sign; only the insect-humming rising from the tangle of vines and creepers looping snakelike between the tree trunks.

For a moment longer. Bill stood indecisively, then turned abruptly to his right and began to move forward again. Keep moving, that was the answer.

His entire body was aching now; he felt like he'd been beaten with a sledgehammer, but he kept going, had to keep going, because there was no other choice. Sooner or later he'd get to the end of this jungle and come out on the other side. No way of knowing what he'd find there, but anything was better than this maze of darkness in which he floundered.

Tripping over vines, blundering into overhanging branches, slapping at the insects that assailed him, Bill panted forward.

Then, suddenly, the way ahead was clear.

Halting at the edge of the clearing, he glanced down at the river below. Bill shook his head, his jaw muscles tightening.

Oh no—don't tell me I doubled back!

Another glance reassured him, however, that the stream was broader and wider than the one he had crossed. And rising behind the bank on the opposite side was a towering cliff. At its base was a cluster of thatch-roofed structures, perhaps a dozen or so. Light bulbs loosely strung on wires hung between the huts, and in their glare he could see a black cluster of insects encircling each bulb with a dark and humming halo. The light was reflected on the surface of the water below, flecking its murkiness with glints of gold.

Bill stood silent, focusing eyes and ears intently. But nothing moved beneath the light on the other side and no sound broke the stillness. Even the frogs were silent here.

Slowly, he started down the sloping bank to the water's edge, glancing left and right as he did so. In the jungle growth behind him the mosquitoes' hum was faintly audible. That was all he heard. Before him the river stretched soundless, its surface serene.

Bill made his way to the water's edge, staring into the lighted semicircle of huts once again.

Again his eyes searched for a hint of movement, and again he hesitated.

Had the villagers seen him? Were they hiding from him in fear or had they retreated into the huts to surprise him with an ambush?

There was no way of telling, no way of knowing if he faced friend or foe. Only the lights held promise, beckoning him forward, out of the darkness. No matter what might be lurking across the river, it was better than what lay behind him.

Bill waded into the water and when it rose to waist-level he started to swim, ignoring his body's aching protest. No matter how tired he was, he had to keep going.

To his surprise, as he swam he felt the tension in his muscles ebbing, but the realization was purely physical; his mind was not affected.

Or was it? Once again the events of the past few hours flashed before him and again the question came: Had it only been hours? Suddenly it seemed to him that he'd been on the run forever—running from the Nazis, the Klansmen, then those G.I.s in the jungle. Had it really happened or was he going crazy?

The full ache in his limbs returned and now he greeted it gratefully; at least this gave him part of the answer. There was no way he could be so beat unless what had happened was real.

It wasn't his imagination and he wasn't crazy. It was the others who'd freaked out; the Nazis who mistook him for a Jew, the Klansmen who thought he was black, the G.I.s who figured him for an oriental.

What was the matter with them, didn't they have eyes? Couldn't they see that he was an American all along? If they'd only looked, only listened, they should have known.

Crazy, that's what they were. But it didn't matter now; the important thing was that he'd escaped and if he could find someone here in the village across the river, if they were friendly, then maybe they'd help him to get away. Away from the jungle and the crazies, help him to get back home again.

Reaching the shallows, Bill rose to his feet and made his way to shore. Ahead of him the hanging lights still burned, but nothing stirred in the shadows beyond.

Again the thought came and with it rose the fear: Was it an ambush?

There was only one way to find out, and now that he was here he had to take the chance. Slowly he forced himself forward up the bank and stepped into the semicircular clearing before the thatched huts arranged by the cliffside. Above him he could hear the buzz and drone of the insects fluttering around the burning bulbs. There was no other sound except his own harsh breathing and the muffled thudding of his heartbeat.

Outlined against the light, Bill glanced across the compound. What were they waiting for? If they had weapons, now was the time to use them; standing here he made a perfect target. And if they didn't shoot, if they were friendly, then why were they afraid to show themselves?

Bill swallowed quickly, then took a deep breath. "Anybody here?" he shouted.

The only answer was the echo of his own voice.

Bill frowned. Maybe they couldn't understand what he was saying, but at least they had heard him call out and they could see he was unarmed. Why didn't they show themselves?

Still no sound, still no movement, except for that of insects buzzing and fluttering around the bare bulbs overhead.

Bill turned and crossed to the hut on the far end at his left. He moved along the side to the open doorway, halting there. Again he called. "Anybody here? Come on out—It's all right, I won't hurt you."

There was no answer to his invitation. Beyond the darkened doorway, all was still.

Bill took a step forward, then peered into the hut. Dimly he discerned the cast-iron cookstove in one comer, the sleeping-mats littering the bare earth on either side. Other than that, the hut was empty.

Frowning, he started around the semicircle, pausing to peer through each doorway in turn, finding nothing but a duplication of the first hut's contents. Stove and sleeping-mats . . . and in a few cases, bowls and cooking utensils, plus a few blankets and bundles of clothing. Behind him the lights still blazed and in several of the huts he noted the presence of cooking pots atop the stoves.

He stepped inside to examine one of them, starring down at the bubbling broth and sniffing its aroma.

There must have been someone here quite recently, that much was certain. And it looked as though they'd left in a hurry; that much was obvious, too, but where had they gone? And why had they left in such a hurry?

Bill stumbled out of the hut, staring around the deserted village and shaking his head. No sense trying to figure out what had happened here; all he knew was that he was still alone, alone and tired. Tired of thinking, tired of running. All he wanted now was sleep; yet deep within him, a warning sounded. He couldn't afford to fall asleep, not here, not now. But he had to get some rest.

Moving around to the side of the hut, Bill lowered himself to the ground and leaned back against the outer wall, surrendering to the wave of weariness that rose within him. Involuntarily his eyes closed. Now the wave crested, drowning him in darkness.

Drowning, that's what he was doing now.

He had to be drowning, going down for the third time because his whole life passed in review. The inner visions flashed before him: Ray and Larry needling him in the bar—the Nazi officers shooting as he raced across the rooftops—his fall to the pavement below. Now the Klansmen were dangling the noose before his neck—again he forced one of his hooded captors against the fiery cross, hearing him scream in agony. Suddenly the scream was transformed into the baying of the bloodhounds pursuing him through the night—then their howling was lost in the stutter of the machine gun and the rumbling roar of the exploding grenade. Once more he blundered blindly through the jungle, swam the river, searched the silent huts—

Bill's eyes blinked open.

For a moment he didn't know where he was, but as his vision cleared, he stared up at the dangling lights and into the darkness beyond.

He realized that he must have fallen asleep in spite of himself; he'd been dreaming, but now he was fully awake, fully aware.

Bill turned, glancing toward the river. The black bulk of a catamaran loomed from the center of the stream, its unfurled sails offering ample explanation of how it achieved its silent approach.

In the dimness Bill could discern the movement of shadowy shapes at the stern of the craft.

Bill rose, racing toward the shelter of the undergrowth beyond the far end of the compound.

Up ahead, just past the end of the hut farthest to his right, he caught a glimpse of a narrow path half-hidden by overhanging shrubbery. He ran for it quickly, disappearing beneath the shelter of its branches. Panting, he paused, staring back toward the river.

Now the catamaran was dark no longer; sweeping forward from its back, the beam of a powerful spotlight fanned across the huddle of huts in search of the fugitive.

He started up along the narrow pathway that snaked through the underbrush covering the steeply slanted cliffside.

Panting, Bill clambered forward. The path was steep; he toiled upward, puffing and sweating with the intensity of his efforts.

Now a shell whistled behind him and burst against the side of the path below.

Turning, Bill glanced down past the flying chunks of debris and dirt. A large bush burst into flames. The river was red in the reflection of the flames and on its crimson surface a small boat bobbed, pulling away from the catamaran and moving toward the shore. Bill scowled, watching it approach the beach below.

They were sending a landing party!

Frantically, he labored up the path to the shelter of the trees surmounting the cliff top.

Now, from far below, Bill heard shouts rising over the roar of the flames.

He started forward again, eyes alert, seeking an opening through the trees ahead.

Then he saw it—the small wooden shed standing unobtrusively in the deeper shadows at his left.

He ran toward the entrance, his hand moving quickly toward the door.

To his relief it swung inward. He stumbled across the threshold. Then he halted, staring through the shadows of the shed’s interior. Piles of kindling surrounded him on three sides, leaving only a narrow space between as he closed the door. In the darkness he groped forward, reaching out to dislodge a length of cordwood at the right. Blindly he began to pile logs against the door, working feverishly to raise an improvised barrier.

Then, he huddled down in the darkness. There was nothing else he could do now except pray that somehow his hiding place would pass unnoticed once the landing party reached the top of the cliff.

For a long moment Bill crouched there, listening intently for a sound from beyond the barricaded door. The shelling had ceased and the distant crackle of flames diminished. Bill waited now for the sound of voices and footsteps to signal the landing party's approach.

Nothing stirred in the silence of the night beyond.

Bill felt a sudden surge of relief. Perhaps his escape route hadn't been discovered. Once the landing party searched the hillside and found nothing, it would return to the boat, leaving him here in safety.

Bill prayed silently. Let them go—go away and leave me in peace—

But now, suddenly, he heard the howling.

Rising through the night came the baying of hounds, and over it the shouts sounding directly before the door.

To his horror, he recognized familiar voices, whooping in triumph.

"We got him now!"

"Yippee! Let's bum him out!"

"No way—I want him alive. Hang on to them dogs until we get that door down!"

The Ku Klux Klan again!

But how could they be here?

Numb with bewilderment, frozen with fear, Bill listened as the door of the shed began to splinter beneath the blows of an axe blade.

He rose, reaching for a piece of cord wood from the pile at his right. But before his hand closed around it, the door crashed inward.

The Nazi soldiers grabbed Bill by the shoulder, knocking the wood from his hand, and pulled him out of the shed.

Nazis? How did they get here?

And where was he?

The cliff top and the burning village below had vanished. He was standing on cobblestones again, standing on the rain-swept platform of a railroad depot, in broad daylight, surrounded by uniformed men, his arms pinned behind his back. There were no hounds, no hooded figures. Struggling, he turned his head to catch a glimpse of the shed behind him. It too had changed; instead of huddling alone beneath the trees, it appeared to be attached to the side of the depot.

Now the soldier dragged him forward to confront the Nazi officer standing motionless on the platform in the driving rain.

Bill shouted at him. “Let me go!”

The officer’s voice rose in harsh command. Bill’s captors shoved him toward the depot wall.

Desperately, Bill jerked his head around, glancing back at the cordon of soldiers standing behind their leader. “What’s happening to me?” he panted.

The soldiers stood stiffly at attention, unmindful of the man, unmindful of his voice.

Bill closed his eyes. Maybe he was seeing things, hallucinating again. Yes, that had to be the answer; all this was imagination, and if he’d just get a grip on himself, it would go away. Easy does it now. Count to ten, take a deep breath, and when you open your eyes, you’ll be back in the shed again —

He started to inhale, but the breath burst from his body as he was slammed against the bricks of the depot wall.

Depot?

Bill’s eyes blinked open and the despairing realization came that nothing had changed; he was still here, his outstretched arms gripped by the soldiers. And now, advancing toward him through the rain, the Nazi officer reached into his jacket and dangled an object before him.

Bill stared at the piece of yellow cloth cut in the shape of a star—the Star of David.

Reaching out, the officer pinned the emblem on Bill’s chest. Turning, he nodded toward the squad of men standing at attention, rifle barrels gleaming in the rain. “Hier ist nur ein anderen.” He gestured toward Bill. “Stell ihn mit den anderen.”

As the squad started toward him, Bill lunged forward, breaking free from the grip of his captors on either side. “I’m an American citizen,” he panted. “Don’t you understand?”

One of the soldiers detached himself from the squad; without breaking his stride, he raised his rifle and clubbed Bill across the side of the head.

Dazed, Bill fell face forward on the wet cobblestones. Pain surged through him, but somehow he managed to find his voice again. “I won’t let you do this to me,” he murmured.

Clutching hands pulled him upright, dragged him across the depot platform. Opening his eyes, Bill stared at the long line of freight cars standing on the tracks. All of them were sealed shut except for the one directly before him. Guards stood beside it with rifles raised, their bayonets jabbing at the shadowy figures filling the doorway above.

Bill turned to the soldier on his left, eyes pleading. “No—please—You’re making a mistake—”

Suddenly he felt himself being lifted from behind. Thrust forward through the opened doorway, he landed heavily, lurching against the packed bodies of the other occupants. Someone grabbed his arm, helping him to regain his balance. Glancing around, he scanned the faces of his fellow prisoners. Some were young, some were old, but all bore identical looks of resignation and despair; and like himself, all wore the yellow star.

With a rumble, the sliding door of the freight car clanged shut. Cries of fear rose in response behind him.

As the train clanked forward, Bill collapsed against the side of the car, listening to the screams and wails of the helpless horde surrounding him, and the relentless clatter of the wheels against the tracks.

Bill knew where he was going now, knew what would happen when he got there, and yet somehow it didn’t matter. What happened to him wasn’t important.

He would die, the others would die, and in time the Nazis would die. It was all the same, both for victims and for victors. And it would always be the same until the day when hatred would die too. Bills lips moved in a silent prayer as the train rumbled into the twilight.

Bloom

The afternoon sun was just beginning to fade as Mr. Bloom walked through the doorway.

Miss Cox looked up from her seat behind the reception desk, then nodded briskly.

"Here we are!" She rose and moved forward with a smile of greeting that was as false as her teeth. "I've been expecting you all afternoon, Mr. Bloom."

"Sorry to be so late," Bloom said. "But how did you know who I am?"

Even as he spoke, he knew the answer. After all, he had given his name over the telephone when applying for admission and told her to expect him on Saturday afternoon. So when a man his age walked in carrying a suitcase, all she had to do was put two and two together. Or one and one. He wasn't very good at numbers, and besides, it didn't matter.

Neither did her reply, but he listened politely just the same.

"I formed a mental picture when we talked on the phone the other day," she said. "I find my intuitions seldom fail me in that regard." She stared at him quizzically, pale gray eyes narrowing behind the lenses of rimless spectacles. "You're a Pisces, aren't you?"

Bloom was definitely not a Pisces, but he shook his head in wonder. "Remarkable," he murmured. "Absolutely remarkable!"

Miss Cox's sallow cheeks flushed with pride. "Nothing to it," she declared. "Just a matter of practice and observation. Working in a retirement home like this, you see so many people come and go—"

She broke off hastily now, abruptly aware of the unfortunate connotation of her remark, but Bloom pretended he hadn't noticed.

"Enough of that," Miss Cox was saying. "Welcome to Sunneyvale!"

Raising her left wrist, she glanced down quickly at the watch that rested atop it. "My goodness, it is getting late! We'd better get you squared away before it's time for your din-din."

Turning, she started down the hall and Mr. Bloom fell into step beside her. An observer might have found them a curious combination: the tall bony woman in the nurse's uniform towering over the frail little old man at her side. The frail little old man was still carrying his suitcase; Miss Cox had not offered to relieve him of his burden.

As they moved down the hallway, Mr. Bloom glanced curiously through the open doorway on his left.

The room was large, large enough to contain half a dozen beds. Above each was a small shelf and against the opposite wall stood six identical plywood storage cabinets, apparently used to house wardrobes and personal belongings. Beside every bed was a single chair, only two of which were occupied.

"That's our ladies' dormitory," Miss Cox told him. "As you can see, we don't have a full house at the moment. There were four here until last week, when Mrs. Schanfarber passed away. And Mrs. Tomkins is in the infirmary now. Poor thing. Dr. Ryan looked in on her last night. Says she has viral pneumonia. Just between us, I'm afraid she isn't going to make it."

Bloom glanced at the two seated ladies, both of whom were eating dinner from trays set atop the small folding chairs before them.

One wore an elaborate housecoat trimmed with an overabundance of ribbons and lace. It was the sort of garment that might be chosen by a girl in her twenties who had just told a visiting boyfriend that she wanted to slip into something more comfortable. But this lady was at least fifty years removed from girlhood; although her white hair was curled tightly by the recent application of a home-permanent and her sunken cheeks had been heavily rouged, Bloom judged her to be well into her seventies.

"That's Mrs. Dempsey," the nurse told him. "She's a widow." Now her smile soured into disapproval as she gestured toward the long-haired white cat snuggling in Mrs. Dempsey's lap. "And that's Mickey," she said. "I keep telling her not to feed him from the table, but she doesn't pay any attention."

Bloom nodded, staring at the other occupant of the dormitory. She was a plump, neatly dressed woman with dark hair and a jolly expression; the hair was obviously a wig, but her smile was genuine.

Miss Cox followed his gaze. "That's Mrs. Weinstein. Would you believe it, she's over eighty and still going strong. Her husband is with us, too. Of course, he's in the men's dormitory. They spend a lot of time together, but we don't have a regular dining room here, so we prefer our residents to take their meals separately. You know how it is. If they all ate together, there'd be too much confusion. Besides, some of them are on special diets." A slight frown creased her forehead. "For example, the Weinsteins only eat Kosher. You can't imagine the trouble that makes in the kitchen."

Bloom nodded again, but listening to Miss Cox's remarks about the residents made him just a trifle uncomfortable; he felt like a visitor being taken on a guided tour of the zoo by the head keeper.

Now they moved along the hall to another open doorway at the right. He followed Miss Cox over the threshold and found himself in a room almost identical to the one that the women occupied.

"This is the men's dormitory," Miss Cox announced. "I've given you the first bed here, nearest the door. Weinstein likes the one next to the window—he's had it for years. Seniority rights, you know." She glanced along the row of empty beds. "Agee is next to Weinstein and then comes Conroy. And Mute in the one next to you."

Bloom stared down the row of empty beds. "Don't the men eat here?"

"Usually they do," Miss Cox said. "But seeing as this is Saturday, Weinstein and Agee are having dinner with Mute in the recreation room. They like to watch the game on television there. And Conroy is in the visitors' room with his son and daughter-in-law."

Bloom noticed that she referred to none of the men as “Mr.” Obviously Miss Cox was an ardent champion of Women’s Lib.

“Put your suitcase on the bed,” she told him. “You’ll find a place for your things in the wardrobe over there. As soon as you’ve unpacked, I’ll have Jose bring in a tray with your dinner.”

Bloom shook his head. “That won’t be necessary. I had a very late lunch. If you don’t mind, I’d just like to rest for a little while.”

“Suit yourself.” Miss Cox turned, moving toward the doorway. She halted there and glanced back. “I do hope you’ll be comfortable here. If you want to wash up, there’s a towel and a washcloth on the shelf in your wardrobe locker. The men’s bathroom is at the end of the hall. Now I’d better be getting back to my desk. If there’s anything else you need, let me know.”

Before he could reply, she exited quickly, leaving him alone in the room.

Mr. Bloom surveyed it with a rueful smile. Welcome to Sunneyvale.

His glance traveled across the narrow beds, each covered by a drab gray blanket; the exposed borders of the sheets and the single pillow were white, but they too had a grayish tinge, the product of too many washings and too little bleach. The late afternoon sun shown dimly through windows at the far end of the room, but its rays were not strong enough to dispel the shadows blurring the outline of the shelves above each bed, the woodened-back chair beside it, or the wardrobe cabinets on the opposite wall.

Everything seemed gray here, including the inmates.

Guests, Mr. Bloom corrected himself. All the residents were paying guests, courtesy of Social Security, Medicare, pensions, and savings. And as long as they paid, they stayed; stayed in their gray dormitory until a deeper darkness descended—the darkness of death. Sunneyvale was no different from the other retirement homes he’d seen; just another warehouse for senior citizens awaiting graduation into oblivion.

Bloom shrugged, then picked up his suitcase and carried it, unopened, to the wardrobe locker. Stooping, he set it down inside, then straightened and squared his shoulders. It was time to go.

The sun was already starting to disappear over the horizon beyond the wide picture windows as Bloom entered the recreation room.

Apparently both the football game and the dinner hour were over, because Mrs. Dempsey and Mrs. Weinstein were seated with the three men on the chairs and settee grouped before the television set. On-screen, an elderly gentleman with a shock of curly hair the color of cotton candy was grinning out at his unseen audience.

“Let me run through that again,” his vibrant voice resounded through the room. “Vitamin A for your scalp, vision, and teeth. Vitamin B for hair and healthy mucous membranes. Vitamin C for the teeth and circulatory system. Remember, C will help keep those lips from shrinking.”

Bloom glanced at the men. One was tall and thin, wearing scholarly horn-rims and a most unscholarly bathrobe; Bloom took a quick guess, deciding that he would be Mr. Mute, perhaps because his mouth was so tightly closed as he stared in stoic skepticism at the screen.

The one seated on the settee beside Mrs. Weinstein must be her husband, so the gentleman in the chair next to Mrs. Dempsey had to be Mr. Agee. At first glance he appeared to be quite handsome and well-preserved for his age; evidently he must have taken a good share of every vitamin in alphabetical order.

But Mr. Weinstein seemed to have neglected his ABCs. He was a bald-headed little man in his early eighties, his face shriveled, thin lips pursed in permanent disapproval of everything his long nose sniffed or his melancholy eyes surveyed.

Now those eyes glanced up at the newcomer, and the lips parted as Mr. Weinstein rose, nodding. “You must be Mr. Bloom, right?”

Bloom nodded. “And you are—?”

“Weinstein.” The bald-headed man gestured toward his seated companion. “This is my wife, Mrs. Winston.”

“Winston?” Bloom cast a puzzled glance as the plump woman in the dark wig rose and extended her hand in greeting.

“Weinstein,” she said. “Sadie Weinstein.” She smiled. “Don’t pay any attention to that husband of mine, Mr. Bloom. Our son Murray, he changed his name to Winston and my husband doesn’t approve.”

“What’s to approve?” Mr. Weinstein shook his head. “Just because he goes into politics he thinks he has to change his name to get ahead.”

“And why not?” his wife challenged. “You think maybe people in England would vote for somebody named Weinstein Churchill?”

“Don’t pay any attention to her.” Mr. Weinstein reached out and patted the plump arm of his spouse. “My wife is a closet goy.”

The other members of the group had risen; stepping forward, they introduced themselves in turn.

“Welcome aboard,” Mr. Agee said, his handclasp firm.

“So nice to have you with us.” Mrs. Dempsey fanned his face with a flutter of false eyelashes. “I hope you’ll like it here.”

“Pleased to meet you, Mr. Bloom.” A look of inquiry flashed from behind Mr. Mute’s horn-rims. “Your first name doesn’t happen to be Leopold, by any chance?”

Bloom smiled. “I’m afraid I can’t lay claim to such distinction,” he said. “I never had the privilege of meeting James Joyce, and I’m not a native of Dublin.”

“You’re from Minneapolis, aren’t you?” Mrs. Weinstein said. “I heard Miss Cox talking with you on the phone the other day—”

“You got big ears.” Her husband frowned his disapproval. “And Miss Cox has a big mouth.” He turned to Bloom and nodded. “Sit down, make yourself comfortable.”

“Thank you.” Bloom smiled, glancing toward the picture windows. “I’ll join you in a moment. If you don’t mind, right now I’d rather watch the sunset instead of television.”

“Feel free,” Mr. Mute told him. “Personally, I’d prefer to curl up with a good book—or a bad woman. Unfortunately, both seem to be in short supply around here.”

As he settled back down into his seat, the others followed suit, their eyes automatically returning to focus on the tube. The man with the cotton-candy hair was offering more words of wisdom to the world.

"And let's not forget E, the miracle vitamin. If you've enjoyed a healthy sex life, there's no reason why you can't keep on well into your golden years, thanks to a daily intake of Vitamin E . . ."

Golden years. Bloom moved to the nearest window, staring out into the sunset. It too was golden, but now its luster faded into gray gloom.

In the street beyond, a group of children were playing a game of kick-the-can, laughing and shouting in the gathering twilight. Bloom smiled appreciatively at the sight. The childhood years—these were truly golden.

Now his attention shifted to the driveway before the rest home's entrance. Here another group stood before a parked car—a stout, bearded man in his middle thirties, a blond woman around the same age, and an elderly gentleman who clutched a cardboard suitcase in one hand. Remembering what Miss Cox had told him, Bloom guessed the identities of the trio—Mr. Conroy, his son, and his daughter-in-law. He couldn't hear their conversation through the window but pantomime and body language offered an eloquence of their own. One picture is worth a thousand words —

The bulk of those words issued from Mr. Conroy's contorted mouth; words that pleaded, words that begged; and the suitcase told its own story.

"Take me home with you," the mouth implored. "Let me come just for the weekend" was the message of the small suitcase. "I promise I won't be in your way—"

The frown on the bearded face and the repeated shaking of the head adorned with brassy blond curls also translated easily into words: "Sorry, Pop. Not this time. We're all tied up for tonight and tomorrow we promised to take the kids to the beach." The daughter-in-law glanced at her watch, then looked up with a frown. It didn't require any talent in lip-reading to know what she was saying. "Look at the time, Joe! We really have to leave now." Mr. Conroy stepped back, shoulders sagging in surrender as his son and daughter-in-law settled themselves comfortably in the bucket seats of the shiny new Cadillac and closed the door with a big-car bang. His son started the engine, then pressed a button to roll down the automatic window and flash a smile of surpassing warmth and phoniness at his father. Again Bloom put words into the moving mouth: “Maybe next week, Pop. Okay?” The car glided down the driveway, turned left, then vanished from view. Mr. Conroy stood motionless for a moment, his eyes following its progress until he could see it no longer. The shadows gathering around the driveway were gray; second childhood has no golden years.

“Poor Leo!” Bloom started at the sound of the voice behind him. Turning, he saw Mr. Agee standing at his elbow, shaking his head.

“Every Saturday, Leo carries that suitcase out to his kid’s car and every Saturday he carries it back again and unpacks.”

“Don’t they ever let him come to visit?”

“Maybe once or twice a year, over the holidays. They do a lot of partying and entertaining—mostly for business, you know. His son’s in real estate.”

Mr. Bloom nodded. “I guessed as much when I saw him smile.”

Mr. Agee chuckled. “You’ve got quite a sense of humor, Mr. Bloom.”

Bloom didn’t reply; he was still staring out of the window, watching as the old man with a suitcase turned and started back up the driveway. As he did so, his shuffling feet encountered the tin can that the children were using in their game. For some reason it had been placed at the edge of the drive and now a small girl was running toward it hastily, ready to kick the can and be “safe” according to the rules of the game.

Either Mr. Conroy didn’t see her coming or else he didn’t give a damn. Noticing the can before him, he lashed out with his foot and sent it sailing across the lawn. Then he resumed his plodding progress up the drive.

Behind him the little girl grimaced in exasperation, then turned and ran toward the rolling can as a boy—obviously “it” in the game—emerged from the street to follow her in hot pursuit.

Reaching the rolling can, the girl kicked it with all her might, her mouth opening in a silent shout, which Bloom promptly mimicked.

"Alley-alley-oxen-free!"

All eyes turned from the television screen now and Bloom greeted their stares with a smile. "Sorry, I didn't mean to interrupt your program. I was just watching the kids outside—guess I must have let myself get carried away."

"Don't apologize," said Mr. Weinstein. "The kind of programs they got on tonight we can do without, believe me. 'Saturday Night Live,' 'Saturday Night Dead'—who needs it?"

Now there was another interruption in the form—two forms, really—of Mr. Conroy and Miss Cox, as they entered the room together, halting just inside the doorway.

Seeing the latest arrival standing at the window, Miss Cox called out to him. "Having fun, Mr. Bloom? Why don't you come over here for a moment. I'd like to introduce you to one of your roommates."

Bloom nodded and crossed toward her, wondering as he did so just how much fun Miss Cox imagined he might enjoy just by looking out the window. Perhaps she mistook him for a voyeur. And he hardly regarded the other male residents as roommates; the term would be more appropriate if applied to the youngsters in a boarding school. Unless, of course, Miss Cox was recycling it to do service in his second childhood.

Abruptly he put his thoughts aside to acknowledge her introduction.

"Mr. Conroy, this is Mr. Bloom, our new resident."

"Pleased to meet you," Mr. Conroy said. His attempt at a smile was not too successful, nor was his effort to shake hands, for as he raised his arm he realized that he was still clutching his suitcase by the handle.

"Here, let me take that." Miss Cox snatched the suitcase from his grasp. "I'll put it away for you. Why don't you just stay here now and get acquainted with our new arrival?"

She nodded at Bloom. "Mr. Conroy's first name is Leo," she told him, then paused, frowning slightly. "I'm sorry, but I can't seem to recall yours."

"Don't be sorry." Bloom smiled at her. "I haven't given you my first name."

"But I must have—"

Miss Cox broke off as the ring of a phone echoed from the hall. With a frown she hurried out, carrying Mr. Conroy's suitcase with her.

Bloom found himself surrounded by smiling faces.

"Good on you," Mr. Weinstein said. "That's telling her!"

The others nodded approvingly; only Mr. Conroy seemed upset and his scowl of irritation was directed at the picture window facing the street beyond. He moved toward it, peering out into the dusk.

"Dam kids," he muttered. "They've been told not to play around here. Old people need their rest."

Mrs. Dempsey spoke up. "But we can't even hear them, Mr. Conroy! Let the youngsters have their fun. I only wish I could go out there and play with them myself."

Bloom nodded. "Why don't you, Mrs. Dempsey?" he said softly.

She started to laugh, then broke off as Leo Conroy answered for her. "Because she's old, Mr. Bloom."

Bloom shook his head. "I don't think we're ever too old to play. When you rest, you rust."

A fluffy white pillow suddenly uncoiled on the arm of the chair where Mrs. Dempsey had been sitting. Bloom blinked, then recognized her cat.

Mrs. Dempsey went to pick it up. As she cradled it in her arms, the cat began to purr, and so did Mrs. Dempsey. "What's the matter, Mickey? Don't you like television?"

"What's to like?" Mr. Weinstein cast a sour glance at the screen, as a grinning, hyperactive game-show host fired an inane question at an equally inane contestant. "Why don't we turn it off? All this racket makes it so a fella can't think. I'd like a chance to get acquainted with Mr. Bloom here."

"Good idea." Mrs. Weinstein nodded approvingly at her spouse. "It's been a long time since I had a chance to schmooz with anybody new."

"Excellent!" said Mr. Mute. "The trouble with all these game-shows is that nobody loses except the viewers."

He moved to the set and switched it off.

As the tube went blank, the others took their seats again. Bloom followed Mr. Conroy to the far end of the semicircle of chairs and sat down between him and Mrs. Dempsey.

Mr. Conroy turned to him. “Is this your first time in an old-age home, Bloom?”

Bloom shook his head, conscious that everyone was waiting for an answer. “No. Actually, Mr. Conroy, I’ve been in six or eight of them.”

“Six or eight homes?” Mr. Conroy raised his bushy eyebrows. “That’s quite a record, Bloom. What’s your problem—can’t make any friends?” Mrs. Dempsey produced a sniff of indignation. “I think Mr. Bloom is a very friendly person! Which is more than I can say for some people around here.”

Bloom smiled at her. “Tell me, Mrs. Dempsey. If you could go out there with those children tonight, what would you want to play?”

Mrs. Dempsey stroked her cat. “I used to love all kinds of games. Especially jacks. I was the jacks champion in elementary school,” she announced proudly.

“Those were the good old days,” said Mr. Mute. “Kids don’t play jacks anymore. Now they’re only interested in jocks.”

Mrs. Dempsey uttered a surprisingly girlish giggle. “But you know, if I could still tell my body what to do, I would dance.”

Mr. Agee rose and crossed to her, extending his hand. “I would be honored to have this dance, Mrs. Dempsey.”

Mrs. Dempsey giggled again and started to rise, then winced in sudden pain and slumped back again.

“What’s the matter?” Mr. Agee bent over her solicitously.

“Just a shooting pain.” Mrs. Dempsey shook her head, embarrassed. “I think it’s my arthuritis.”

“Arthritis,” Mr. Weinstein corrected. “Since when do you go around calling diseases by their first name?”

Everyone laughed—everyone except Mr. Conroy. “Speak for yourself,” he said. “When you’ve got as many aches and pains as I have, you get to know them personally."

"Don't remind me." Mrs. Weinstein glanced at Bloom. "I would like to run again. What I wouldn't give to play jump rope once more."

Mr. Agee nodded. "What I wouldn't give to just be hitting puberty again!"

"Sex!" Mr. Conroy muttered. "Is that all you ever think about?"

"So what's wrong with thinking?" Mrs. Weinstein reached out and took her husband's hand. "Maybe that's one game I can't play anymore, but believe me, I've got some beautiful memories."

"Stop already." Mr. Weinstein squeezed her hand. "You've had a full life, sweetheart. Don't get sloppy on me now." Glancing down, he noticed his wife's shoes resting beside the settee and pointed at them. "Put those back on. A good Jew only goes barefoot when someone has died."

Mrs. Weinstein shrugged. "I'm not that orthodox."

"I am," Mr. Weinstein said firmly. "Put 'em on before you catch cold."

Bloom leaned forward to address him. "What were you like as a boy, Mr. Weinstein?"

"Me?" Mr. Weinstein smiled. "I loved to climb—anything you can name, I climbed it. Like a cat I could climb."

Mr. Agee chimed in, nodding. "I always wanted to be Douglas Fairbanks."

"You still do, Mr. Agee." Mrs. Dempsey giggled again.

"Did you know Douglas Fairbanks was half Jewish?" Mr. Weinstein said. "His real name was Ullman."

Mr. Agee ignored him, lost in the depth of fond recollection. "I broke more bedsprings by leaping from my dresser to the bed and out the window."

Again there was laughter from the group and again Mr. Conroy abstained. It was obvious he had no intention of joining them in this stroll down Memory Lane.

"Have it your way," he said. "Me, I like being old." He stared at the group defiantly. "And when I go, my son promised to have me frozen."

"You already are frozen, popsicle-head!" Mr. Weinstein declared. He started to laugh at his own joke, then began to cough. Mrs. Weinstein slapped him on the back.

"Watch it, Harry," she chided. "Remember your emphysema."

"She's right." Mr. Conroy nodded grimly. "Face the facts. We'd all be better off if we remember what we are today, instead of what happened sixty—seventy years ago."

But Mrs. Dempsey ignored him. As the coughing spell ended, she glanced at Bloom. "What about you?" she asked. "What did you play?"

Bloom smiled. "Kick-the-can was my game."

"That was mostly for boys," Mrs. Dempsey said. "My late husband, Jack Dempsey—not the fighter, Mr. Bloom—Jack Dempsey was the most gentle man who ever walked this earth—he loved that game." Mr. Conroy fidgeted in his chair. "What's the point of all this talk? Why are you dredging up the past, Bloom? This isn't healthy."

But Mrs. Dempsey ignored him. "Like I was saying, Mr. Bloom, he just loved that game. His mother would bean him if she caught him playing. Ruined his shoes, she said."

"Marbles." Mr. Weinstein nodded', taking a ride on his own train of recollections. "There was a game for you!"

"Do you still remember what those marbles were called?" Mr. Agee asked.

Mr. Weinstein gestured quickly. "Don't say it—I'm thinking. Agates. Purees. And laggars—" Mrs. Dempsey sighed. "It was so nice, being a child. There was nothing to worry about because people always took care of me."

"They take care of you here." Mr. Conroy offered a smile dipped in vinegar. "Miss Cox takes great care of you, doesn't let you do a thing."

Mrs. Dempsey wasn't listening. "I had lots of friends and ever so many toys—"

"Toys?" Mr. Conroy's voice rose, insistent upon her attention. "They've got toys here that will last you for the rest of your life. Oxygen tanks, respirators, bedpans, the whole works." There was vinegar in his voice now. "You want friends? Mr. Bloom here is trying to make friends—trying to stir them all up, aren't you, Bloom?"

Frowning, Mr. Mute attempted a diversion. He leaned forward quickly, addressing Mr. Weinstein. "What were the clay marbles called, Harry?"

For a moment Mr. Weinstein sat silent. So did the others, as the impact of Mr. Conroy's words hit home.

Mr. Agee tried again. "Well, Harry?"

Mr. Weinstein shrugged his shoulders and expelled a sigh of misery. "I don't know. I can't remember anymore."

Bloom leaned forward. "Sure you can," he said. "The clays ones were emis."

"That's right." Mr. Weinstein looked up, nodding gratefully. "Emis. Now I remember!" He smiled. "Thank you, Bloom, you're a real mensch."

Bloom glanced thoughtfully at the semicircle of faces, capturing their attention as he spoke. "The day we stopped playing is the day we started getting old. We started watching clocks, watching for the days to hurry up and end, counting weeks and months and years as if they would last forever. We never realized our time would run out, and that's where we made our mistake."

He nodded slowly. "We never should have started counting, never been in such a hurry to grow up, because once the counting begins, it never stops. The clock keeps right on going, ticking your life away. But when we played, we weren't worried about time. We always had something else to look forward to—another chance to hide, another turn at bat, another game of kick-the-can—"

He halted, eyes searching their faces in the silence. "So who's playing?"

Mr. Weinstein blinked at him, startled. "What?" Bloom smiled. "I'm starting up a game of kick-the-can! Who's playing?"

Mr. Conroy shook his head. "When's the last time you fell down and couldn't get up by yourself, pal? How dare you ask anybody to go out there and risk the little bit of life they have left in them!"

"All life is a risk, Mr. Conroy. I'm not asking anybody to do what I'm not willing to do. But maybe if we played, we might get a hold on that thing we're all missing—a little hold on youth." Mr. Conroy gestured contemptuously toward his companions. "Look at them," he muttered. "Their bones will break if they try to run. Their hearts are old. Their lungs are old."

Mrs. Dempsey glanced up timidly. "Miss Cox would never allow us to go outside and play, Mr. Bloom. It's against the rules."

"Rules!" Mr. Bloom shook his head. "Did you ever try to stop a child? Are you going to let rules stop you from the chance of being young again?"

Now Bloom reached into his jacket pocket. When it emerged he was holding an object that brought startled gasps from the semicircle.

Resting against the palm of his hand was a tin can.

Ignoring their stares, ignoring their exclamations of surprise, he reached into his pocket again. Pulling out a handkerchief he began to polish the surface of the empty can.

It was only then that he glanced up, nodding. "This old man still has a little magic left in him. If you believe, I think I can promise to make you feel like children again."

Mr. Conroy snickered. "You're making promises that they can't keep, Bloom."

Bloom didn't reply; he was already turning to the others. "I want to see you dance, Mrs. Dempsey. And you, Mr. Weinstein—how would you like to be able to climb again?"

Mr. Weinstein nodded. "Like a cat I could climb."

Bloom rose. "Let's break the rules. What can they take away from us that we haven't already lost?"

As his challenge echoed, it was greeted with a quick exchange of glances, followed by a hushed, expectant silence.

"Well, what do you say?" Mr. Bloom nodded. "Don't waste time, or time will waste you."

Mr. Agee cleared his throat. “When were you thinking of playing?” he asked.

Bloom held up the tin can, its polished surface gleaming beneath the light.

“Tonight,” he said.

Again the exchange of glances—again the hush of anticipation.

Mr. Weinstein glanced toward the window; the street beyond was almost invisible in the darkness. “You mean right now?” He shook his head sadly. “If Miss Cox should see us, she’ll lock us up and throw the key away.”

“That’s not the game plan,” Bloom told him. “What I suggest is that we all go to bed until midnight. Then, after we make sure Miss Cox is sound asleep, we can tiptoe out—”

“Marvelous!” Mrs. Weinstein clapped her hands.

Mr. Mute was nodding. “I agree! Just thinking about it is enough to make my skin tingle!”

Mr. Weinstein shook his head. “Remember what it says in the Talmud,” he murmured. “Nobody loves a smart-guy.”

Now he turned, joining his wife, Mrs. Dempsey, and Mr. Agee as they stood clustered before Bloom.

There was an almost palpable excitement radiating through the room. Mr. Mute stepped up behind him, reaching out to touch the tin can with tingling fingers.

“You’re not putting us on, Mr. Bloom?” he said. “Do you really think we can get away with it without being caught?”

“Not a chance!”

Mr. Conroy’s voice was scornful. He sat stubbornly in his chair, shaking his head as they turned to stare at him. “I’ve got five bucks that says none of you old crocks can still keep your eyes open after ten o’clock!”

Bloom smiled. “Don’t worry about that—I’m a regular night owl.” He turned his attention to the group before him. “Why don’t you all try to sleep for a few hours? When the time comes, I’ll drop around and let you know.”

Mr. Conroy grunted. “Don’t bother to wake me up,” he said. “I may be old, but I’m not senile enough to crawl out of bed in the middle of the night just to play some fool kid’s game.”

For a moment the group’s decision wavered in the balance. Then Mr. Mute nodded at Bloom. “See you later,” he said. Turning, he gestured to his fellow resident.

“Let’s go,” he murmured. “It’s time for all of us fools to get some rest before the game.”

Mr. Conroy sat alone in the recreation room, watching the ten o’clock news. He always watched the news before going to bed and he wasn’t going to miss it now just because of this nonsense tonight.

He still didn’t understand how the others could fall for such foolishness. They ought to act their age. If those idiots thought that playing some kid’s game at midnight would make them feel young again, then maybe they’d have to learn the hard way. Nobody can turn the clock back. It was just wishful thinking. They wanted youth, but all they would get out of this was a broken hip, a stroke, maybe a heart attack.

The whole idea was crazy. They must be crazy, too—listening to somebody like Bloom—because he was the craziest of them all.

For a moment he wondered if he ought to inform Miss Cox that she was harboring a lunatic under her roof. Then he dismissed the notion with a shrug. Why should he do her any favors? Let her find out the hard way, too. What anyone else did was their business.

His business was to watch the news so that he could be sure of getting a good night’s sleep. Other people counted sheep, but Mr. Conroy had found a method of his own. He watched the news and kept count of the day’s events.

Listening to the commentator, he made a tally on his mental score-card: three murders . . . two rapes . . . six muggings . . . one armed robbery . . . one tornado, one explosion, several floods and famines . . . three fires, two of which were obviously arson . . . plus, as a final bonus, four wars and a revolutionary uprising.

Not bad for one evening; just thinking about what went on in the outside world was enough to make you welcome sleep.

Satisfied, Mr. Conroy rose, switched off the television, and shuffled down the hall.

When he reached the dormitory, he was greeted by the snores of his fellow residents. Quietly, he undressed in darkness so as not to disturb them. The only sound rising above the even snores was a faint plop as he dropped his teeth into a glass of water on the shelf above his bed. Then he scrunched down beneath the covers and in a matter of moments his own snore joined the chorus.

It had not been easy for Mr. Weinstein to fall asleep. Usually he went out like a light the moment his head touched the pillow, but tonight was different. So much had happened and there was so much to think about.

Of course, this fella Bloom was a meshuganah, but it didn't matter. Not for one minute could Mr. Weinstein believe that climbing out of his nice warm bed to play kick-the-can in the middle of the night was going to make anyone feel young again; for people his age the Fountain of Youth had been turned off long ago. But at least he was willing to go along with the idea, if only to break the monotony. Maybe Bloom was a genuine eighteen-carat nutzo, but at least he was bringing them a little action, giving them something new to think about, opening the windows and letting in a little fresh air.

So what if Bloom couldn't really make them young again? Maybe just doing something different would make them feel younger for a little while, help take away the boredom.

That was the worst part of getting old, Mr. Weinstein decided. You got used to being bored, used to just sitting all day while the world changed. After a while you didn't even notice the changes anymore; then all of a sudden you looked around and everything was different. Now all the boys were named David and all the girls were Jennifers.

But one thing didn't change: kids still had their youth, their strength, their health; and Mr. Weinstein envied them for that. As for him, all he had was a bad heart—and poor Sadie, complaining about her back pains. Funny; everybody seems to complain about back pains and nobody even mentions front pains. Go figure that one out. Mr. Weinstein was still figuring as he fell asleep.

In the women's dormitory, Mrs. Dempsey was already sleeping with Mickey curled up beside her pillow. In her dream the white cat suddenly turned into her husband Jack, and Mrs. Dempsey snuggled up with him. Somewhere along the line Jack Dempsey turned into Clark Gable, but Mrs. Dempsey didn't mind.

Mr. Agee wasn't dreaming about a movie star in his dream. He was the star himself. A handsome, dashing Douglas Fairbanks, he slashed a villain's face with the Z of Zorro, crossed swords with the Three Musketeers, rode the magic carpet over Baghdad, and swung through the trees of Sherwood Forest with all the ease and grace of Robin Hood. . . .

* * *

Mrs. Weinstein stirred restlessly. If Miss Cox would only give her a room of her own where she and Harry could sleep in the same bed, maybe things would be different. Not that there would be any fooling around—nobody fools around at her age, no matter how many vitamins they take. But at least the two of them could be together, just like they had been for all those years before.

No, suppose Harry were here—what difference would it make? They probably wouldn't even talk; the way she felt now, all she wanted to do was sleep. Face wooden, limbs stiff, Mrs. Weinstein slept like a log.

Mr. Mute fell asleep thinking about mole rats. Somewhere recently he'd run across a reference to these curious creatures, either in his reading or else while watching one of those nature documentaries on television. And now, strangely enough, they came scampering through his thoughts, burrowing into his brain the way they burrowed through the sun-baked earth below the savanna grasslands of East Africa. There, in the warm darkness, they nestled in a tangled drove, venturing forth only to bring food into the pitch-black confines where they lived out their entire existence in half-blind hunger.

Miserable creatures, leading a miserable life. But just how different was it from his own existence here at Sunneyvale? Crowded together in the confines of the so-called recreation room, sitting and staring half-blindly at the television tube, redigesting memories of the past, shut away from the world beyond?

Mr. Mute was still pondering the question as, like a mole rat, he burrowed down into the darkness of slumber.

Miss Cox was asleep, too. Bloom looked in on her for a moment, gently easing open the door of the bedroom at the far end of the hall. The bedside lamp was still burning; she must have dozed off while reading, for a paperback romance rested beside her, its gaudy cover-art displaying the standard frightened heroine fleeing from the conventional Gothic mansion with the inevitable darkhaired and mustachioed hero staring after her.

Such stuff as dreams are made of. Bloom smiled and closed the door. Then he turned and walked softly down the hall.

It was exactly midnight when he entered the men's dormitory and moved in semidarkness to Mr. Mute's bedside. Bending down, he shook him gently by the shoulder.

“It’s time, Mr. Mute,” he whispered.

Mr. Mute opened his eyes and sat up, throwing back his covers. He was fully clothed; the discarded bathrobe rested on the chair beside him.

Bloom stared at him approvingly. “I see you’re dressed for the occasion,” he murmured. “What about the others?”

Mr. Mute nodded. “They all went to bed with their clothes on, at my suggestion.” He glanced toward the sleeping forms in the beds beside him. “All but Conroy. He must have come in later, but I see he’s wearing his pajamas.”

“Try not to disturb him,” Bloom said. “Now, if you’ll just wake the others, I’ll go down the hall and see if the ladies are ready. We’ll meet outside on the back lawn. I’ve been scouting around for a good place and that seems to be the safest.”

“Excellent.” Mr. Mute reached for his glasses on the shelf above the bed. “See you in a few minutes.”

When Bloom stepped out onto the back lawn, he found the others already waiting. Carrying the tin can, he moved to the center of the greensward, beckoning the others to follow him.

“All set?” he asked.

“Ready to go.” Mr. Agee winked at Mrs. Dempsey.

She nodded, cradling the cat against her shoulder.

Mr. Weinstein shrugged. “I feel like a schlemiel,” he murmured. “But what have I got to lose?”

“Right,” said Bloom. “Here we go.” He tossed the can into the air.

As it whirled down in a shimmering spiral the old people ran for cover, finding hiding-places in the hedge and shrubbery that bordered the lawn on three sides.

Bloom stared down at the can; then, in a loud voice, he slowly counted to ten.

Turning, he moved over the bordering hedge at his right and began to search for the other players.

Behind his back they were already sneaking forward one by one, emerging from their various hiding places to kick the can.

When Bloom looked toward the center of the lawn again, he was greeted with giggles and laughter.

“Fooled you this time!” Mrs. Dempsey cried.

“So you did.” Bloom nodded. “Looks like I’m it again.”

He tossed the can. The old folks ran. Bloom counted, and above him the full moon turned the night to silver.

In the dormitory, Mr. Conroy tossed and turned restlessly. Through his slumber the voices of the old people on the lawn filtered faintly. But as their play continued, the sound of their shouts and laughters began to change. Now the shrill tones echoed like the voices of children. “Alley-alley-oxen-free!” someone shouted.

“Dam kids—” Mumbling in his sleep, Mr. Conroy buried his head beneath the pillow.

On the lawn under the full moon, a small red-haired boy pranced joyfully, flapping the sleeves and trouser bottoms of Mr. Mute’s suit.

“Kids!” he cried.

And kids they were—each and every one of them. Laughing children, clad in the outsized outfits of Harry and Sadie Weinstein, Mr. Agee, and Mrs. Dempsey. Mrs. Dempsey was still holding her cat, but it was a kitten now.

Mr. Weinstein glanced at the cute little girl beside him. “Sadie?”

She nodded in delight. “Is that you, Harry?” Reaching out, she gave his cheek a pinch. “Such a little maeskite!”

Young Mr. Mute clapped his hands exuberantly. “Kids!” he shouted again. “Look at us—it’s really happened!”

Rolling up his trouser bottoms, a boyish Mr. Agee glanced toward Bloom, who had seated himself on a bench near the back door.

“Mr. Bloom—are you all right?”

Bloom nodded. “Certainly.”

Little Mrs. Dempsey turned and stared. “But you’re still old!”

“Am I? I never thought of it that way.” He gestured. “Don’t worry about me—just enjoy yourselves.”

Mr. Weinstein glanced down and shook his head. “Oy gevalt, look how short I am!”

“Never mind,” Bloom told him. “You want to play, you have to keep playing.”

And play they did, fulfilling the fantasies of youth under the full moon.

Mrs. Weinstein and Mrs. Dempsey danced together, two doll-like figures twirling in the moonlight.

Mr. Agee began a fencing match with an imaginary opponent. Forcing his invincible foe back, he leaped onto the bench on which Bloom was sitting, giving him just enough time to rise before the bench tipped over. Landing on his feet with Fairbanksian grace, he continued his sword fight until he reached the dancing girls. Halting his duel, he winked at Mrs. Dempsey. “Dance with me!” he cried.

Mrs. Dempsey moved into his arms immediately. He grabbed her close and tried to kiss her.

She struggled free shaking her head. “Oh, no, Mr. Agee—stay away from me!”

“Okay.” Mr. Agee grinned, then turned and reached out to embrace Mrs. Weinstein.

“No!” She shook her head. “Dirty old man!”

“Not anymore!” Mr. Agee lunged for her again. Still resisting, she turned and called over her shoulder. “Harry! Where are you?”

Mr. Weinstein swung into view from the overhanging limb of a tall tree, dangling by one arm. He shouted, “Agee, get away from my wife!”

As Agee released her, Mrs. Weinstein turned and glanced anxiously at her husband. “Harry—your heart—”

Mr. Weinstein laughed. “My heart? Are you kidding?” Swinging from the limb, he let out a Tarzan yell.

Clothes flying, little Mr. Mute somersaulted across the lawn and came to a stop at Bloom’s feet. At the same moment Mr. Agee leaped to a halt beside him.

“Look,” he said. “I don’t wish to appear ungrateful, but why don’t you join us?”

Bloom shrugged. “I find I prefer to be my true age and try to keep my mind young.” His nod included the others as they approached. “But your wish has come true. You’re children again. You have your whole lives before you.”

A most unboyish frown creased Mr. Mute’s forehead. “My life was so hard,” he murmured.

“I had a swell life,” Mr. Agee said. “I can do sixty years more standing on my head.”

“So who wants to live upside down?” Mr. Weinstein smiled. “Me, I was just beginning to look forward to senility.”

His wife shivered in the breeze rising from beyond the hedge. “I’m cold. Where are we going to spend the night? Where can we go? Who’ll take care of us?”

Mr. Weinstein put his arms around her. “No problem,” he said. “We’ll just knock on our son’s door and say, ‘Let us in, Murray, we’re your parents.’ Don’t worry—you know how he loves kids.”

Mrs. Weinstein sighed. “I love you, Harry, but I don’t want to go back and do it all over again.”

“Now wait a minute,” Mr. Agee said. “Let’s think this over. There’s a lot to look forward to.”

Mrs. Dempsey was dismayed. “Jack Dempsey isn’t here. I’ll never meet him—” As she spoke, she glanced down at her hand. Then cried out, “My ring! My wedding ring. It fell off!”

Dropping to her knees, she began to search the lawn. The others came to her aid.

Hands scrabbling desperately through the grass, Mrs. Dempsey shook her head. “I didn’t really ask to be young again, all I wanted to do was dance! I can be old and dance.”

Beside her Mr. Mute nodded. “I’m not going to school again,” he declared.

“School is easy,” Mr. Weinstein said. “But work another forty years? Forget it!” Now he noticed that his wife was barefooted again. Pointing at oversized shoes lying discarded near the bench, he issued his orders. “Put ’em on. Nobody died here!”

Mrs. Weinstein obeyed, but the mention of death brought a look of sadness to her girlish face. “I don’t want to lose the people I love again, one by one. I remember the night my father passed away. They laid him out and then they sent all us children outside. We saw Halley’s Comet.”

“I was too young to see Halley’s Comet,” Mrs. Dempsey told her. “I was going to see it when I was eighty years old.”

Bloom spoke gently. “That’s only two more birthdays, Mrs. Dempsey. Would you like to see it at eight, or at eighty?”

Mrs. Dempsey reached down and lifted her kitten from the lawn. “Eighty,” she murmured.

Bloom nodded, then extended his hand. “Look—I seem to have found your ring.”

Smiling gratefully, Mrs. Dempsey slid the large loop onto a small finger. “I’ll still have this,” she said, “and all the memories that go with it.”

“Me too,” said Mrs. Weinstein. “In spite of everything, I’m satisfied with my life the way it was. We should take one day at a time.”

“I agree,” her husband said. “What we got to do is try to make those days a little better.”

Bloom smiled. “In that case, let’s all go back to bed. Maybe you could wake up in your old bodies again, but with fresh young minds.”

Picking up the tin can, he moved to the back door and the group trailed after him—children following the Pied Piper.

Only Mr. Agee seemed reluctant. “Can’t we discuss it? I’m not tired yet!”

“You can’t go on like this forever,” said Mr. Weinstein. “It’s fun for a while, but who wants to spend the rest of their lives playing kick-the-can?” Bloom opened the door and gestured. “In you go,” he whispered. “And remember—no noise.” They stepped past him into the hall one by one, tiptoeing quietly. Mr. Mute brought up the rear and as he reached the doorway he paused and glanced up at the tin can Bloom was holding in his hand. “One question,” he murmured. “I still don’t see how you did it. Is there some kind of magical property in that can?”

“Not really.” Bloom tossed the can away, sailing it through the moonlight to land in the shadows beyond. He smiled.

“The magic is in yourselves.”

Mr. Conroy was still asleep when his fellow residents moved into the dormitory. It was only the whispering in the hall outside that awakened him.

“But I’m not ready to go back. I want to stay like this!”

Conroy didn’t identify Mr. Agee’s childish treble, but he recognized Bloom as he replied. “That’s up to you. Are you quite sure—?”

“Positive.”

“So be it, then,” said Bloom. “But you’d better get back into bed anyway, before somebody sees you here in the hall.”

It was then that Mr. Conroy opened his eyes, just in time to see Bloom enter, followed by little Mr. Agee. The sight of the child in his oversized garments was enough to bring Mr. Conroy bolt-upright against the back of his bed. Turning, he glanced along the row at the diminutive heads of Mr. Mute and Mr. Weinstein already nestling on their pillows.

“I don’t believe it!” said Mr. Conroy.

Ignoring the restraining wave of Bloom’s hand, he jumped out of bed and raced out into the hall.

The door to the men’s dormitory was closed when Mr. Conroy returned. Miss Cox, clad in a frilly negligee, stumbled behind him.

“It wasn’t a dream—I saw them!” Mr. Conroy’s voice echoed through the corridor. “Kids! Kids in the beds!”

Miss Cox shook her head in disbelief until her curlers rattled. Sighing, she opened the door and peered inside.

Mr. Mute, Mr. Weinstein, and Bloom lay sound asleep, their lined, familiar faces pressed against the pillows. Mr. Agee’s bed was also occupied, although he’d pulled the covers up over his head.

Now Mr. Conroy quailed before Miss Cox’s accusing stare.

“But they were kids!” he faltered.

“You had a nightmare.” Miss Cox’s voice softened into weary resignation as she took the old man by his arm. “Come on, back to bed with you.”

She led Mr. Conroy into the room, and it was then that Mr. Agee’s bed erupted.

With a whirl of scattering blankets, young Mr. Agee bounded upward. Using the bed as a trampoline, he bounced up and down upon it, then jumped to the windowsill in a leap that would have made Douglas Fairbanks proud of him.

Raising the window, he turned and nodded at Miss Cox.

“Welcome to Sherwood Forest, m’lady!” He grinned at Mr. Conroy. “How now, Sir Guy, no greetings from you?”

Mr. Conroy stared in shock, but Miss Cox’s anger found a voice. “What are you doing in here, you little ragamuffin? How dare you—”

“Rest assured that Robin Hood has nothing but the most peaceable intentions,” Mr. Agee cried.

Now the others were sitting up in bed, watching as Mr. Conroy staggered toward the child poised on the windowsill. There was no hint of shock or skepticism in his face, only a bitter yearning. “Me too,” he whispered hoarsely. “Take me with you.”

Mr. Agee’s helpless glance fastened on Bloom, who smiled sadly, then shook his head.

Mr. Agee stared down at the old man. “It’s too late, Leo. You’ll have to stay with yourself.”

Miss Cox marched toward the windowsill, fury in her face. As she reached out to the small figure crouching there, Mr. Agee turned and grabbed at a tree branch bobbing just beyond the opening. “Up and away!” he shouted.

Then, with a swoop, he disappeared into the night.

Bloom smiled. So did all the others, even Mr. Conroy.

All the others, that is, except Miss Cox.

She had fainted.

The sun was shining on Sunneyvale once again, shining on the front lawn where its residents had gathered.

From a truck in the driveway, several young men unloaded plants and rose bushes, planting them in place along the spaded borders on either sides.

Mr. Mute nodded approvingly to his companions. “We’ll have the garden out in back,” he said. “Let’s put tomatoes along the fence and maybe some squash and those red poppies, the ones that open in the mornings.”

He turned as Mrs. Dempsey crossed the lawn to the group, carrying a picnic basket. “I packed a lunch for us,” she announced. “We can take a taxi to the lake.” She glanced down toward the white cat prowling at her feet. “I’ve promised Mickey a look at that lake for years now.”

Mrs. Weinstein smiled. “Let’s ask Mr. Conroy. He can bring his grandchild. Kids love water.”

From the open doorway of the entrance behind them a wailing voice arose: “Mr. Agee? Mr. Agee? Has anyone seen Mr. Agee?”

Mr. Weinstein shrugged. “I’ll bet he’s at the ball game!”

“Or the movies,” Mrs. Weinstein said.

Mrs. Dempsey nodded. “Definitely at the movies. Probably one of those Kung-Fu pictures.”

The old people laughed, their voices rising and clear in the afternoon sunlight.

Hearing them, Bloom nodded. Standing inside the men’s dormitory he finished packing his tattered suitcase, then picked it up and carried it down the hall to the back exit. Moving into the yard, he saw Mr. Conroy playfully kicking the old tin can across the grass, too absorbed to notice as Bloom hurried past him into the alleyway beyond.

Only when Miss Cox’s voice rose from within the residence did Mr. Conroy look up.

“Mr. Agee, Mr. Agee—where are you?”

Mr. Conroy smiled to himself. “Wherever he is, you won’t find him.”

Bloom turned and started down the alleyway unnoticed. The last thing he heard was the sound of Mr. Conroy at play, happily kicking the can.

Bloom walked down the street, suitcase in hand. He’d been walking a long time, for the sun was already setting, but now he reached his destination. Pausing beside an iron gate in a high stone wall, he peered through the bars at a wooden sign set before the sprawling structure beyond, reading the lettering—Driftwood Convalescent Home.

He opened the gate; it creaked behind him as he walked down the driveway to where a woman with a nurse’s uniform stood waiting in the front doorway.

“Mr. Bloom?” she said.

He nodded.

“Good, we’ve been expecting you.” She turned and entered, leading Bloom down the hall and into a large room at one side. Halting near the doorway, she nodded at Bloom, her voice rising through the somber silence. “Excuse me, ladies and gentlemen. Our new guest has arrived.”

Bloom stared at a dreary roomful of old people seated in the shadows. As they looked up, he glanced past them, staring through the picture window beyond. Then he smiled and stepped forward.

Outside, twilight was falling. . . .

Helen

The lights in the room were just a little too dim for proper vision, but Mama didn't care. The music was a trifle soft for anyone who might be a bit hard of hearing, but Mama didn't care about that either. Most people disliked being stared at by strangers, but this didn't bother Mama at all.

Because Mama was dead.

Mama was dead, and nothing in the world would ever bother her again. She wasn't concerned about the clumsy fashion in which the mortician had arranged her hair or about his overzealous application of makeup to her sunken cheeks. As a matter of fact, her cheeks weren't sunken anymore; they had been carefully filled out with cotton stuffed inside her mouth, and two little wires were placed just inside the comers of her lips, fixing them in a permanently peaceful smile.

Mama was not disturbed by the sickly scent of floral bouquets already wilting in the heat of the stuffy Slumber Room. She wasn't worried about the cost of the overpriced casket in which she rested, nor was she wondering just how it would be paid for.

Mama's troubles were over, and for a moment Helen almost envied her.

No more problems, no more tears; these were for the living. Standing beside the open casket, Helen Foley glanced up at her sister Vivian.

It was Vivian who shed the tears. And as usual, Helen was left to confront the problems.

It had always been that way, ever since Helen could remember. Vivian was the beauty of the family, the little charmer, and when her pretty face was marred by teardrops, Mama did everything in her power to comfort the poor darling and make her happy again. Helen wasn't really homely, but she lacked her sister's charisma.

"Looks aren't everything," Mama used to say. "Maybe you're not exactly beautiful, but you've got a good brain. Just use it and everything will be all right. You'll see."

So Vivian smiled and pouted her way through life, short on skills but relying on long eyelashes and girlish ways to win her permanent security—a loyal and loving husband, two adorable children, a good home, and a circle of admiring friends.

Helen took Mama's advice to heart. She used her brains, studied hard. Vivian had been the Prom Queen but it was Helen who graduated at the head of the class and went on to a teaching career.

And here she was, ten years later; with any luck she could continue teaching right up until the day when she would join Mama forever in the family plot at Rose Hill Cemetery. So much for brains and Mama's counsel.

For a moment Helen gazed down at her mother's face, feeling the old anger rise within her. Then she sighed softly.

No sense resenting Mama's advice; it was she herself who was to be blamed for taking it, and it was too late to change matters now. Vivian would continue to cry to be comforted, poor little thing; Helen would go on coping, facing each problem as it arose and solving all of them except her own.

Last week, when Mama died after the operation, Vivian had hysterics and took to her bed, surrounded by her family and comforted by their concern. It was Helen who had to come running to the rescue', go through the grim business of filling out the forms, making the funeral arrangements, handling details and down payments. After all, isn't that what brains are for?

Helen sighed again. Mama couldn't help her now, but neither could self-pity. No sense dwelling on the past; it was time to think of the future and she had already made up her mind.

Vivian glanced up, her sobs subsiding. “I suppose you’ll be leaving,” she said.

Helen nodded. “Right after the funeral. No reason to stay, now that Mama’s gone.”

“You really mean that, don’t you?” Vivian seemed perplexed, rather than concerned. “What about your job?”

“It doesn’t matter. I don’t even feel like a teacher anymore. I’ve got nothing left to give those kids that means anything.”

Helen answered without premeditation, but as she spoke she realized the truth of her words. “I’m running on empty, Viv. I’ve got to make the break now. I stayed in town as long as Mama needed me, but I can’t go on here in the same old rut forever. I feel all used up inside.”

“I know what you mean,” Vivian said. But from the way her mouth tightened, Helen knew she didn’t understand. “It’s just that you don’t seem to realize you’ll be leaving your whole life behind you.”

Helen nodded. “I do realize it.” She paused. “That’s exactly the reason I’m going.”

Vivian stared at her in concern. Self-concern, of course; it was the only kind she knew. “But if you go, what about me?”

“You have your own life—Jim and the kids. That’s not what I thought I wanted, remember?”

“I remember.” Vivian dabbed at her eyes with a handkerchief. “So what is it you think you want now?”

“I wish I knew.”

Helen hesitated for a moment, listening to the soft strings of the piped-in organ music, the familiar melody that seemed to haunt the halls of every funeral parlor. She and Vivian had probably heard it a hundred times before and the way each of them identified it probably defined the difference between them. Vivian knew the melody simply as a song “Going Home.” Helen recognized it as the Largo from Dvorak’s New World. To be more precise, his Ninth Symphony in E, Opus Ninety-Five. Yes, that was the real difference between the two of them. All those years of learning left her a single legacy—a brain full of trivia, which nobody, including grubby students, cared about, while empty-headed Vivian ended up with everything she'd always wanted, everything she needed for the good life as it was lived in suburbia.

"Sorry, Viv," she said. "I guess I'm not sure myself about what I really want. But I know it's not here, not in Homewood. Not for me."

"Well, if you've made up your mind—" Vivian shrugged, her voice softening. "I just thought maybe I could talk you out of it."

Helen shook her head. "Not this time."

"I only hope you know where you're going." Vivian sighed again, then brightened. "Listen to what they're playing," she said. "I always liked that piece. What did they call it?" She smiled. "Oh, I remember now—it's 'Going Home'."

So that was that.

Once the funeral ended, everybody was going home; Vivian to her family, Mama to heaven, granted there was such a place to go. And now Helen was alone. Only she and Thomas Wolfe seemed to realize that you can't go home again.

She drove along in the afternoon sunlight, music blaring from her car radio. Punk rock, of course; Dvorak was strictly for funeral parlors nowadays. "Slumber Room"—how she hated the hypocritical euphemism! But maybe that was the correct designation for one of the few places left in the world where one could take refuge in the soothing solace of sleep, undisturbed by the ceaseless clamor of savage sound. What kind of sacred music would they be playing when today's children were laid to rest?

Helen leaned forward, switching off the music. Hearing it only evoked an unpleasant recollection of the life she fled from; memories of classrooms filled with rebellious youngsters moving to the beat of a different drum, the twang of guitars, the screech of voices raised in dissonant defiance.

They were all alike today, or so it seemed; underprivileged kids from broken families that gave them too little and overprivileged kids from broken families that gave them too much. But like herself, they seemed to have found no home to go to, and so they dropped out into an artificial existence, surrounding themselves with a protective barrier of stereophonic sound.

Helen shook her head ruefully. No sense going overboard; the least she could do was to own up to the truth. Not all youngsters were on drugs, not all of them flouted authority. But even the conformists seemed to be hooked on sound, ODing on decibels. They sought noise everywhere; injecting their eardrums with a daily dosage of rock, mainlining on the shrieks and groans of splatter-films, the cacophony of commercial commands from their television sets, the clatter of clamor of video-games. No wonder the voices of parents and teachers alike were lost in the din. Teaching was an art, and like all arts it depended upon communication. But how can you hope to communicate with anyone in the midst of all that noise?

Maybe that's what she was really running from. Running from the noise that negated every effort to fulfill the life she'd chosen. What was the sense of trying to teach when nobody listened?

Helen shook her head. Big deal! It was easy enough to see the problems; the hard part was to come up with the proper solutions. She knew the questions, all right, but not the answers. And when you don't have any answers, what is there left for you to teach?

That was the bottom line. She wasn't running away from noise, youthful protests, or social upheaval. She was running, and running scared, from the realization of her ignorance.

I don't want to be a teacher anymore, she told herself. I want to be a learner.

Abruptly she glanced up at a roadside sign on the right, noting its message. Cliffordsville 5.

Cliffordsville? Helen glanced at her watch quickly. Almost five o'clock—she should have been in Willoughby at least half an hour ago at the rate she was traveling. What was she doing five miles away from a town she hadn't even noticed on the roadmap? And why hadn't she had the sense to bring the map along with her?

She shook her head. All this worrying about kids who don't pay attention, and where does it get you? Lost, that's where. If I really want to be a learner, I'd better start right now.

Peering through the windshield against the slanting rays of midafternoon sun, Helen saw the outline of a small structure set back from the highway ahead and to her left.

As she neared it, she noted the lettered injunction of the sign mounted atop its flat roof—Eat.

Helen had private reservations about the wisdom of obeying such a command; her past experience with roadside cafes in lonely rural areas like this had not been all that pleasant. Nevertheless, she swerved to the left and entered the parking area before the weatherbeaten structure. There were only two other cars parked beside the entrance and she pulled up a short distance away. Then she moved across the gravel to the door.

As she opened it, a wave of warm air fanned her face, carrying with it the all-too-familiar reek of fast-food at its greasiest—a stomach-churning composite of French fries, cheeseburgers, and frozen pizzas which had been subjected to ordeal by fire.

Thank goodness she'd had a late breakfast before taking off! As it was she could make do with a cup of coffee; it was probably the only thing she could order here that wasn't fried. What she was really looking for, of course, was a roadmap.

Luck was with her. Seating herself on a counter stool, Helen confronted a multitalented, middle-aged man serving as the maitre d', chef, waiter, and busboy.

"What'll it be, miss?" he asked.

Helen told him what it would be, and as he busied himself at the coffee urn, she glanced past the side of the counter toward the two men seated at a corner table. Both appeared to be in their mid-thirties, too old for playing but happily resigned to their role as full-time spectators and sports commentators.

Glancing over their beer, they stared raptly at the screen of the television set mounted above the counter at the far end.

Jocks tossed a football across the full length of the nineteen-inch tube, then tumbled in a writhing heap at its base, their minuscule movements accompanied by the excited outcries of an unseen sportscaster.

More noise. Helen shrugged; no matter where you went, you couldn't get away from it.

Then, glancing down the counter in the opposite direction, she discovered another source of sound—the electronic emanation from a video-game enthusiastically operated by a small boy. At first glance he didn't appear to be any older than ten; if so, why wasn't he in school at this hour?

Helen frowned at the thought. There you go again, still playing teacher! I thought we were through with all that, remember?

Her frown vanished as the counterman set the coffee mug before her.

"Would that be all?" he asked. A pudgy thumb gestured toward the flyspecked glass container on the shelf directly behind him. "We got some nice pie, just came in today."

Helen shook her head. "You know what I want for dessert?" she said. "A nice, fresh roadmap."

The counterman's forehead furrowed into a frown and Helen nodded quickly. "Really—if you have one, I'd be very much obliged if you'd let me take a look at it."

The counterman's face relaxed in an amiable grin. "Sure thing. Got one lying around someplace—think I stuck it under the register."

Helen sipped her coffee as he moved away. In a moment he returned, brandishing the highway map triumphantly.

"Here you are."

He placed his find on the countertop before her. Helen lifted it gingerly. It was a map, no doubt about that, but one could hardly call it fresh. The outer surface was wrinkled and creased; and when she unfolded it, she was confronted with smudges of grease, which streaked and stained most of this area and the surrounding counties. Whoever fried this map hadn't done a very good job, Helen decided. But if she wanted to see what's cooking—

Helen studied the map for a moment, eyes narrowing as she squinted through the stains, then halted with a sigh of exasperation. "Okay, I give up. Where am I?"

The counterman jabbed a greasy forefinger at a smudge in the center of the map. "Here. You want the main highway, right?"

Helen nodded. "I guess so."

The counterman's finger moved a trifle to the left. "Looks like you missed the turnoff at Cliffordsville."

"Oh—I see."

Mine host smiled knowingly; he was in his glory now. "Look—about two miles back, you come to a gas station. That's Cayuga. You hang a left, go four blocks, and the highway cuts across. There you—"

He broke off as banging sounds rose from the far comer.

Helen turned and saw the source of the disturbance. The kid was pounding the side of the video-game, and each blow caused a blip of interference on the TV picture, much to the annoyance of the two customers watching the game.

Raising his voice over the noise of repeated banging, the counterman called out, "Hey, kid, easy on the machinery!"

The blows ceased abruptly as the boy glanced up. "It doesn't work right," he said.

The counterman shrugged. "Look, kid, I don't build the games, I just keep the quarters. Put in another one. Maybe it'll work better."

He turned back to Helen and his finger moved down to the map again. "See, just outside Cayuga, the highway splits off—"

A sudden series of thumps echoed through the confines of the cafe and he broke off, frowning.

One of the men at the table called loudly. “Hey, Walter, the kid’s screwing up the TV!”

The counterman shrugged. “It’s his quarter. The TV’s free.”

The other customer shared his companion’s scowl. “Cut out that noise! I got twenty bucks riding on this game!”

The counterman nodded toward the youngster standing in front of the video-game. “You heard the man,” he said. “Let’s cool it, huh?”

The boy didn’t reply. Inserting another quarter, he resumed his play, this time without a pounding accompaniment.

Now the only counterpoint to the counterman’s conversation came from the continuing babble of the TV sportscaster.

As Helen watched, her informant began to fold the map as carefully as if the grease-spattered chart contained clues to the location of buried treasure. “You say you’re headed for Willoughby?”

“That’s right.” Helen nodded.

“Nice town. You got a job set up there, or what?”

“Not really. I thought I’d just take a look around.” The counterman placed the folded map in his right-hand trouser pocket with tender loving care. “Where’re you from?” he asked.

“Homewood. That’s downstate.”

“I know the place.” He nodded. “Nice town.”

Helen smiled. “If you say so.”

Over the continuing chatter of commentary issuing from the television came the sound of a phone ringing from the galley behind the counter. The proprietor turned and headed for it, leaving Helen to finish her coffee in peace.

But not for long.

From the television set the commentator’s voice rose in crescendo, heralding a climactic crisis in the final moments of the last quarter. Then it faded abruptly at the sound of repeated bangings. Helen swung around on her stool to watch the youngster belaboring the side of the video-game machine with the flat of his hands.

Overhead, the TV picture scrambled completely. One of the men at the table groaned and his companion turned to glare at the instigator of the interruption.

“Cut out that pounding!” he shouted. “You hear me?”

Ignoring him, the boy concentrated on the video-screen before him, then smacked the side of the machine again.

Helen stared uneasily, fumbling in her purse for change. All she wanted now was to get out of here before trouble started.

But it had already begun.

One of the men at the table pushed back his chair and rose quickly. It wasn’t until he stood up that Helen realized how big he was; over six feet tall, burly and broad-shouldered.

His companion looked up, gesturing. “Hey, Charlie, take it easy—”

Charlie wasn’t listening. He headed toward the video-game in a cold rage, grabbing the boy by the shoulder and shoving him roughly to one side. Then he stooped and ripped the plug of the machine from the wall. Caught off balance, the youngster stumbled and fell against the baseboard.

Almost before she realized it, Helen was on her feet. “Stop that!” she cried.

Suddenly there was silence, all eyes focussing on Helen as she moved to the far wall and helped the child to his feet.

As she did so, their eyes met briefly. To her surprise, Helen saw that the boy was smiling. Turning abruptly, he ran to the door, yanked it open, and raced out.

Embarrassed, the big man lowered his gaze, then moved away to resume his seat at the table.

Helen glanced toward the counter; behind it, the counterman stood staring, and his worried expression told her he’d returned in time to witness the altercation.

“Sorry, lady,” he murmured. “These guys—they take their sports real serious.”

Helen nodded. “Nice town.”

Moving to the door she made her exit, letting it slam behind her.

Only then did she relax. Peace.

Crossing to her car, she shook her head in rueful self-reproval. Why had she allowed herself to lose her temper that way? What happened back there was really none of her business; but on the other hand, she had no choice. She just couldn't stand to see a child mistreated that way. Thank goodness he hadn't been hurt.

Reaching the car, Helen slid her key into the door lock, glancing around as she did so. The parking area was deserted; the boy had disappeared.

Probably ran all the way home, Helen decided. And yet he hadn't seemed frightened.

Helen remembered the way he'd smiled when she'd helped him to his feet. There was something odd about that smile; was she imagining things, or had it conveyed a hint of secret understanding? Funny kid.

Funny Helen. Sliding into the seat before the steering wheel, she shook her head, remembering her resolution. Time to forget about what had happened, time to put the show on the road and make it over to Willoughby before dark.

Closing the door, she glanced through the side window, noting with surprise that twilight had already descended. To emphasize its coming, a neon beer-sign blinked on above the cafe entrance.

Helen turned the key in the ignition and the motor started. As her foot found the gas pedal, she released her parking brake, put the car in reverse, and started to back out before turning toward the driveway exit.

Suddenly she glanced up at the rearview mirror just in time to see a blur of movement behind her. Through the twilight she caught a glimpse of the boy on a bicycle speeding directly across the lot behind her.

Quickly she floored the brake, but as the car screeched to a halt there was a sudden, sickening thud.

"Oh no!" she cried.

Wrenching the door open, Helen lunged out and headed around the side of the car at a dead run. Then she halted behind it, staring down in shock.

The boy was sprawled on the pavement beside his bike, eyes closed, breathing hard. Then, as she bent over him, his eyes opened.

“Are you all right?” Helen gasped.

The child nodded. “Yeah—I guess so—”

Helen knelt beside him. “Can you move your arms and legs?”

“Uh huh.”

As Helen watched anxiously, the youngster started to sit up.

“Easy there,” she said. “Tell me where it hurts.” The boy rubbed his left shoulder. “Just here. I must’ve hit it when I fell off.” He smiled, shaking his head. “Don’t worry, it’s not broke or anything.” He started to get up and Helen put her hand on his arm, slowing his movement. “Not too fast,” she said. “See if you can put your weight on your feet.”

“Sure—you see?” The boy stood erect, rubbing his shoulder. “It doesn’t hurt anymore, honest.” Now, for the first time, Helen turned her attention to the bike. Its wheels lay bent and twisted beneath the rear tires of the car. The boy followed her stare, his smile of reassurance fading.

“Oh, I’m so sorry!” Helen turned to the youngster, speaking quickly. “Look, maybe you can get it fixed. I’ll pay for it—”

“That’s okay.” The youngster’s smile returned for a moment, then disappeared once more as he peered uncertainly around the dusk-dimmed parking area. “Do you think maybe you could give me a lift home? Before it gets dark?”

“Of course.” Helen nodded, then glanced at her car trunk frowning. “I’m afraid there’s no room for your bike, though. I’m moving and the backseat is loaded. The rest of my things are in the trunk.”

“I can get it tomorrow.” The boy bent down, tugging the bike free from beneath the tire, then dragged it across the lot and leaned it up against the wall of the cafe.

“You’re sure it’ll be safe there?” Helen said. “Yeah. No sweat.” The youngster returned, moving around the side of the car to the passenger door. He waited while Helen slid into the driver’s seat and leaned over to unlock the door, then pushed it open so that he could enter.

As he settled down beside her, closing the door, she released the brake and started up the motor again. The car moved forward to the edge of the road. There it halted as Helen glanced at her passenger.

“Which way?” she asked.

“Make a left.” The youngster nodded up at her. “The same way you’re going.”

Helen blinked. “How do you know which way I’m going?”

“I heard you talking back there.”

“Did you now? You’ve got good ears.”

The car picked up speed, moving down the road in the gathering twilight. There was no traffic and as Helen switched on her headlights, their glow seemed to emphasize the darkness of the lonely countryside ahead.

She peered through the windshield, waiting to catch a glimpse of the filling station that the counterman had mentioned, but now she felt the boy’s hand nudge her arm.

“Turn here,” he said, indicating a side road branching off through the trees at their right.

Helen slowed the car, glancing dubiously at the narrow lane revealed in the headlights’ beam.

The boy sensed her indecision. “Don’t worry,” he said. “It’s not far now.”

Helen turned off into the opening between the trees, then turned the headlights up to bright as she steered a cautious course along the rutted roadway.

Beside her the boy glanced up again. “Are you moving to Willoughby?” he asked.

Helen glanced at him, amused. “You heard me say that, too, I guess.”

He nodded. “How come you left Homewood?” Helen hesitated, as for a moment her amusement faded. The little devil—he really had been listening! But that didn’t give the kid the right to pry into her business.

Then again, what difference did it make? Might as well answer—if she could. Why had she left Homewood? A good question.

She shrugged, searching for the right words. “I don’t know—I guess I was looking for something and didn’t find it there.”

The boy nodded. “What about your folks?”

“They’re both gone.”

“You mean they’re dead?”

Helen nodded. “I’m afraid so.”

“Oh.” There was a note of concern in the small voice now. “Don’t you have anybody?”

“Not anymore. I’m all alone.”

Beside her the boy sat silent for a moment. Then, suddenly, he held out his hand, smiling.

“My name is Anthony,” he said.

Helen released her right hand from the steering wheel and gripped the small palm in her own. “Helen,” she said.

Anthony turned gravely. “I’m very glad to meet you, Helen.”

Now Helen turned her attention to the roadway once again. The car bumped along the narrow lane between the black border of towering trees.

“You really live quite aways out here, don’t you?” Helen glanced down. “Your parents must be getting worried about you.”

“Not really.”

“No?”

Anthony shook his head. “They don’t care when I come home. I could come home at midnight and they wouldn’t care.”

Helen smiled at him indulgently. “Midnight, Anthony?”

“Yes.” The boy paused for a moment, then continued. “It’s my birthday today and they don’t even care about that!”

Helen stared at him, startled. “You’re kidding! Really?”

He nodded forlornly and her heart went out to him. “What a crummy birthday!”

“I’m okay.” Anthony glanced up with a cheerful grin. “I made a friend.”

Helen brightened. “Me too,” she said.

Quite suddenly, the car emerged from the woods.

Peering through the windshield, Helen was surprised to see that the road ahead ran in a straight line between fields covered by parched grass. This was obviously farmland, but it lay fallow and unplanted, weeds its only crop. Under the dark and moonless sky, the horizon receded into deeper shadows without any evidence of lighted dwellings. It looked like the middle of nowhere.

Then, quite abruptly, the car's headlights focused on a white two-story house looming up directly ahead at the far end of the road.

As they approached, Helen noted that the architecture was Victorian, like something out of an old picture-book, rising from a complementary setting of green lawn surrounded by a white picket fence.

It seemed as out of place here as if it had been dropped from the sky.

Helen parked before the gateway, noting as she did so that there were lights faintly visible behind the closed shutters.

"Here we are," said Anthony.

They got out of the car and Helen moved around the side to join the boy as he started forward and opened the fence gate.

Together they moved up the walk bisecting the neat, well-trimmed lawn.

"What a lovely house!" Helen murmured.

Anthony seemed pleased by her reaction. "You like it?"

Helen nodded. "It's so peaceful. Way out here by itself."

Nearing the front door, Helen was surprised to see three cars standing in the shadows before the left-hand side of the structure. She couldn't make out details too clearly, but in the dim light she got a curious impression that they were coated with a fine layer of dust.

Anthony followed her gaze and she nodded toward him. "Three-car family, right?"

He smiled but made no reply. Stepping forward, he opened the front door. Chimes jangled faintly against a tinny background of music issuing from somewhere within.

Anthony gestured toward the open doorway. "C'mon in," he said.

Helen moved across the threshold and the boy followed her, closing the door behind him. They stood in a hallway lighted by old-fashioned wall lamps. A staircase rose directly ahead, leading to the floor above.

Now that the front door had closed, the music's fast jerky tempo was louder; it seemed to be coming from the doorway of the room down the hall at their left.

Anthony took Helen's hand and started toward it, then halted at the entrance just long enough for Helen to get a fleeting glimpse of the room beyond.

It was here that she discovered the source of the music: its ricky-ticky rhythm emanated from the television set against the far wall as cartoon figures leaped and bounded across the flickering screen.

Both the images on the tube and the television itself seemed oddly incongruous in this setting. The darkened parlor looked almost like a reproduction of a Currier and Ives print; the red plush carpet was heavy, the overstuffed furniture massive, the fireplace against the right wall surmounted by a huge marble mantel.

Now, rising from behind high-backed chairs placed directly before the television screen, an elderly man and a young girl turned toward the doorway with startled stares. For a moment Helen had the curious impression that both of them were less than pleased at this sudden invasion, but almost instantly their faces broke into bright, toothy smiles as they hurried forward, nodding at the boy beside her.

"Hi, Anthony!" They spoke simultaneously, then fell silent, turning their attention to Helen.

Again she sensed a momentary reaction of uneasiness in their glances, but it was quickly dispelled as their smiles returned.

Beside her, the small, dark-haired boy nodded, his brown eyes fixed upon their faces. "This is Helen," he said.

The elderly man's features creased into a genial grin. "Helen! Delighted to meet you! Any friend of Anthony's—"

"Hello there!" The girl's voice rose over his as she nodded at their visitor.

"This is Uncle Walt and my sister, Ethel," Anthony said.

Helen smiled. "How do you do?"

In the moment that followed, she had an opportunity to sort out her impressions, noting that Uncle Walt must be in his early sixties. Although he wore a checkered sport shirt and casual blue jeans, his trendy attire could not conceal the stooped shoulders and the thinness of his limbs. In contrast, Ethel was quite plump; she appeared to be about sixteen, and the bulging body beneath her blouse and skirt betokened the results of overindulgence in junk food. Her face, framed by long strands of lusterless blond hair, wore a bovine look.

Helen's quick appraisal was interrupted by the sound of voices from the hallway behind.

"Did I hear Anthony come in?"

The high-pitched query was met by a booming, deeper-toned response. "Yes, indeedy! There he is!"

Helen turned, stepping aside as another couple entered the room. Both were in their forties; the woman wearing a blouse and slacks, her companion's garments similar to those of Uncle Walt.

Anthony nodded up at them. "This is my mother and father."

Helen concealed her surprise with a hasty smile; somehow they seemed a trifle too old to have a son of Anthony's age. "Pleased to meet you," she said.

Anthony gestured toward her. "This is Helen."

His mother beamed. "Helen! Delighted!"

The man grinned, reaching out to take her hand and pump it in warm welcome. "Pleased to meet you, young lady!"

"She gave me a ride home," Anthony announced.

The response was overwhelming, rising from all sides.

"Did she now?"

"How nice!"

"Wonderful!"

"Very sweet of her to go to all that trouble!"

Helen glanced up awkwardly at the circle of jolly faces surrounding her.

"I'm afraid we had a little accident," she murmured.

"Accident?" Anthony's mother was still smiling, but her voice held a hint of uncertainty.

Now they were all staring at Helen, and she sensed a curious concern behind their genial smiles. Rendered self-conscious by their scrutiny, she hurried on, her voice faltering. "I—I knocked Anthony down while he was riding his bicycle."

"Oh?" Anthony's mother continued to smile, but her voice again betrayed her.

Ethel's agitation was even more evident. "Knocked him down?"

Her father glanced at her, then spoke quickly. "Well! It doesn't look like any harm was done!"

"No, sir!" Uncle Walt nodded heartily. "Anthony looks fine!"

"I hope so," Helen murmured.

Father nodded at the boy, his eyes twinkling. "Oh yes! Anthony looks fine to me!"

The boy turned toward his mother. "Can Helen stay for supper?"

"Oh, no!" Helen shook her head quickly. "I wouldn't dream of imposing —"

"Imposing?" Anthony's mother was speaking again. "Not at all—I think it's a wonderful idea!"

"Marvelous!" Her husband chuckled his approval. "Of course she can!"

Helen smiled politely. For a moment she was still tempted to refuse, but the anxious expectancy in Anthony's eyes won her over; she didn't have the heart to turn him down.

"Thank you," she said.

"Good!" His father looked relieved. "Then, it's all settled."

Anthony looked up at his mother. "Can we eat right now?"

"Why, yes—of course."

Helen turned to her. “If you don’t mind, I’d like to wash up first.”

Anthony said, “Sure,” and nodded eagerly toward the doorway. “I’ll show you where.”

“Thank you.” Helen turned and followed him from the room.

His mother’s voice sped them on their way. “See you in a little while!”

Anthony led Helen down the hall, then started up the stairs. “This way, Helen.”

From below, the squawk and squeak of meaningless musical merriment echoed forth. With a start Helen realized that the televised cartoons were continuing; they’d been running constantly while she’d been in the parlor. But now, as she and Anthony reached the upper landing, the sounds gave way to silence.

The boy started along the hall to the right. Helen moved up beside him. “I like your folks, Anthony,” she said.

“Do you?” His voice was flat, noncommittal.

“Of course.” Helen smiled down into his sober face. “And how could you possibly say they don’t care about you? Come on!”

Anthony glanced up, frowning. “They don’t!” Helen shrugged. “Well, my family was never this happy to see me in my whole life!”

“They aren’t like that, Helen. Not really.” Reaching the end of the hallway, he turned right and into another corridor. Somewhat to her surprise, Helen noted the absence of any doorway here; come to think of it, she hadn’t seen any in the other passageway.

She frowned, puzzled. “Anthony—where are we going?”

A low rumbling, something like an animal growl, sounded from behind the wall at their left and Helen halted quickly.

So did the sound.

She glanced around, confused. “What in the world was that?”

“What?” Anthony seemed undisturbed.

“Didn’t you hear the noise?”

Anthony cocked his head, listening for a moment. “I don’t hear anything.” He reached out and took her hand. “Come on.”

As they started forward, Helen noticed an opening at her right; there were rooms up here after all. Passing the open doorway, Helen glanced inside.

The bedroom beyond was dark, save for the illumination from the tube of a TV console in one comer. Sitting in a wheelchair, facing away from the door, Helen caught a fleeting glimpse of a teenage girl. Motionless, oblivious of their presence, she stared intently at the cartoon on the screen. Now, as barks and growls arose, Helen realized the origin of the sound that had startled her.

Then Anthony's hand tugged her forward past the doorway. "That's Sarah," he said. "She's my other sister."

"I noticed she's in a wheelchair," Helen said.

"Yeah." Anthony nodded shortly. "She was in an accident." Then he gestured to indicate a door at the end of the hall ahead. "Here's the bathroom."

Almost five minutes elapsed before Helen finished what she judged to be the absolute minimum of necessary repairs to her makeup and coiffure. Anthony was awaiting her outside the bathroom door. As they passed along the hall, she noticed that the door to his sister's room was closed now; he must have visited the girl during the time she was fixing her face.

Helen was about to inquire concerning the nature of Sarah's accident but Anthony, gripping her hand firmly, seemed anxious to get downstairs again as quickly as possible.

To her surprise the family was still gathered in the parlor, grouped around the television set as it spewed forth yet another in a series of seemingly endless cartoons.

A giant cat wearing an old-fashioned burglar's mask tiptoed stealthily across a rooftop and crawled into a chimney to invade the dwelling below. Inside the house two mice, wearing the clothing of human youngsters, were busily kindling a gigantic blaze in the fireplace. The cat came sailing down the chimney shaft, landing butt-first in the fire. A burst of mocking music indicated just how hilarious it was to see an animal in danger of incineration; a loud yeow! heightened the mirthful aspect of the scene as the cat shot up the chimney shaft on the rebound. To cap the jest, he emerged from the chimney with such speed that there was no way of checking his momentum. Soaring high above the rooftop to the screeching accompaniment of off-key violins, he bounced against an overhead power line to the sound of the inevitable boing! Jagged streaks of electricity shooting out from his furry form, he burst into flame, then plummeted to earth, landing on a concrete driveway with an obligatory thump, followed by the cracking of the stone and, presumably, his skull.

Helen diverted her attention from the screen to survey its audience. Despite the high comedy afforded by the cat burglar's sufferings, Anthony's family didn't seem amused. In the dim light from the picture tube, their faces loomed drawn and haggard.

But it was only a trick of the light. As Anthony entered the room, they turned toward him instantly, wearing smiles of welcome.

"We're ready to eat now," he announced.

Over the sound of the cartoon, a chorus of enthusiastic agreement arose.

"Good!"

"Wonderful!"

"Great!"

"You bet!"

Listening to the varying voices, Helen was reminded of a childhood fairy tale. "The Three Bears," that was it; Papa and Mama and Baby Bear, inquiring "Who's been sleeping in my bed?"

Stupid, of course; there were four here and they weren't bears, nor had she been sleeping in any of their beds.

Maybe it was the cartoons that made her think of fairy tales. In any case, her attention was diverted now as the family gathered around Anthony like a squad of soldiers awaiting the command of their leader.

They do love him! she told herself. Helen had never seen such devotion, such anxiety to please a youngster; even his sister deferred. Obviously there was no sibling rivalry here. But catering to him could lead to unpleasant consequences; Anthony might easily end up a spoiled brat.

Helen hoped she was wrong. Glancing down at the child, she felt the stirrings of emotional response, an unaccountable desire to protect him. But from what? He seemed totally at ease, and as he turned to her, the sober little face broke into a warm smile in which all her apprehension melted.

“Let’s eat here,” he said. “Then we won’t have to miss the cartoons.”

Uncle Walt nodded. “Hey! That’s a great idea! Why didn’t we think of that ourselves?”

“Sounds good to me.” Father nodded. “I’ll go get us the card table. We can set it up right over here.”

“Better hurry,” Uncle Walt chuckled. “I bet Anthony’s mighty hungry!”

He left the room and it seemed scarcely moments before he returned, lugging the table.

Anthony’s mother beamed at Helen. “We’re very happy you can eat with us. Anthony’s so thoughtful that way.”

As she spoke, Helen realized that the sound-track of the cartoon had faded. Now Anthony’s voice was clearly audible.

“Would you like to sit next to me, Helen?”

She turned, noting with surprise that the boy was seated on a small sofa directly facing the TV screen. Funny she hadn’t noticed the sofa before. Now, meeting Anthony’s expectant gaze, she hesitated. “Well, maybe your mother will want to sit there . . .”

“No—no, you go ahead.” Anthony’s mother nodded. “I have to get supper.”

His father had finished unfolding the legs of the card table and now he set it up at one side, arranging the chairs around it. “This will be fine,” he said. “The rest of us can eat here—you just sit right next to Anthony!”

Helen settled down beside the boy. He smiled at her quickly, then turned his attention to the screen before him.

Poised on the edge of a precipice, a rabbit pushed a huge boulder over the edge and watched with a grin as it landed directly on the head of an unsuspecting bear below. A loud crash indicated that the volume on the sound-track had risen again. Helen frowned, puzzled; maybe something was wrong with the controls. Then she glanced up as Anthony's mother appeared beside him, bending forward as she spoke.

"Darling—"

He glanced up, annoyed by this distraction, to meet her nervous smile.

"I don't mean to interrupt you, dear, but—"

"But what?"

The nervous smile wavered before his irritated gaze. "It's just, well—do you happen to remember where supper is?"

Helen stared at her blankly. What kind of a question was that? But Anthony was frowning.

"You know where it is."

His mother's smile had disappeared completely now. "I do?"

Anthony nodded. "It's in the oven, isn't it, Mother?"

"Oh! Of course!" Mother's smile returned, accompanied by a laugh that conveyed both relief and embarrassment. "How silly of me!"

Behind her, Anthony's father chuckled.

So did Uncle Walt.

"She never knows." He gave Helen a wink, shaking his head.

Mother moved toward the doorway and Anthony's father fell into step beside her. "I'll help you get things ready," he told her.

Sister Ethel started after them. "Me too! I can't wait to see what we have tonight!"

Helen watched them exit, then turned to Anthony, her glance questioning. He shrugged, then smiled hesitantly.

"It's a game," he said.

Conscious of the skepticism in her stare, he swallowed hard, then continued. "It's all pretend! She knows where supper is. She just wants to see if lean guess."

Uncle Walt moved beside him, nodding cheerily. “That’s right, just a little game!”

Helen framed another question, but before she could speak, her attention was distracted by a sudden burst of sound from the television.

On-screen a worried wolf seated in the open cockpit of a small plane watched in panic as the wings fell off and the propeller dropped away. The plane spun into a nose dive, spiraling through the clouds and crashed in flames. Now the wolf reeled forth from an inferno of smoke, his frazzled fur singed and smoking.

Beside her, Anthony’s laugh rose in approval. “This is a good cartoon.”

“Uh-huh.” Helen forced a smile. “But aren’t there some other programs you like to watch, too?”

Anthony shook his head. “Cartoons are the best.” He pointed at the screen, where the wolf’s smoking figure suddenly melted into the form of a ghostly angel, a halo encircling its head and a harp appearing between its paws. Now, spreading celestial wings, it floated away.

“You see?” Anthony nodded happily. “Anything can happen in cartoons.”

He turned to face Helen again. “That’s why I like them. Don’t you?” The brown eyes were serious now, as he gazed up expectantly. Helen sensed that somehow he attached great importance to her answer.

She shifted in her seat, oddly disconcerted by his stare. “Well . . . I guess everybody likes cartoons.”

“Not everybody.” Anthony darted a disapproving glance at his uncle.

Uncle Walt chuckled hastily. “Oh, sure we do! We all like cartoons! Anything can happen in ’em, just like Anthony says. Wouldn’t want to watch anything else, no-siree!”

Now footsteps sounded from the hallway, and a voice rose gaily. “Here we come!”

Helen turned, gazing over the back of the sofa as Anthony’s parents appeared followed by Ethel, each of them carrying two cardboard plates.

“Good stuff here for everybody!” Father grinned happily as he set his burden down on the card table. Ethel followed suit, then lugged a small end table across the room and set it down before the sofa where Anthony's mother stood waiting.

"There you are, darling." Mother put down one plate before him, then placed the other before his guest.

"Thank you," Helen murmured.

As his mother moved away to join the others seated around the card table, Anthony turned his attention to the food.

Helen glanced down at her plate, staring dubiously at its contents.

What kind of a meal was this? A thin hamburger and a jelly donut nestled against a candy bar and a bag of potato chips. Was this their idea of good food? Apparently so, for from the card table across the room, voices rose in ecstatic approval.

"Mmm! Doesn't this look yummy?"

"Boy, that's good!"

"Isn't this delicious!"

"You bet!"

Anthony cast a sidelong glance at Helen. "Okay?"

Helen nodded politely. She was conscious of guarded stares from the other table as she lifted the hamburger bun. To her surprise there was peanut butter smeared on top of the meat patty.

The boy beamed at her. "I always like peanut butter on hamburgers. It's good that way."

She managed a smile as she put the top back on the bun and took a tentative nibble. The silent tension at the other table was broken now by the sounds of enjoyment; the lip-smacking noises and enthusiastic murmurs with which food is consumed in television commercials.

As she listened, vagrant thoughts intruded. There had been no commercials interrupting the TV cartoons here tonight. That was strange. But even stranger was the spectacle of Anthony's family devouring their odd meal as though it were a gourmet dinner.

Helen forced herself to take another tiny bite. Yes, it was all very strange; now another thought occurred. She glanced at Anthony and framed a question.

“Isn’t your sister Sarah going to eat with us?” Anthony seemed taken aback. “Uh, no. Sarah doesn’t eat.”

Mirthful assent rose from the foursome around the card table.

“That’s right!”

“Sarah doesn’t eat, no way!”

“That’s funny, Anthony!”

“Every time he says that, I get such a kick!” Anthony frowned. Instantly they fell silent. A moment later the murmurs of party enjoyment resumed, but Helen was conscious of their wariness; it, too, raised a question, and she was tired of questions. What she needed were a few straight answers.

She turned to the boy. “Do you always eat like this?”

Anthony did not reply and Helen was acutely conscious of the sudden silence from the other table. They were all staring at her now.

Mother was the first to speak, her thin smile belied by the apprehension in her voice. “Anthony can have anything he wants.”

Father nodded quickly. “Anything at all!”

Uncle Walt forced an unconvincing chuckle. “You bet he can!”

Helen ignored them; she was waiting for the boy to speak.

He nodded at her apologetically. “Don’t you think it’s good?”

Helen hesitated. Politeness dictated an approving response, but she was sick of politeness, sick of phony approval, sick of this strange overprotective atmosphere and the unanswered questions it posed. Couldn’t the family understand what they were doing to the child by indulging him this way? Didn’t they realize the consequences of catering to his whims? Maybe it was none of her business, perhaps she was reverting to her role as a schoolteacher, but it was time somebody spoke up.

She nodded quickly. “I suppose it’s all right once in a while,” she told him, “but you’re young, you need to get proper nutrition.” She fixed the family with a stare of pedagogical disapproval. “You can’t eat like this all the time!”

Flustered, Anthony shook his head. “I never thought of that. But you’re right, Helen. It’s not good all the time—”

Again the echoing chorus rose from the other table.

“Right! Anthony’s a growing boy!”

“Of course he is! He needs his nutrition.”

“You’re so right, Anthony!”

Anthony turned, silencing them with an accusing stare. “You’d never tell me that,” he cried.

Their smiles were sickly, but no one spoke. It remained for Helen to break the mood.

“Oh well,” she murmured. “I really shouldn’t be criticizing, should I?” She smiled at the youngster. “After all, it is your birthday supper.”

Again, the terrible silence. And then Ethel’s voice, rising almost despairingly. “Another birthday?”

Uncle Walt’s grin was gone. “With presents?” Anthony shook his head angrily. “No—it’s not my birthday! I never told you that—”

As he gestured toward them, the group around the table recoiled, catching their breaths.

Shrinking back, Ethel’s elbow knocked against the side of her plate, spilling it to the floor.

Anthony glowered at her. “Stop that!” he cried. “I’m not doing anything.” Then he caught himself, turning to Helen and forcing his smile. “They’re being silly!”

Helen faced him, speaking softly. “Anthony, you did tell me it was your birthday.”

Mother’s voice rose in a dreadful parody of cheer. “Of course it is!”

“Yes!” Ethel chimed in immediately.

So did Uncle Walt. “Sure! We all know it’s Anthony’s birthday, don’t we?”

His valiant attempt at a chuckle emerged, but it sounded more like a frightened cackle of sheer panic, halting abruptly as Anthony shouted him down.

"It's not! I told you it's not my birthday, do you hear?"

Helen stared in shock at the family's frightened faces. What was wrong with them, what had she started here? She didn't know the answer, but whatever it might be, it didn't matter to her now. Suddenly all she wanted was out of here.

She started to rise from the sofa. "I think I'd better go, Anthony."

Anthony gazed up at her hastily, eyes imploring. "No!".

The passion in his voice made Helen stiffen.

Now the boy rose, his eyes beseeching. "Please—it's okay, everything's okay."

He glanced at the television screen, where a cartoon rabbit was climbing out of a magician's hat. "You gotta stay," he said. "Uncle Walt's gonna do a trick for us."

"I'm sorry, Anthony." Helen shook her head. "I really must leave now."

"But Uncle Walt's gonna do a trick—just for you! Please—sit down—"

"You bet!" Uncle Walt nodded but Helen ignored him and started to turn away.

Anthony put his hand on her arm. "It only takes a minute. You'll see—" As she halted, the boy called out quickly, "Do the hat trick, Uncle Walt! The hat trick!"

"You bet!" Uncle Walt rose, then stared blankly around the room. His booming voice faltered. "Where—where's the hat?"

"Over there." Anthony released his grip on Helen's arm, gesturing impulsively. "On the TV set."

Automatically Helen's gaze followed his pointing finger. Resting on the TV set was a top hat.

Helen stared in surprise, but as she did so she was conscious of another and more unsettling emotion rising within her; something akin to panic.

Anthony smiled up at her reassuringly. "You'll like this."

Helen took a deep breath. "Anthony—"

The boy ignored her. "Go ahead, Uncle Walt," he called.

"Yes, sir!"

As Helen watched, Uncle Walt moved slowly across the room and reached out to pick up the top hat. He grasped it hesitantly, the gesture of a man forcing himself to pick up a live coal from the fire.

But Anthony was nodding happily. “You’ll like this, Helen. It’s good.” Before she could move again, he grabbed her hand squeezing it tightly, then turned to call. “Do it, Uncle Walt. Do it now!”

The intensity in his voice was matched by that of his grip. Helen stood motionless, watching as he clutched her hand.

Now everyone was watching as Uncle Walt turned, hat in hand. His attempt at a smile was horrible to see, but Anthony’s eyes were fixed upon him in inexorable command.

Slowly, Uncle Walt reached down into the hat. A moment later his hand emerged again, holding up a white rabbit.

Helen could sense his suppressed shudder of relief as he faced the family with a ghastly grin. “Ta-da!” he muttered shakily.

Their response of mingled handclaps and laughter was no more convincing than Uncle Walt’s grin, but Anthony gazed up at Helen now. “Isn’t this fun? We do it a lot. You’d like it here, Helen, honest you would.”

Helen stared at him, her panic mounting and from behind her rose an insane babble of agreement from the rest of the family.

“You’d love it here! You would!”

Helen stared at them in sudden dread, then jerked her hand free. She had to get out, had to—

Anthony, sensing her intention, shouted to Uncle Walt. “Do it again! Do it right!”

Before Helen could turn away, Uncle Walt’s hand descended into the hat, then drew back, gasping. Eyes frantic with fear, he watched as an enormous figure rose to tower above the television set.

It was a rabbit—but not the sort that a professional stage magician could conjure up. Only a sorcerer could summon such a thing. This was a multicolored monstrosity, a huge misshapen creature with the paws and claws of a tiger. Great yellow eyes bulged above a snouted muzzle, which gaped wide now, revealing a long snakelike tongue lolling forth from between the curved fangs of a sabretooth. Squatting atop the television set, the thing extended its talons.

Helen cried out, raising her hand as a shield against the sight.

As she did so, Anthony gestured swiftly. “Don’t be scared!” he shouted.

He gestured again, this time in the direction of the television set. Helen lowered her arm just in time to see the entity spiral down and vanish into the hat once more. An instant later, the hat itself had disappeared.

Blindly, unmindful of the family’s reaction, intent only on frantic flight, Helen turned and grabbed her purse from the end table near the doorway. To her dismay its clasp opened and the bag slipped from her trembling fingers, its contents spilling across the floor.

She knelt quickly, trying to capture the items scattering across the carpet.

Anthony crouched beside her, shaking his head in anguish. “I didn’t want to do that! Honest I didn’t—I just got mad, and sometimes I can’t help what happens!”

Helen made no reply, but the look on her face was answer enough. Now the boy began to assist her, picking up objects and stuffing them back into her purse. And all the while his soft, intense voice sounded through the silence.

“Please don’t go, Helen! I can make it real nice here. I can make the food the way you said it should be. I can even change the house if you want! Just say it, and I can make anything you like, but don’t—”

Suddenly he broke off, looking closely at a scrap of paper he had picked up from the floor. Now the pleading face was transformed into a mask of rage.

Helen stared at him, startled. As Anthony scrambled to his feet, the family cowered back against the wall. Still glaring, the boy turned to Helen and held out the scrap of paper.

“You see?” he said. “I told you how they were!” Helen glanced down at the crumpled fragment, which appeared to be tom from the upper margin of a newspaper. Across its length read the words of the hastily scrawled pencil message:

Help us! Anthony is a Monster!

She glanced up as he nodded. “They hate me! They want to send me away to someplace bad, just like my real mother and father did!”

Voices faltered forth from the far end of the room. “That’s not me, Anthony—”

“Of course not—”

“You know how we—”

The three responses sounded simultaneously and Anthony cut them off with a single wave. He turned to Helen, speaking rapidly. “They’re afraid of me. Everybody is. That’s why they act this way. And I do everything for them! They can watch TV all day.

No one has to do a thing. Not a thing! I’m real good all the time—”

Uncle Walt’s voice sounded in hasty agreement. “That’s right—Anthony’s a good boy. We love him!”

The youngster reached out, plucking the piece of paper from between Helen’s trembling fingers. Rising, he moved toward the four figures cowering against the far wall, their eyes terrified by the threat in his.

“Then I wonder who wrote this note.” Now the threat entered his voice. “I wonder who called me a monster?”

Instantly the babble began. “He did it!”

“Not me!”

“You know I didn’t do it! It was Ethel!”

“Yes—Ethel. She’s the one!”

Mother, Father, and Uncle Walt were all pointing now, pointing at the stricken girl. She shook her head, eyes widening, mouth twitching in terror.

Helen rose. She didn’t know what Anthony intended; only that somehow, whatever it was, he had to be stopped.

Anthony was nodding at the girl. “Oh? I didn’t know that. What a big surprise! Ethel, huh?”

Ethel shook her head frantically. Her voice was shaking, too. "All right! Go ahead and do it—do it—"

The boy smiled at her now and his whisper was almost gentle. "Do what, Ethel?"

Somehow this mockery held even more menace than his rage. With a convulsive effort, Ethel tore her gaze free from his accusing stare and gestured at Helen, her words tumbling out in a haste born of hysteria.

"Now do you realize you'll never get away?" she shouted. "You think it was an accident you came here? He made it happen! He brought you here just like he brought us here and kept us! Just the way he'll keep you!" She nodded, but her voice raced on.

"Or maybe he'll get mad at you someday like he did with his real sister and cripple you and take away your mouth so you can't yell at him, or maybe do what he did to his real mother and father—"

For an instant Anthony closed his eyes, wincing in pain. Then he opened them once more, staring at the girl. Softly, very softly, he spoke:

"Time for you to go now, Ethel."

Helen took a step forward. "Anthony, don't—"

But Anthony ignored her. He faced Ethel, smiling his secret smile.

"It's a special surprise. I just made it up."

Ethel moaned, shaking her head as Anthony's voice rose. "I'm wishing you to Cartoonland!"

Ethel vanished.

Not in a puff of smoke. Not in a blind flash. She simply—disappeared.

Helen stood frozen. Ice water trickled in her veins, her limbs were numb with cold, but it was not physical chill that set her trembling. This wasn't the first time she had seen someone disappear before her very eyes; she'd watched magic acts on the stage, where the conjurer waved his wand and a shapely assistant had seemingly vanished from behind a black cloth or the confines of a closed cabinet. And in fantasy films a wizard might mutter an incantation that caused another character to fade from the screen. But this prosaically furnished parlor was not a stage set and the small boy standing before her wasn't a magician. He hadn't waved a wand or uttered a spell and Ethel had not been obliterated by means of a movie's special effects.

This was reality. The parlor was real. The people in it, including Ethel, actually existed.

Or had existed. Because now Ethel was gone. A small boy uttered a simple sentence and Ethel became a nonperson.

It was the cold reality that sent shivers along Helen's spine.

And now the small boy was smiling at her.

"I told you cartoons are good," Anthony said. "Anything can happen in them!"

He turned, pointing toward the television set.

Helen followed his gaze to the screen, where animated figures of goblins and witches were chasing their victim. Now the object of their pursuit glanced back and Helen stared in shock at the familiar face.

Ethel was in the cartoon!

For a moment her panic-stricken features filled the screen, mouth opened to sound a shriek, which rose against a blaring background of merry music.

Then Anthony's hand rose in a sweeping gesture, for all the world like one of Helen's former pupils using an eraser to wipe a blackboard clean.

The screen went blank.

And Anthony, in a dreadful parody of Bugs Bunny, stuttered "Th-th-th-th-that's all, Ethel!"

With a gasp, Helen turned and ran for the door. Behind her she heard the family's cries, heard the boy's sharply shouted command, but she didn't look back.

Now, racing down the hall, she reached the front door and tugged at the handle. For one fearful moment she thought it was locked; then, suddenly surrendering to her strength, it flew open.

Helen started forward, only to stumble back as a huge gust of wind roared through the doorway from the darkness beyond. Reeling, she forced herself forward again but as she did so, something rolled through the darkness to bar her path.

Filling the threshold before her was a gigantic staring eyeball.

Helen slammed the door and twisted around, sobbing.

Half-blinded by tears of mingled frustration and frantic fear, she watched Anthony advancing toward her down the hallway. The anger had drained from his face; now his expression was one of contrition and concern.

"I can't help it, Helen," he said. "I don't want to hurt anybody. If you'll just come back—"

He reached out and took her hand. Almost without realizing it, Helen found herself moving with him along the hall.

Through her sobs she heard his voice sounding plaintively.

"You don't understand. Nobody does. All I have to do is wish for something and it happens."

Now they were in the parlor once more. Blinking away her tears, Helen looked up and saw the family still huddled motionless against the far wall, paralyzed with shock. Beside her, Anthony was still speaking.

"Please, Helen, you've got to believe me! I can do anything. Anything!"

As if to demonstrate, he turned toward the silent television set. The group against the wall stared speechless in agonized expectation. Despite herself, Helen was staring, too.

And now the television set started to vibrate. Sparks flew forth from the screen. The cabinet began to glow, incandescent with an inner energy that enveloped it in flickering flame. With a hideous grating screech, the top of the set ripped apart, bursting before a force that boiled upward from within.

Then the opening widened splitting the set in half. A whirling, snarling form spun upward, streaming out into the room and enlarging as it emerged. The swirling figure was that of a cartoon dragon, but as it grew, it changed into something far more horrifying—something three-dimensional—a living, pulsating reality. Its eyes were gigantic glaring globes of fire and its breath was a jet of flame.

Helen swayed back, closing her eyes. "Wish it away, Anthony!" she panted. "Wish it away!"

A surging sound rose. Helen forced her eyes open as with blinding speed the huge form dwindled, collapsing back into the yawning fissure of the shattered television set. Then, with a final flicker, it shimmered away, together with the ruined remnants of the set itself.

There was a moment of utter silence.

Helen stared at the family cringing against the wall, stared at the boy beside her. He too was surveying the room, and when at last he turned toward her, his face was a mask of misery.

"I hate this house," he murmured. "I hate everything about it."

Suffused with sudden purpose, his voice rose.

"I wish it all away!"

Succumbing to dreadful impulse, Helen turned her gaze toward the figures cowering against the wall. Again, no spells were uttered, no wands waved. But as she watched, one by one, they all disappeared.

Mother, Father, Uncle Walt, vanished into—

Nothingness.

The room itself had melted away. Helen turned, her eyes searching the darkness, finding nothing but the night surrounding her on all sides. Nothing but the night—and Anthony, standing beside her in empty space.

"Where—where are we?" she faltered.

Anthony stared at her bleakly. "Nowhere."

Helen's voice echoed through emptiness. "Where are the others?"

"I sent them wherever they wanted to go." Anthony's voice trembled. "Away from me."

Helen looked down at the boy. Suddenly, standing here in the darkness, he seemed utterly helpless, utterly forlorn. There was nothing monstrous about him now—all she saw was a lost, lonely little boy. Bracing herself, she took him by the shoulder and bent forward, meeting his gaze eye-to-eye.

"Anthony," she whispered. "Take us back."

The child's stare wavered. "So you can leave, too?"

She sensed the accusation in his voice, but his eyes held only hopelessness and his face was white with fear.

Helen hesitated, then took a deep breath.

“I won’t leave you,” she said. “Take us back, Anthony. Take us back, so you and I can try again.”

The boy stared at her without speaking, his eyes shining with sudden hope, then dulling in doubt and despair.

Helen shook her head. “I’m not lying to you, Anthony.” Now the words came unbidden, from somewhere deep within her. “You need someone to teach you. Somebody to help you understand this gift you have—this terrible, wonderful gift. A gift you must control. We must learn how to use it wisely.” She took another deep breath. “The two of us can learn together.”

Anthony looked up anxiously. “You’ll stay with me?”

“Yes.”

“Always?”

Helen nodded; there was no turning back. “Always.”

Anthony smiled. “Okay,” he said.

Reaching out, he took her hand. For a moment they stood together in the darkness. Then something flickered, and the emptiness around them was filled with recognizable reality once more.

Utter blackness faded into the ordinary shadows of normal light. Looking around, Helen saw that she and Anthony were standing on the same spot formerly occupied by the house. It was gone now, but surrounding her were the barren fields through which she had driven, and in the distance she recognized the road that wound its way back into the bordering trees.

Smiling in relief, she waited for Anthony to speak.

He nodded quickly. “Let’s go.”

Helen turned, then halted, frowning.

Although the house was gone, the driveway before it was still intact. Intact and empty—her car was nowhere to be seen.

For a moment Helen hesitated, remembering her own words. This was a new beginning; they must learn together, learn how to control Anthony’s power, using it only to serve its proper purpose. She must be careful not to encourage any further demonstrations until they both were sure what the consequences might be. On the other hand, they did need wheels in order to leave here in an ordinary fashion.

Helen made her decision, lips framing a question. “My car—?”

Anthony smiled, then made a small offhand gesture.

Instantly the car was back in the driveway, parked directly before them.

“Okay?” Anthony smiled at her. “Can we go now?”

Helen nodded. Together they moved to the car and Helen opened the door, waiting while Anthony slid across to the right-hand passenger-seat. Then she took her place before the wheel, closing the door behind her.

Suddenly she frowned and the boy glanced up at her questioningly.

“What’s the matter?”

Helen shook her head. “I forgot.” She gestured toward the ignition. “I don’t have the key—it’s in my purse—”

But as she spoke, something flicked between her fingers. Staring down, she saw the car key nestling in her palm; at the same moment she sensed the pressure of her purse against her lap.

Anthony was smiling.

Helen sighed, shaking her head in mingled relief and admonition. “Let’s not do too much of that anymore,” she murmured.

“Okay,” said Anthony.

Helen started the engine, then headed the car back down the road leading to the trees. As she did so, she found herself making mental notes. She really must do something about Anthony’s vocabulary—he’d just said “okay” three times in five minutes; and she would have to teach him something about grooming—his hair was badly in need of combing, and that soiled outfit he wore was a positive disgrace.

Somehow the prospect didn’t dismay her—if anything, the thought of teaching again filled her with joyful anticipation.

So much to teach, so much to learn—

Helen glanced at Anthony and he smiled, his face radiant with a happiness so great that he seemed unable to contain it. Beaming up at her, he made a little gesture with both his hands.

Suddenly the sky brightened into morning sunlight and as Helen stared wide-eyed through the windshield, the bare fields bordering the road ahead blossomed out into bright and shining banks of flowers.

Helen shook her head reprovingly. “Anthony!”

But as she spoke, she smiled.

Anthony smiled with her. The whole world was smiling now as the car sped through the fields of flowers and into the twilight of the trees beyond.

Valentine

The plane plunged into the twilight.

From his window-seat just forward of the right wing, Mr. Valentine blinked out at the darkening sky. Then, frowning, he consulted his wristwatch.

Three o'clock. Too early, much too early for twilight. And yet, the clouds encircling the aircraft were violet, almost purple. Peering ahead, Valentine noted a deepening darkness beyond. His frown deepened in response.

Thunderclouds?

Oh no, not that, It couldn't be. Not after the way he'd checked the weather reports in the morning paper. Clear skies all the way—that's what the map showed and only fifteen minutes ago the captain's voice had crackled a cheery greeting over the intercom, announcing the promise of a smooth on-course flight at an altitude of thirty-five thousand feet.

Sorry, Captain. I don't like your altitude. And your prediction is for the birds.

Or would be, if there were any birds. But birds were too smart to venture up to that height. Only a fool would take such a risk, and only a fool would put his faith in the smarmy reassurance of a pilot who was paid to offer it to a captive audience of passengers.

Surely the captain must have seen the cloud banks ahead. Unless, of course, he was blind. In which case he shouldn't be flying.

And neither should I, Valentine told himself.

But there was no help for it. The conference opened tomorrow morning and neither automobile nor Amtrak could cross the continent in eighteen hours. He’d asked for a week off in advance with the thought in mind—either driving or taking the train—but his production supervisor had vetoed that idea in a hurry.

“Sorry, no way. We’re working shorthanded as it is, and you’ve got that Carver job to finish up before you go. Why waste all that time when you can hop on a plane Thursday afternoon and still get a good night’s rest before Friday’s program starts? I mean, what’s your problem?”

I’m scared, that’s the problem. Only Valentine couldn’t tell him that. It’s been eighty years since the Wright Brothers took off at Kitty Hawk, and nobody’s afraid of flying anymore.

A glance around the cabin confirmed Valentine’s thought. There were two stewardesses up front near the galley—one quite young and the other in her thirties—chatting calmly together, smiling as if they didn’t have a care in the world. But of course they’d be calm. Even if they weren’t, they’d look calm; that was part of their job.

The passengers seemed to be calm, too. As a matter of fact, most of them had turned off their reading lamps and were dozing. In one of the seats ahead, an enormous man had assumed the fetal position; a fat baby, with his head resting against the window. Nearby, a young couple reclined in entwined embrace. An elderly couple across the aisle from them slept without touching one another, their indifference born of long association. In the seat directly before him, a mother sat beside a little girl, her impassivity a sharp contrast to her daughter’s wriggling. No one seemed troubled by the slight rocking motion of the plane or by the presence of the purple clouds gathering beyond the window.

So why was he upset? Valentine frowned. Obviously there was no sense trying to rest—the way he felt, sleep was out of the question. But perhaps work might spell salvation. He reached up and turned on the reading lamp, pulled out his tray table. Groping into his opened briefcase on the empty seat beside him, Valentine produced the tools of his trade—a note pad, a pocket calculator, and a textbook. He opened the volume to a page indicated by a bookmark and concentrated on the array of equations thus revealed.

Taking a ballpoint pen from his breast pocket, he unscrewed the cap and held the point over the blank note pad. For a moment he stared at the letters and numerals on the page of the textbook, only to find his eyes blurring.

Valentine blinked, but his vision did not clear. Neither did his thoughts. How could a man put his mind to math, concentrate on abstract theory, in the midst of menacing reality? And the reality was all around him; the reality of shuddering motion, the reality of swollen storm clouds just beyond the windowpane.

Valentine put down his pen and shut the book, but he couldn't shut out his thoughts. Perhaps it was time to face the truth. Just what was there about flying that troubled him so greatly? Where did his exaggerated dislike of air travel come from?

Could it be the commercials? Even when sitting in the security of his own home, with no seat belts trapping him into his easy chair, he had always been conscious of a vague irritation when confronted by the paeans of praise for flight, which emanated from his television screen. All those images of scenic grandeur and jumbo jets sailing serenely through the blue and cloudless skies over shining seas—all those unseen heavenly choirs chanting about the high adventure and low fares to be found in the skies—what nonsense! Most of the flights he had taken offered nothing of visual grandeur; what he usually saw from his window were clouds and smog, or a combination of both. And the fare-structure had always been a source of irritation to him. It seemed to turn out that so-called bargain rates were offered only to family groups traveling at some ungodly hour of the night to one of a very few major cities. The moment you embarked on a journey at a sensible hour, traveling alone, the rates escalated to astronomical proportions. Why did it cost $99 to fly three thousand miles across the country as opposed to $400 or $500 for a journey one-third that distance? No matter how loudly the choir sang or how often the offscreen announcer boasted of bargains—fair or unfair—Valentine always seemed to end up trapped in a situation like this.

Trapped.

That was the operative word. The whole trip was a trap. That's how you started—trapped in a tangle of traffic as you approached the airport. Trapped in a maze of jammed parking lots. Trapped in a staggering, stumbling dash from lot to terminal, hefting the bulky burden of your luggage. Trapped in the line waiting at the passenger counter. Trapped in the anxiety of anticipation once you reached it: Were your tickets in order? Was your flight departing on time? Could you be certain, once you checked in, that your luggage would be put through to its proper destination?

Then, of course, there was the business of passing through the security check. The X-ray eye scrutinizing the contents of your hand-luggage was bad enough, but the cold, fishy stare of the security people was even worse. Foolish, of course, but Valentine always went through the procedure with the feelings of a felon; the whole thing reminded him all too vividly of police procedure. He half expected one of the uniformed guards to grab him by the collar with a curt command: "Up against the wall, clasp both hands behind your head. It is my duty to warn you that you have the right to remain silent; anything you say may be used in evidence."

Then there was a long walk to the terminal gate, the endless plodding through the white-walled corridor under the harsh glare of fluorescent illumination. The last mile.

Only worse. At least the prisoner condemned to execution could expect to reach his destination and pass through the little green door without interruption. But air terminal procedure was different. Once at the gate, you stood in line again, waiting for the door to open. From overhead came the canned cacophony of tape recordings, punctuated abruptly by an announcer squawking static-riddled gibberish, which involuntarily evoked one's nerve-racked attention. Would your name be called to report to the nearest telephone? Was your flight going to be delayed for an extra hour? Standing before the departure gate was always an ordeal, and even if you could disregard what issued overhead, there was no way to ignore the presence of your fellow prisoners. Correction—fellow passengers. But as far as Valentine was concerned, he heartily wished that those passengers had been in prison. Perhaps he was squeamish; he preferred to think of himself merely as a private person who lacked the normal quotient of gregariousness. Whatever it was, he disliked the close proximity of young mothers with squalling infants in their arms or the overweight oldsters who seemed to think it necessary to embark on a flight to Philadelphia wearing cowboy hats with brims pulled down to shadow their fat, bespectacled faces. Again, at least the condemned man is granted the privilege of taking his seat in the electric chair alone; he doesn't have to put up with the indignity of a crying baby seated beside him, or the presence of one of those pseudo-cowboys who will talk him to death during the journey into oblivion. Better to suffer the brief pain of electrocution than the endless agony of elocution.

Valentine sighed softly. This was nit-picking, he knew, over-dramatization. All he was doing was trying to forestall the ultimate reality—the fear that possessed him after the waiting interval at the terminal—the terminal illness, ending when he finally boarded his flight.

Again, the situation contrasted unfavorably with that of a condemned prisoner. When they put you in the electric chair, you at least have the comfort of knowing that you don't have to lay out an exorbitant sum—to say nothing of an exorbitant tax—to pay for your seat; and no one sentenced to death is expected to strap himself into the hot seat. He doesn't have to sit there in endless anticipation of what is to come; he doesn't have to listen to the sound of the engines revving up and wonder whether or not they seem to be in proper working order. He doesn't have to endure the long, slow, bumpy shudder of movement as the plane heads into position for its takeoff at a distant runway. He doesn't face the repetition of the engines' roaring, followed by the thrust of acceleration as the plane suddenly swoops forward with a surge of shrieking sound as it seeks to rise.

And when it does finally rise, when one is conscious of being airborne at last, there is always the clamor of one's inner voice: Will it clear those power lines just beyond the airport boundaries? Will it manage to soar above the high-rises of the city streets or the mountains ringing the desert location—or the roaring waters of an ocean takeoff? And what about that dangerously steep slanting of wings when the aircraft swerves, as it inevitably seems to do, before heading into the flight-path?

Naturally, these questions are never voiced, let alone answered, in the little recitation that a bored stewardess hastily delivers prior to takeoff. Fasten your seat belts . . . place your seat in the upright position . . . extinguish all smoking materials . . . blah, blah, blah, oxygen mask overhead, blah, blah, blah, emergency exits . . . Valentine could almost recite the standard reassurances from memory, but there was no point to it, because they were meaningless.

How many times had that same speech been made just before a takeoff where the plane did not clear the wires, or the buildings, or the mountaintop, or the surface of the sea? How many times had the mechanical reassurance been given before an aircraft started to bank, only to spin into the spiral of a fatal crash? Once you hit the power line or the jutting obstacle ahead, it didn't much matter whether or not the oxygen mask descended on schedule; and the emergency exits offered no escape from the fiery explosion.

Valentine shifted in his seat. Why was he wasting his time with such morbidities? He'd already gone the route; run the gauntlet of traffic and terminal, endured the anticipatory dread of waiting and survived the perils, real and imaginary, of the takeoff. So why was he still uptight now?

Then realization came. It wasn't fear of danger that produced his palpitations of mind and body. The real terror came from the realization of his helplessness.

Here he was, sailing along serenely at an elevation of thirty-five thousand feet. The fasten your seat belts sign had blinked off, and nicotine-addicts were free to risk lung cancer again. The stewardesses would go into the galley soon to load the refreshment cart, and up front, behind the closed door sealing off the nose of the plane, the pilot and his crew were huddled over their instrument panels.

Or were they? For all he knew, they might be discussing this afternoon's football games, or last night's adventures on the town. Somewhere Valentine had read that employees of flight crews were instructed not to indulge in alcohol or any form of dissipation for twenty-four hours prior to a scheduled assignment. But how could you be certain they'd followed those instructions? There were also those reassuring public-relations statements about mandatory regular physical checkups for all flight personnel, but again, there was always the random factor of unpredictability. Suddenly he remembered an episode in his own family history—how Uncle Joe had gone in for his usual annual physical checkup and emerged from the doctor's office with a clean bill of health, only to drop dead of cardiac arrest in the elevator that was taking him down to the street. Good old Uncle Joe—only forty-eight years old, pink of condition, best tennis player in the annual competition at the country club. No smoking, no drinking, no bad habits—but suddenly, without warning, no heartbeat. If it could happen to his Uncle Joe going down in an elevator, it sure could happen to somebody else's uncle going up in an aircraft. The difference being that when Uncle Joe's heart gave out, the elevator didn't crash.

For goodness sake, Valentine told himself, stop acting like a baby! Try to think of something else.

And so he did. He thought about air pockets—unexpected wind currents that could envelop the plane suddenly, without warning, and hurl it to destruction below. He thought about wind-shears that crumpled wings and turned jumbo jets into helpless insects unable to withstand the buffeting of a storm.

Valentine blinked and jerked erect at the sudden glimpse of green slashing through the sky beyond the window.

Lightning.

He'd been right about the presence of the storm ahead. Only it wasn't ahead anymore; they were actually into it now. The skies beyond the windows were almost black and raindrops spattered against the glass.

The plane bounced into a sickening lurch and so did Valentine's stomach.

Glancing down, he noted that his hands were gripping the edges of his armrest.

White knuckles. How he hated that casually used slang phrase! But his knuckles were white and he was pretty sure that his face was turning green.

Better find out about that. As plane and stomach wrenched again, Valentine released his grip on the armrest and scooped up the objects on his tray table, depositing them in the briefcase. Pushing the table up and securing it in position against the back of the seat directly ahead of him, he rose and made his way down the aisle in the direction of the lavatory. Two stewardesses were in the galley now and neither of them—a rather attractive young girl and her somewhat older companion—noticed him as he moved past and entered the lavatory on his left.

The cubicle was small and dark, like an upright coffin, but when the door closed behind him, the fluorescence flickered on. Valentine found himself facing the washstand mirror and there his worst fears were confirmed. His face did have a greenish cast. He stared at his reflection, noting the telltale terror in his eyes. Confronting his countenance, he found the final fear. Helplessness was not the ultimate horror, nor was the fear of flying. The thing that really got to him was the fear of falling.

Who knows where it started, or when: probably in infancy. As far back as he could remember he was aware of that particular phobia, both in waking life and in his all-too-vivid dreams. It was in those dreams, dreams that survived into adulthood, that he would suddenly find himself dropping down into darkness—deep, deep darkness, like that of the storm clouds outside the plane. There were no windows in the lavatory and he couldn't see the sky here, but he could feel the force of the storm that surged around the aircraft. The wrenches came faster now, quickening in a regular rhythm. A tiny light flickered on behind the lettered inscription:

PLEASE RETURN TO YOUR SEAT.

Valentine ignored it. But he couldn't ignore the mounting panic.

Once again he faced himself in the mirror, trying to ignore the too-bright terror in his eyes. Take a good look at yourself. You're a grown man; a computer analyst and a good one. You of all people should be comfortable around advanced technology. Well, those people up there in the nose of this plane are knowledgeable, too. They have their own expertise. There must be hundreds of flights that encounter storms and air turbulence every day and pass through safely. Why should this one be different?

But he still was facing the question. Why was he so afraid of falling? Was he crazy? Or was all this the result of some trauma he'd pushed back into the unconscious? Maybe his mother may have accidentally dropped him as a baby.

If so, she must have dropped you on your head, Valentine told himself.

The plane lurched again and Valentine felt his gut respond in sympathy, but sympathy wouldn't help him now; not the way he was breathing. For the first time, he realized that the sound he had vaguely noted over the drone of the engines was emanating from his own mouth. He wasn't just breathing hard, he was gasping—hyperventilating. It wasn't a new experience and he knew what to do. Valentine reached into the slot beneath the washbasin and pulled out a barf bag. He yanked it open, lowered himself to the toilet seat and began to breathe into the receptacle. Suddenly he looked up at the sound of a ping. The light above the washbasin flashed again.

PLEASE RETURN TO YOUR SEAT.

Another ping and then the crackle of a voice on the intercom:

"This is Captain Deveraux. Folks, I'd like you to buckle up snugly in your seat belt and extinguish your smoking materials. We have a little unfriendly weather up ahead and we just might bounce around for a bit."

Now he tells us. Valentine grimaced wryly and started to raise the paper bag to his mouth and nose again.

Another ping interrupted him. This time the voice of one of the stewardesses came over the intercom:

"We'll be suspending our in-flight service for a few minutes. For those of you still waiting for refreshment, we'll get back to you as soon as we're through the turbulence."

Who needs refreshments. Valentine raised the bag once more, only to halt at the sound of a knock on the lavatory door. The muffled voice of the stewardess was faintly audible: "Please get back to your seat as soon as you can."

Valentine opened his mouth to reply but nothing came out but a hoarse gasp.

The plane bucked violently. Valentine's right elbow knocked violently against the edge of the washstand. But the knock outside the door was more violent still.

Again he heard the voice of the stewardess: "Hello in there! Can you hear me? Helloooo!"

Valentine ignored her as he buried his face in the folds of the open bag, concentrating on regulating his breathing. During the moment of merciful silence from the passageway outside the door, he managed to regain control and regulate his respiration.

Then the knocking resumed, in a series of sharp staccato raps. The voice accompanying it held a note of shrill urgency:

"Mr. Valentine? Can I help you? Mr. Valentine!"

This time Valentine managed a reply. "Just a minute—I'll be right out."

Rising, he stood swaying before the mirror. His color looked better now —the greenish tinge had disappeared—but he still felt faint. Turning on the tap and gripping the knob firmly to maintain the water's reluctant flow, he splashed his face with his free hand. Through the door the stewardess's voice sounded again:

"I'll help you to your seat."

"One moment," Valentine called. "Just a moment."

Moment of decision, Valentine told himself. Reluctantly he dipped his hand into his left jacket pocket and pulled out a small, plastic pillbox. Fumbling with the catch, he opened the container and dumped its contents into his palm—two blue Valiums and a Dramamine. As he stared at the pills, his resolution firmed. He knew what to expect if he swallowed all three of the capsules—better to be a walking zombie than the totally lifeless victim of a heart attack. Taking a deep breath, he gulped down the pills.

Pulling a paper cup from the wall-container, he filled it with water for a chaser. Swallowing, he glanced again into the mirror. The floor of the plane beneath his feet lurched sickeningly and the mirror image distorted in accompaniment to his own grimace. Groaning, he closed his eyes and turned, fumbling for the door latch.

The door opened and so did his eyes. The countenance he presented to the waiting stewardess was perfectly calm.

But from her own expression, she wasn't buying it. He recognized that I've-been-here-before look in her smile.

"I know how you feel, Mr. Valentine." Her voice sounded softly over the tortured throbbing of the plane's engines. "Lots of people are uptight about flying when the weather gets a little rough. Just try to remember that statistically it's safer up here than on the ground—safer even than your own bathroom."

Spare me the humor. Valentine forced a response to her smile. "I'm fine," he told her. "Perfectly fine."

The plane bounced again, and suddenly Valentine lost his balance, colliding against the stewardess. The younger stewardess was standing behind her companion and now she made her presence known with a laugh.

"Whoops!" She approached, gripping his left arm. "Let's get you back to your seat."

The older stewardess reached out to grasp his right arm and the two women started to propel him past the galley entry way.

Valentine stifled a groan, but not the thought which prompted it. They're treating me like a basket case! You'd think I was ninety years old. But if those pills would only start working, I'll bet I wouldn't feel a day over eighty.

Proceeding down the aisle, he noticed that his fellow passengers were no longer asleep. The buffeting of the storm had brought rude awakenings to the fat man, the old couple, and their younger counterparts. Only the woman whom he guessed to be the mother of the wriggling little girl still rested with her eyes closed.

He hoped that others farther back in the cabin hadn't awakened. The way these idiots here watched his progress made him doubly self-conscious; he must look like some kind of a nut lurching along in the custody of his two uniformed attendants.

He settled down into his seat, uneasily aware that the stewardesses were still hovering over him. The older of the two was eyeing his face for telltale signs of stress, but the younger one directed her attention to the empty seat beside him, where his briefcase rested. Following her glance, he discovered that it rested no longer. The jolting of the plane had toppled it over on its side and its contents were now strewn across the surface of the seat—note pad, calculator, and the textbook.

The young stewardess squinted down at the opened title page. "Micro Chip Logic—The Liberation of the Left Brain" She smiled at him. "You're a science fiction fan, huh?"

"It's a textbook," Valentine told her. "Computers."

The young stewardess gave him a questioning glance. "You really read this stuff?"

"I wrote it," Valentine murmured.

The girl checked the title page again. "My goodness, so you did." She smiled at her older companion. "How about that?"

Ignoring her, the senior stewardess addressed Valentine. "Very impressive. But why don't we put it away now and try to get some sleep?"

Valentine's inward groan echoed again. What gives? First they act as if I were an old man, and now they're treating me like a kid.

He left the thought unspoken, but now, as the younger stewardess reached up and turned off his reading lamp, he found his voice. "No—please don't. I'd rather have the light on."

The girl shrugged and switched the light back on, then turned and made her way along the aisle. The senior stewardess remained poised beside Valentine's seat, peering down at his face. For a moment she studied it, then came to a decision. She bent forward to speak, her low murmur scarcely audible above the whine of the engines.

"Mr. Valentine—we're not supposed to do this, but I have these sedatives —" Reaching into her jacket pocket, she brought out a small bottle, carefully concealing it in the palm of her hand as she continued. "They might help you get some rest." Valentine shook his head quickly. "No thanks."

"They're very mild," she persisted.

Valentine forced a smile of reassurance. "I'll be fine—really I will."

He blinked, startled at the sudden flash of light from above the back of the seat directly before him.

Now a diminutive head popped up over the seat back. Valentine recognized the face of the little girl as she grinned down at him, one hand gripping the seat for support and the other brandishing a piece of exposed film. Then he realized—the kid had taken the photograph with her Polaroid.

The little girl dangled the developing snapshot before them and her grin broadened. "This will cost you four bucks," she said.

"What?" The senior stewardess offered her a perplexed frown.

"Only kidding," the girl giggled.

"Come along," said the stewardess, moving forward to take die girl's arm. "No more pictures. You're supposed to be buckled down next to your mommy."

Valentine watched as she ushered the protesting youngster back to her seat beside her dozing mother across the aisle. Reluctantly the child secured her seat belt while the stewardess waited. Then she turned back to Valentine.

"I'm Susan St. John. If you need anything, just call for me."

Valentine shook his head, forcing another fixed smile. "Thank you again. But don't worry, I'm all right now, truly I am."

The stewardess nodded and started off. Her movement left the aisle vacant and revealed the face of the little girl in the seat directly across from him. She wasn't grinning now, just staring at him—and what was this thing she was holding up for his inspection? A doll wearing a striped jacket and a straw hat—a doll with the face of W. C. Fields! Valentine blinked. No, it wasn't a doll—more like a ventriloquist's dummy.

The little girl's face remained impassive but the dummy peered at him with an ugly crooked grin of its own.

It was bad enough having all these people looking at him without putting up with a dummy too. And that grin was just too much—

Valentine turned away, his breath rasping a warning. Better not get worked up or he'd start hyperventilating again. He fumbled in his right-hand pocket and pulled a cigarette loose from its pack. Placing it between his lips, he sent his hand on an errand into the pocket once more, this time to bring out a matchbook.

Striking a match on its surface, he cupped his palms and bent forward to get a light—then jerked his head up at the sound of a shrill whistle.

Turning, he stared at the little girl across the aisle. Her face was still impassive, but W. C. Fields suddenly jerked one of his arms up toward the lighted sign overhead. A squeaky mock-adult voice seemed to issue from the grin-distorted mouth.

"You heard the captain. No smoking!"

The little girl's expression was unchanged. For a moment Valentine found himself half believing that the dummy had actually spoken.

Again the voice sounded—this time louder, more emphatic.

"N-O! No smoking!"

Now the fat man occupying the seat in front of her turned and glared at Valentine. From the seats behind his own, occupied by the elderly couple, an old lady's voice rose shrilly:

"He ought to have more respect for his body!"

Valentine extinguished the flickering flame, then dropped the match into his ashtray, followed by his cigarette.

Across the aisle, the little girl closed her eyes with a smile of satisfaction. Clasping the dummy in her arm, she lay back, prepared to sleep. The fat man turned his glance away and from behind Valentine's seat there was only silence.

Valentine's breathing slowed. Thank goodness that was over with! Now all was still except for the persistent roar of the engines. Perhaps if they'd only leave him alone, he might actually be able to get some sleep, too. Those pills should be working by now. He sank back, closing his eyes.

The drone of the engines deepened and so did the darkness behind his lowered lids. But the darkness wasn't empty. Far in the distance a faint speck of light glimmered. He found himself following its movements as it fluttered erratically with the fitfulness of a firefly. And like a firefly, its glow grew stronger as it approached.

Only then did Valentine realize that what now loomed luminescently before him was neither light nor insect—it was the face of the dummy.

The open mouth moved, articulating a hoarse command:

"Please return to your grave! Extinguish all life! This is your captain shrieking—"

Now it was Valentine's turn to open his mouth, but no shriek sounded in response. All he heard was a faint dry rasping deep in his own throat—the death rattle.

He stared up at the glowing face hovering before him. As he watched, the body below the face began to emerge from the darkness. To his surprise, Valentine noted that the dummy was clutching a Polaroid camera, raising it to eye-level in order to focus the lens on Valentine's face.

It was then that he found his voice at last. "Don't shoot!" he quavered. "Please don't shoot me!"

But the light exploded before Valentine's eyes. He sat up, blinking into sudden awareness.

The interior of the cabin presented its usual aspect—a mingling of white and shadow. There was no wall of darkness surrounding him, no incandescent image hovering over him, no camera aimed at his face.

Just a dream, he told himself, but I could swear it was the light that woke me.

Then, all at once, he saw the light again—as vivid and livid as he'd remembered. And now he knew its source.

Lightning. There, outside the window—

The plane began to buck violently and Valentine gripped the armrest. No doubt about it; the storm was getting worse.

He glanced down at his clutching hands, noting the whiteness of the knuckles. Well, here we go again—back to square one.

Perhaps the pills were working, or maybe he was just getting a little sense into his head at last; whatever the reason, he wouldn't let this storm spook him again. Pulling his fingers free from the armrest, Valentine reached over to the pouch-pocket at the base of the seat ahead and pulled out a copy of the airline's in-flight magazine. Switching on his overhead reading-light, he began to flick through the pages of the periodical.

The first thing that confronted him was a cigarette ad.

Valentine frowned. Much good that would do him now. Conscious of his need for nicotine, he ran the tip of his tongue over his dry upper lip and hastily turned the page to an article that bore a boldface heading—Life Insurance And You.

Sure, just what the doctor ordered. What good were his cigarettes when he wasn't allowed to smoke them? And if this flying junk-heap crashed, there was no life insurance policy in the world big enough to cushion his fall.

Quickly he turned the page, only to find himself facing a telephone company advertisement. Need Help? Use The Yellow Pages!

Valentine scowled. Good advice, but no solution to his present problem. He was hardly in a position to pick up a phone, and even if he were able to do so, there were limits to the amount of aid he could expect. No operator would assist him in solving his problem, which, quite simply, was to find a way of getting off this plane alive.

Another sickening swoop shuddered through the aircraft, rattling the doors of the overhead compartments and sending the magazine sliding from his lap to the floor. As he stooped to retrieve it, a clap of thunder rose above the engine roar. Giving up, Valentine allowed his attention to wander to the window.

Squinting through his own reflection in the glass, he gazed out at the broad surface directly behind his seat-position. Through the murk, rain was pelting down on it in a torrent—each drop a dazzling diamond in the intermittent flicker of the beacon light at the wing's outer edge. The same series of flashes gave him a glimpse of the two big jet engines suspended by pods under the wing itself.

Again the thunder sounded and as it did so Valentine started to turn away. There was no point in staring out at the storm; he'd had his fill of it and needed no further reminder of its presence or the peril it presented. But then, out of the comer of his eye, he caught sight of something he hadn't noticed before. There was an extraneous object—a dark mass clinging to the far wing pod, just barely visible in the blink of the beacon light.

He thrust his face close to the glass again, cupping his hands to his eyes as he peered through his reflection into the clouded darkness and the driving rain. He saw—

Nothing.

Nothing there at all. It must have been his imagination—some momentary visual disturbance. Not too surprising, considering the content of his fears and the number of pills he'd swallowed to combat them. Unless, of course, he was hallucinating.

From the far recesses of his mind came the long-forgotten lyrics of a popular song he hadn't heard since he was a kid.

"I'm flying high—but I've got a feeling I'm falling—"

Valentine's scowl deepened as he felt the childhood fear welling up within him. He rubbed his eyes and glanced through the window once more, seeking final reassurance.

And there it was again—the dark distortion clinging to the engine pod!

Turning, he twisted his neck toward the window of the seat directly behind him, striving to get a better view.

As if to assist him, a vivid flash of lightning streaked across the sky. Its momentary glare gave him the better look he sought.

Better?

No, this was worse—far worse.

In the instant flicker of the lightning's greenish glare, he saw it all too clearly—the naked, apelike figure of a man, sitting astride the outboard engine!

Then the vision vanished in the darkness of the storm. Again the thunder rumbled.

And once more a jagged streak of green slashed through the sky. Valentine saw its source—the bolt of lightning issued from the creature's outstretched arms!

At the same moment, the aircraft yawed erratically, and the movement sent Valentine's head banging forward against the side of the window. For a split second his eyes closed involuntarily, responding to the impact. Forcing them open, he stared out once again. A flame of electrical current was streaming back across the wing. Straddling the outboard engine, the grotesque figure turned toward Valentine, its silvery face contorting in a grin.

Valentine flung himself back and his shout echoed through the confines of the cabin. "There's something outside! I saw it!"

If it was attention he wanted, his outcry brought immediate results.

As his fellow passengers peered perplexedly around the sides of the seats before him, the senior stewardess came rushing down the aisle.

Halting beside him, she glanced down solicitously.

"Something wrong?"

"Wrong?" Valentine forced the words out between chattering teeth. "It's a man. There's a man out there on the wing!"

The staring circle of faces in the forward seats registered varying reactions of shock, puzzlement, and disbelief. The senior stewardess attempted a smile of reassurance. But from the seat behind him came the old lady's strident cackle.

"Yes, I see him—all green and slimy!" She cackled again. "It's my first husband!"

The old man seated beside her snorted in feigned disgust. "If it is, you drove him to it."

The stewardess moved briskly to the row behind Valentine's seat. Although she was standing beyond his range of vision, he could hear her voice quite clearly.

"Did you really see something out there?" she asked.

And now the old lady's voice: "Of course not. A man on the wing—what a howl!"

Another streak of greenish light exploded beyond Valentine's window. He pressed his face against the pane quickly, just before the flash faded into darkness; just long enough for its final flicker to reveal the surface of the wing and the twin engines mounted at its extremity. The figure had disappeared.

Staring out at the darkness, Valentine's eyes blinked in unison with the beacon lights. For a moment he stared at them in stunned silence, then turned to find the senior stewardess gazing down at him once again, a question in her eyes.

Valentine opened his mouth and the words came tumbling out. "There was lightning. At first I thought it was an animal out there—a dog or a cat. Then I realized it was a man. Maybe a technician trapped out there on takeoff." He shook his head. "How could he survive? The air's too thin. The wind blast—so cold—and he's naked on top of it." Again he shook his head, sighing softly. "I know it's impossible."

The stewardess nodded sympathetically. Momentarily it occurred to Valentine that she might very probably just be humoring him, but right now any expression of concern was welcomed. Suddenly the younger stewardess appeared beside her companion and reached forward to extend the paper cup she held in her hand.

"Here you are," she said.

Valentine reached out for the cup and stared down suspiciously at its cloudy content. "What's this?"

The girl smiled. "Just some warm milk."

"You're sure there's nothing in it?"

The girl shook her head. But her companion produced the plastic pillbox from her jacket pocket. This time she didn't wait to ask his permission; unscrewing the cap, she shook two capsules into the palm of her hand and held them out to him.

"I really think you should take them now. They'll help."

Valentine hesitated, conscious that both stewardesses were staring at him expectantly; conscious too that passengers in the forward seats were watching and waiting. Valentine sensed what they were thinking. Look at that flake back there. What do you think he's going to do next?

The air in the cabin was cold, but Valentine felt the sudden warmth of his blush, the sudden moisture of tears welling up in his eyes.

Somehow he managed to smile. "Please forgive me," he murmured. "That was a fool thing I pulled—"

At a loss for further words to cover his embarrassment, he swallowed the pills and washed them down with a sip of milk. Naturally he couldn't expect any instantaneous reaction from the medication, but somehow the mere act seemed to ease his tension. He glanced up at his guardian angels, shaking his head and chuckling softly. "Holy smoke, when I hallucinate it's a real production, isn't it? A naked man crawling along a 707 wing in a storm at thirty-five thousand feet. Can you imagine?"

With a smile of relief the senior stewardess reached up to open the compartment above his seat and pulled down a blanket. Unfolding it quickly, she tucked it around Valentine's waist as he took another sip of his milk. "Don't feel embarrassed," she told him. "Just try to relax and get a little sleep. We should be out of this disturbance soon."

"Thanks." Valentine settled back against the seat cushion and held out the empty cup. As she took it from him, he smiled again. "Funny, isn't it?

The tricks your mind can play on you. How you can see things that don't exist."

But as he spoke, he was seeing something that very obviously did exist. Peering past the stewardess, he had a clear view of her junior companion standing at the end of the aisle before the open cockpit door of the plane, deep in conversation with a uniformed man who was probably the co-pilot. For a moment the man glanced in his direction, then nodded and turned to move back through the open entrance. As the door closed behind him, the younger stewardess disappeared into the galley.

Valentine focused his gaze on the face of the attendant hovering above him. "No need for you to stay," he said. "You must have other passengers to see to."

The senior stewardess shook her head. "I'd be happy to sit with you until you fall asleep."

The mother instinct. Valentine transformed his irritation into another smile. "Please, it would be easier if you weren't here."

"You're sure?"

"Positive. I'm drowsy already. Look—"

Eyes closing, he let his head drop forward in a semblance of slumber.

Peeking up, he saw her smile at his little joke and start to move away. As she did so he called after her softly, "Miss St. John—"

"Yes?" She turned, halting.

When he called, he really had no idea just what it was he intended to say, but suddenly he knew his purpose. He'd made a spectacle of himself back there but that was over with now. The important thing was to put an end to this mother-and-child relationship and reassert his status as a calm, mature, reasonable adult. Once he realized his role, his words came easily.

"You know, don't you, that should a plane crash, your chances of survival are significantly enhanced if you're in the back."

The senior stewardess nodded. "The plane won't crash, Mr. Valentine, but you're very kind to think of my welfare."

"That's okay," Valentine said. "I just wanted to make sure you knew. Good night."

"Pleasant dreams."

Pleasant dreams?

Not for me, Valentine told himself. Definitely not for me at a time like this. A familiar quotation came to him. "To sleep, perchance to dream; aye, there's the rub."

Hamlet, wasn't it? Something of Shakespeare's that he knew. Great poet. Poor guy, he must have had his troubles too, if he came up with such a line. But he hadn't run into anything like this, that's for sure. Whatever his problems might have been, he'd lucked out.

Shakespeare never traveled by plane. Never got himself trapped in a freak storm. Never found himself buried in the bowels of a mechanical monster. Never sat helplessly suspended thirty-five thousand feet in midair, thirty-five thousand feet above the ground, wondering whether or not he'd touch down safely at the end of his journey instead of crashing in a fiery explosion.

"To be, or not to be; that is the question." Hamlet's question, Shakespeare's question, Valentine's question. But Hamlet was speaking rhetorically and Shakespeare was toying with an idea; Valentine alone faced a situation that was all too real. Hamlet spoke his lines and left the stage. Valentine was left to contemplate the problem with all its perilous possibilities. Alone, surrounded by storm-tossed sky, alone with his fears.

Sleep was the only avenue of escape. He settled back against his pillow. Might as well get some rest, give the medication a chance to work. How many of those capsules had he taken? Valentine couldn't remember; he only knew that he'd had more than enough. If he tried walking around now with all those pills inside him, he'd probably rattle.

But he wouldn't walk. And on second thought, he wouldn't sleep either—not if it meant running the risk of dreaming. Better to just rest, rest and relax, ride out the storm. No dreams, no more hallucinations.

Closing his eyes, he tried to close his mind as well. But the thought kept creeping in. Hallucinations. Could he be absolutely certain this was the answer?

According to the captain's intercom message at the beginning of the flight, the skies were clear.

But the storm had come, and it was real. Even in his present, pleasant state, fully drugged and half dozing, Valentine was vaguely conscious that the plane was still pitching, and a rumble of thunder still sounded faintly in his ears.

Yes, the storm was real. And if this was so, could he be absolutely sure that what he'd seen out there on the wing was purely a product of his imagination, a figment of fear?

Valentine searched his memory for a dictionary definition. Figment—something made up, fabricated, or contrived. But how could a mind capable of retaining a dictionary's definition also conjure up such a horrendous imaginary creation—a naked, manlike monstrosity riding on the wing through the stormy night like a witch straddling a broomstick?

There were no witches; that much Valentine knew. And no one traveled by broomstick, even under clear skies.

But skies, clear or cloudy, serene or storm-beset, held strange secrets. Another memory crossed his mind, weaving in its wake a trailing tremor of terror.

The Bermuda Triangle.

How many times had he read about that vast mysterious expanse of ocean in which hundreds of ships had vanished without a trace over the centuries, in which thousands of voyagers had unaccountably disappeared forever?

And not just in the distant past, either; the phenomenon was still occurring today. Only now it wasn't just ships that disappeared. Within recent years their ranks had been swelled by countless numbers of aircraft that had taken off on routine flights, only to be lost in limbo. And not just single-passenger planes, either—among the missing were huge commercial flights. Even military missions had flown to their final fate somewhere in the vast expanse of sky above the Triangle.

Valentine vaguely recalled the strange story of a squadron—Navy, wasn't it?—that had set out from the Florida coast on a routine training exercise, only to disappear without warning following frantic radio signals that indicated that the pilots had somehow lost their bearings in the midst of strange cloud-formations suddenly surrounding them. When radio signals abruptly faded, a search party was dispatched—a larger aircraft, carrying a crew of fourteen. It too had vanished into empty air.

But had the air been empty?

Nobody knew. For that matter, there were still hundreds of thousands of square miles of the earth's surface; impenetrable jungles, desolate deserts, teeming jungles, mist-shrouded mountains, and forever-frozen polar wastes, which remained unexplored. And the oceans, roaring relentlessly over 70 percent of the globe, had still to yield their submerged secrets to the eyes of men.

Through the years, tens of thousands of sailing ships had made a safe passage through the Bermuda Triangle, tens of thousands had traversed the aerial routes above it without incident. But still the fact remained: so many ships had sunk into the sea's dank depths; so many planes had plunged into oblivion in the shrouded skies above.

And not in the Bermuda Triangle alone. There were many places where similar perils dwelt—travelers by sea or air had met an unknown fate in dozens of other localities scattered all around the globe. And scientists were still baffled by the presence of inexplicable phenomena in certain areas where compasses failed to function, natural causes produced unnatural results, and even the laws of gravity seemed suspended. What was it they'd come up with? Valentine seemed to recollect reading something about electromagnetic force-fields. A properly worded phrase, but one that explained nothing. Once, learned men believed that the air around and above them was filled with unseen presences. Today, they told us it was filled with unseen electrical disturbances. But no one really knew.

Some scientists still scoffed at the notion that the Bermuda Triangle and the air above it contained such forcefields, just as their academic ancestors had doubted the existence of demons.

But they had no proof. And while they argued, ships and planes and people continued to vanish on their voyages.

Valentine had a sudden image of a group of medieval theologians, hotly debating the question of how many angels could dance on the point of a pin. Then the vision was shockingly superseded by a phantasm of the grinning presence he'd glimpsed on the wing of the plane.

We didn't believe in such entities anymore, even though religion still retained them as realities. Strange, wasn't it? Despite the so-called advances of modem science, those religious beliefs still remain unchanged—beliefs in actual angelic presences and demonic dreads. Yet no man had even seen an angel, and no man had even seen a demon.

Except himself.

Valentine shuddered involuntarily as he sank further down in his seat. His eyes remained closed, but now the inner image rose before them once again—the insane image of the grinning, grotesque apparition astride the outboard engine on the wing, eyes flaming with a fire fueled in hell, its mouth gaping wide to reveal a forklike tongue darting forth from between the yellowed fangs. Now it began to crawl across the surface of the wing, inching its way toward him; then rising, it confronted him just beyond the window. Its clutching claws extended into cruel talons, ready to tear and rend, its fanged mouth opened wider in horrid hunger. In a moment it would spring forward, shattering the glass, its talons impaling him, tusks tearing his living flesh.

It was so close now that he could feel a belching blast of carrion breath, see the corded throat-muscles rise in rhythm with an ear-shattering roar of —

Thunder.

Valentine opened his eyes, realizing the source of the sound he'd heard; realizing too that what he had glimpsed was only the culmination of a nightmare.

But the thunder was real, and so was the throbbing of his heartbeat, half heard above the cabin clatter of the pitching plane.

He raised himself in his seat, turning to stare at the drawn window-blind. It had been a nightmare. The blind was closed, there was nothing beyond it; nothing out there at all except the storm. What a dream that had been!

But he was fully awake now, fully aware of his surroundings, and there was nothing to fear. Nothing to fear but fear itself. Nothing outside that window.

He turned away slowly to face the seat back directly before him. Perhaps if he closed his eyes again, sleep would return; a quiet peaceful sleep without dreams.

Valentine tried to lean back, tried to lower his lids again, but his eyes refused to close.

What was the matter with him now? Had he gone so far over the edge that he was even afraid of falling asleep?

That blind—

Valentine took a deep breath. Only one way to put an end to such nonsense. Forcing himself upright, he inhaled deeply once more. Then, leaning forward, he reached out, yanking up the blind.

And there, grinning at him through the window, was the face. The hideous mocking face of his nightmare.

Valentine screamed.

He jerked his head to one side, but not before catching a glimpse of the creature's upright hand. Clutched in its claws was a metallic object—a tangled cluster of steel fragments that looked as though they'd been tom from the plane's engine.

Valentine screamed again. As his head swiveled in the direction of the aisle, he saw them running toward him—the junior stewardess, the fat man from the forward seat, the uniformed copilot.

Valentine fragmented his scream into words.

"It's out there. It's real!" He began to sob hysterically. "What's happening to me?"

Then they were upon him, pinning him against his seat. Staring past the circle of troubled faces he caught a glimpse of the little girl standing in the aisle behind them. She was holding something before her face and for an instant her features were obscured by a flash of light. Then Valentine realized what was happening. The little brat had taken his picture!

Impulsively he struggled to rise. Hands darted out from the circle around him, pushing him down. The copilot turned his head, shouting an order that Valentine was unable to hear above the roar of the engine.

Gasping, Valentine managed to free his right arm, but only for a moment. Just long enough to stab his forefinger in the direction of the window.

"There it is!" he shouted. "Look—"

They were looking now and as they did so, their expressions changed. Valentine stared up, searching their faces for a reaction he did not find. And when they turned back to him, there was no horror in their eyes; only pity.

Somehow that was even harder for him to bear than horror. Still sobbing, he forced his gaze toward the window. Beyond the rectangular pane there was only darkness.

The face had disappeared.

Crazy. I'm going mad, he told himself. But they were all crazy, all these nice, normal people who were holding him down as if he were some kind of wild animal, ready to spring at their throats."And as the fat man eased off from his kneeling position on the armrest beside him, Valentine noted something that was crazier still. Just before the bunched-up trouser leg slid back down to cover the man's bulging calf, Valentine saw that he was wearing a gun strapped to his ankle. Valentine blinked. What gives here? Don't tell me I'm hallucinating again.

A moment later the explanation came as the fat man turned to the copilot and pulled a wallet from his jacket pocket. Opening it, he exhibited a badge.

"Sky marshal, eh?" The copilot nodded. "Good thing you're here."

Valentine relaxed momentarily. At least the presence of the gun was explained now; its reality assured him he wasn't that crazy.

Now the senior stewardess was coming down the aisle. As she moved toward the group, he noted that she was holding her right hand behind her back. Valentine groaned inwardly. Was she going to feed him more pills?

As she approached, the copilot turned to glance at the passengers clustering concernedly in the aisle behind him. He spoke with quiet authority.

"I want you all to please return to your seats. I'd like a word alone with Mr. Valentine."

He nodded at the younger stewardess. She moved beyond the range of Valentine's vision, herding the curious onlookers toward the rear of the plane. But the little girl still stood behind the senior stewardess, and now she stared down at what was concealed behind Miss St. John's back, her eyes widening.

"Handcuffs!" she exclaimed. "Far out!"

Valentine glanced up in shock as the senior stewardess brought her right hand forward, abandoning any further attempt at concealment. The steel cuffs dangled before him, glittering under the light of the reading lamp, but his eyes never left her face. She reddened before his accusing gaze, her expression conveying a mixture of contrition and concern.

Across the aisle, the fat sky marshal sank into the seat formerly occupied by the little girl. Miraculously, the child's mother had managed to remain asleep through all the confusion, but now she awoke and stared with blinking eyes at the handcuffs, which the senior stewardess was holding, then at the little girl standing beside her. She nudged the fat man as she spoke. "Don't tell me they're going to put those things on my kid! What has she done this time!"

The fat man turned to her and began to whisper an explanation. Then Valentine lost sight of the duo as the copilot reached over him and gently slid the window-blind down.

"Now then," he said softly. "What seems to be the problem?"

“Nothing at all,” Valentine told him. “I’m sorry I shouted.”

For a moment he hesitated, wondering whether or not the copilot could be trusted with the truth. Then his eyes strayed to the handcuffs, which the senior stewardess held before her, and the answer came quickly. He couldn’t trust them and they certainly weren’t trusting him. No sense trying to tell the truth; obviously they wouldn’t believe him. He’d have to play it their way. “I had a nightmare,” he said.

The copilot nodded. “I’m aware of that, Mr. Valentine. But you’ve got to understand my position. This plane is flying in a severe storm. There’s no immediate danger, but frankly we’ve got our hands full up front as it is. Now I have a passenger acting irrationally, threatening the safety of my aircraft. That leaves me with two choices. If there is no further disturbance, I can ignore the problem. Or else I can ask the sky marshal over there to apply these handcuffs.” He paused, letting the message sink in. “What would you do, Mr. Valentine?”

Valentine hesitated before replying. He scanned the faces before him, reading the question in the copilot’s eyes, the senior stewardess’s concern, the little girl’s gleeful excitement. No, he couldn’t afford to tell the truth—not the whole truth, anyway. But somehow he had to impress them with their peril. Taking a deep breath, he spoke quickly.

“I’ll level with you. Being suspended up here at thirty-five thousand feet in the middle of a storm, with no visible means of support, scares me.” He took another deep breath, then continued. “On the other hand, reason tells me I’m perfectly safe. Under normal circumstances we ought to get through this all in one piece. Trouble is, these circumstances are not normal. You know it and I know it. We’re in trouble. And if we ignore that fact, we’re all going to die—”

“What fact?” The copilot frowned. “What exactly are you saying?”

The copilot’s frown deepened. “What do you mean?”

“It is not working,” Valentine said.

“Which engine?”

Valentine met his stare. “Outboard number one.”

The copilot and the senior stewardess exchanged troubled glances, and then the uniformed man bent over Valentine, speaking softly. “How could you know that?”

Valentine shrugged. “I just know it,” he said. “Don’t ask me how.”

Now it was the copilot’s turn to take a deep breath. “All right, Mr. Valentine. Maybe you had a hunch, or maybe you just made a lucky guess, but it’s true. Nine minutes ago, engine number one was struck by lightning. There was a flame-out. The point is, we still have three engines functioning perfectly. There’s no reason to alarm the other passengers and no reason to alarm yourself. Take my word for it—we’re perfectly capable of remaining airborne under our present power without any further problems.” He glanced down at his watch. “I estimate we’ll touch down in twenty minutes.”

So that’s that, Valentine told himself. At least they’d got the message and maybe there’d be no more trouble now; all he could do was hope that the flight crew did their job. If he said any more, it would only make matters worse. He glanced up at the copilot and smiled. “Thanks for the explanation. What you say makes sense, of course, and I promise I won’t trouble you any further.”

As the copilot nodded, the aircraft pitched violently. For a moment Valentine lost his cool. “Go fly the plane!” he cried.

The voice of the old lady rose from the seat behind him. “Good idea! We’ll behave ourselves, won’t we, sonny?”

Once more the copilot glanced at the senior stewardess, then turned and started down the aisle. As he disappeared from view, the senior stewardess leaned forward. “Don’t worry, Mr. Valentine. You heard what he said—we’ll be on the tarmac in twenty minutes.”

But her words were punctuated by a loud bang as the plane bucked again and the overhead compartment flew open. She reached up to close it, but another violent lurch toppled her backward across the aisle and into the lap of the sky marshal.

Almost simultaneously, three more overhead lockers burst open. The door of a closet opposite the galley suddenly swung forward. An oxygen cylinder toppled out and began to roll down the aisle.

With each convulsive movement of the plane came an accompaniment of terrifying sound—a combination of structural stress and engine protest that resonated through the confines of the cabin. Over the violent vibration, the murmur of frightened passengers arose.

Leaning forward, Valentine peered along the aisle. Nobody was watching him now. The young couple up ahead were clinging to each other like frightened monkeys swaying in a storm-swept treetop. The fat man was clutching the armrest, his eyes closed, jowls quivering. The little girl in the seat before him gripped her precious Polaroid tightly. Valentine couldn't see her face, nor that of the elderly woman seated behind him, but he heard her clearly as she addressed the old man beside her:

"This is not very amusing!"

"What do you mean?" her husband replied. "It's a million laughs! Haven't you ever been on a roller coaster before?"

Valentine wasn't laughing. And this wasn't a roller coaster ride. It wasn't just turbulence either—something besides the storm was responsible for such rapid pitching and yawing—the sensation was so intense that it felt as if the entire plane was being ripped and shaken by some gigantic hand. Something else was at work out there, some maniacal force—

Impulsively, he reached out and jerked up the window-blind. Staring past his reflection, staring through the rushing rain streaming over the wing, staring through the inky darkness punctuated by the flicker of the beacon light, he saw it again.

The naked man—the ape, the creature—was crouching at the far end and rocking the wing flaps back and forth. Valentine's eyes widened in shock as the creature turned to acknowledge his presence with a ghastly grin. Valentine jerked his head away, seeking reassurance in reality.

But as his eyes scanned the confines of the cabin, he found no comfort. Fighting to maintain balance in the midst of momentum of motion, the young couple still clung to one another; the little girl gripped her camera in one hand and clung to her armrest with the other as she bounced in rhythm to every pitch and plunge. Across the aisle, the sky marshal hunched forward with lowered head, ashen lips moving as he twisted the beads in his hand,' reciting the rosary.

Stifling an impulse to scream, Valentine turned to stare out the window once again. What he saw stunned him into silence.

The silver-skinned creature was sitting astride the inboard engine, its claws ripping off the cowling!

No use trying to scream now; Valentine's throat muscles were contracted with terror.

As the cowling tore loose, the creature dipped one clawlike hand into the opening, pulling out bits and pieces of the engine and tossing them over his shoulder.

Valentine shuddered convulsively, trying to avert his gaze, but his paralyzed muscles refused to respond.

Now, incredibly, the apparition squatting on the wing was tearing loose a fuel line. Oil gushed forth, spraying like water from a garden hose. As Valentine watched, the creature bent forward, encircling the loose end with greedy lips.

Oh no he's drinking from it!

Summoning all his strength, Valentine heaved backward and turned to face the cabin's interior once more.

Here another shock awaited him. The little girl stood in the aisle beside him, swaying to maintain her balance and aiming her Polaroid toward his face.

"No you don't!" Valentine cried. "Give it to me!" His hand lunged out, tugging the camera from her grasp. Then he turned to the window, raising the Polaroid and squinting through the view-finder until it focused on the figure beyond the pane. The camera clicked; lowering it, he tore the strip of exposed film free and held it up, waiting for the photo to develop.

"Hey, turkey! Gimme that back!" The child grabbed at the camera in his other hand and Valentine made no resistance. As she moved away he sat in agonized impatience, watching the image emerge on the film. Gradually a shadowy shape appeared, still blurred and indistinguishable.

The plane lurched sharply. Holding the print between his fingers, Valentine jerked around in his seat to peer through the window once more.

The creature had changed position. For a moment Valentine was conscious of a bulge between its shoulder blades as though the thing had a hump on its back. But there was no time to discern it clearly; all he could do was stare as the creature leaned over the leading edge of the engine pod. It was throwing fragments of the engine into the turbine intake!

The engine screamed its protest through the night. The creature looked up at Valentine with its mocking grin, then dropped more metal fragments into the intake. The plane thrashed violently.

Valentine let the photo fall from his hand. Who cared about the picture—if that creature out there wasn't stopped, another engine would be destroyed and then—

Something bumped against the base of Valentine's seat. Glancing down, he saw the oxygen cylinder rolling in the aisle below. Scooping it up he lunged at the window, smashing at the Plexiglas. As he did so, he found his voice and raised it in a shout.

"It's real, there's a thing out there—!"

The sky marshal dived across the aisle, dragging him away from the window. As they fell back, Valentine let the oxygen cylinder drop. For a moment the two men struggled, but the fat man's weight was no match for the strength born of Valentine's fear. Desperately, he freed his right hand and reached down to yank the hand gun from the sky marshal's ankle holster. Wrenching free, he aimed the weapon at the window and fired.

There was a shatter of glass—then the irresistible rush of air as the cabin decompressed. Magazines, plastic cups, and table napkins whirled wildly. Oxygen masks dropped from the ceiling, dangling and twisting like suspended serpents.

The force of the implosion sucked Valentine halfway through the window and the fat man grabbed his legs, hanging on for dear life. Icy wind ripped across his face, filling his nostrils with frozen fire and half blinding him with its fury.

In the aisle behind them the senior stewardess staggered and fell; plates and silverware poured forth from the galley shelves. Amidst screams and shouts drowned by the sound of the wind, a thump echoed as the overhead projecter module dropped down from the ceiling and the inflight movie started up on its own accord. As the movie screen swung back and forth in the gusting wind, the studio logo flickered on.

Valentine saw none of this. Still protruding halfway from the window, thrashing about against the horrendous wind-blast as the fat man frantically clutched his legs, he stared out at the creature on the wing.

Now it turned, grinning again.

It's coming after me!

Summoning his last ounce of strength, Valentine raised the hand gun still clutched between his fingers and fired.

The bullet found its mark in the creature's stomach. Casually, the thing reached down and plucked the missile off his hide the way one would remove some annoying insect. Raising the bullet to his gaping mouth, he swallowed it.

Then he advanced along the wing toward Valentine.

Valentine squeezed the trigger again . . . and again . . .

The creature's claws rose with blinding speed, picking the bullets out of the air like flies, gulping them down as he moved nearer.

Ultimately, Valentine's finger kept pressing the trigger, even after he realized the bullets were spent.

Now, as he looked up, the grinning face loomed before him. One claw darted out and Valentine felt the cruel talons close around his wrist. Then it released its grip and grabbed the gun.

Raising the weapon to its mouth the creature began to chomp on the barrel, chewing it up bit by bit like a child eating a candy bar.

At that moment a bright light burst from somewhere below, flaring up into its face.

The creature glanced down quickly and Valentine followed its gaze.

Below him he saw the landing lights of the airport-runway beacons blazing through the clear air beneath the cloudbank.

The silvery thing turned back again, frowning for a moment, its arms extended. Valentine, wedged in the window, waited his final fate.

Then, as the lights grew stronger, the monstrosity glanced at him once more. For a moment, Valentine could have sworn it winked at him, its outstretched claw waggling in a playful gesture.

Playful? Had it merely been playing all along? Now it turned and Valentine watched as the humplike mass between its shoulder blades suddenly extended and expanded into webbed wings. The creature moved back, its wings spreading wide, then plunged forward and soared off into the night.

That was when Valentine fainted.

He was still unconscious when the wheels of the aircraft touched the glistening tarmac. He didn’t see the passengers or hear their excited interchange as they stumbled down the steps and straggled across to the terminal gates. He wasn’t aware of being pulled back to safety in the cabin as the plane made its descent, nor did he awaken when the ambulance crew arrived to bring him out of the cabin and wheel him into the waiting ambulance below.

He never saw the fully developed Polaroid he’d taken and perhaps that was just as well.

It was the senior stewardess who picked it up eventually from the debris-strewn cabin floor and stared down at the image—the image of Valentine. He had taken a photo of his own reflection.

Nor did Valentine see the mangled, smoking engines as the ground crew clustered around them. One of the mechanics approached with a scowl. “Hey—what gives?”

Then he and the others stepped back hastily. There was a shrill grating sound as the inboard pod gave way, and the engine dropped onto the tarmac with a crash.

The scowling mechanic shook his head, then raised his eyes to ask the final question: "What happened up there?"

There was no answer. The skies above were clear in the gathering twilight.

Or were they. . . .?

The Shrink and the Nympho

Angela was adorable. Tall, blonde and twenty, she had more curves than a roller-coaster and much better seating-accommodations.

Young Dr. Degradian was no fool. Five minutes after she entered the office he had her on the couch.

So much for the joys of psychiatry.

Now it was time to begin the process known as case-entry. And this was one case Dr. Degradian felt sorely tempted to enter—until she began to talk.

Notebook in hand, he seated himself in a chair beside her, pencil poised. "What's the first thing that comes into your mind?" he asked.

"Milton."

"Who?"

"My husband."

Dr. Degradian frowned. "You didn't tell me you were married."

"I'm not. He died last Thursday."

Dr. Degradian made a note. "How did it happen?"

"He fell off a ladder."

"Was he a painter?"

"No—a voyeur. He was looking through this second-storey window at a motel when the ladder broke."

"I see."

"That's what he used to say all the time—'I see.' " Angela shrugged. "Our marriage was never consummated, you know. He died on our wedding night, and now I'm just a poor widow. All he left me was the broken ladder and a pair of binoculars."

"Did you know he was a voyeur when you married him?"

"I should have guessed. He kept telling me I was a sight for sore eyes." Angela smiled coquettishly. "Do you find me attractive?"

Dr. Degradian shook his head. "This is a psychiatric examination, not a beauty contest. We are here to find the source of your mental disturbance—"

"Not mental. Physical."

"You are physically disturbed?"

"Constantly." Angela nodded. "I'm no expert on the subject, but it doesn't seem possible that anyone could keep up such a pace—sometimes ten, even fifteen times a night."

"You're sleeping with somebody?"

"Who sleeps?" Angela sighed.

Dr. Degradian made another note. "Tell me about this man."

"He isn't a man. He's an incubus."

"A what?"

"An incubus." She blushed, tossing her golden curls. "A demon who has carnal relations with women in their sleep. Look it up in your dictionary if you don't believe me."

"I know what an incubus is," Dr. Degradian said. "And I do believe you. You have these dreams—"

"It's not a dream!" Angela sat up, eyes flashing. "I told you I don't sleep. The minute I turn out the light and climb into bed he shows up out of nowhere and starts fooling around. At first I tried to stall him—I said I had a headache, but he didn't listen, just ripped off my nightie and bam!"

"Bam? What does that mean?"

For the next fifteen minutes she explained what it meant; explained in such detail that Dr. Degradian found himself trying to make notes long after there was no more lead in his pencil.

"Good Lord!" The young psychiatrist stared at her. "I've never heard such graphic porno! And you say this is only the foreplay?"

“Two-play,” Angela murmured. “I don’t think I could stand it if there was another couple involved.”

“And this goes on every evening? He comes in and rips off your nightie—”

“Not any more. I ran out of nighties so now I just go to bed in the nude.” Angela gazed at him imploringly. “That’s why I’m here, Doctor. You’ve got to help me, before I catch my death of cold.”

“Of course.” Dr. Degradian reached for a fresh pencil and scribbled out several prescriptions. “Here, get these filled at the pharmacy downstairs.”

“What are they for?”

“Tranquilizers and a sedative.”

“It’s no use. I’m sure he won’t take them.”

“They’re for you. To help you sleep.” Dr. Degradian smiled reassuringly. “I want to see you again on Wednesday, same time. I think I can promise you that by then your incubus will have disappeared.”

“Thank you, Doctor. I certainly hope so.”

And with a grateful smile and a farewell wiggle, she was gone.

Gone, but not forgotten. During the next two days Dr. Degradian couldn’t put the girl out of his mind. What a shame that so lovely a young lady should have these grotesque fantasies! And they were fantasies, he had no doubt of that—she was hallucinating about a mythical creature out of medieval legend. It was obviously a classic case of sexual frustration, but the dosage he’d prescribed would put an end to her nightmares. Once they disappeared he’d have no need to explain she’d been imagining things; it would all be self-evident. And as Wednesday neared he found himself happily anticipating her arrival.

Promptly at three she swept in, trailing a cloud of perfume, and settled herself on the couch.

“Well,” he said. “How did everything work out?”

"Don't talk to me about work-outs!" Her full lips formed a provocative pout. "Did you ever try doing it when you were half-asleep?"

Dr. Degradian blinked. "You mean you still have these dreams?"

Angela's eyes flashed blue fire. "I told you it's not a dream! There really is an incubus. Please, Doctor, isn't there something you can do?"

"Certainly." The psychiatrist nodded. "There are several ways. Normally we might rid you of this obsession by using electro-shock therapy, but that's not practical, now that electricity-bills are so high. Perhaps we should opt for more orthodox methods. If you can arrange to come in five days a week for the next three years—"

"Three years?" She stared at him incredulously.

"You don't understand. A thorough analysis takes that much time to talk things out."

"You're the one who doesn't understand," Angela said. "This thing isn't going to be talked out of it. No matter what I say he just keeps bamming away." She rose, sighing. "Obviously you can't help me. I should have gone to Father O'Flannery in the first place."

"Father O'Flannery?"

"The priest at the church down the street. I'm going to ask him to perform an exorcism."

Dr. Degradian frowned. "Surely you're not serious? Nobody believes in such nonsense nowadays."

"Father O'Flannery does." Angela nodded. "Just last Sunday he preached a sermon about casting out demons. He even told us how it's done. First they open all the windows, then they start with the ceremony. Plenty of fresh air and exorcise, that's the cure."

Dr. Degradian bit his lip. No sense arguing; of course he had no faith in exorcism or in incubi either, but she did. And that was the point. If this superstitious ritual could rid her of her fixation, so be it.

"I wish you luck," he said.

"Thank you, Doctor."

Then she was gone, leaving a scent of perfume behind.

In the days that passed the scent vanished, but not the memories—memories of her perfume, and her behind. Dr. Degradian lost a little sleep himself wondering about the girl. Could it be that he had more than a professional interest in her? Here he was, just thirty years old, a reputable psychiatrist with an established practise and already the owner of his first condominium. He should be thinking of his career, maybe buying a second couch, but instead he found himself mooning over a patient. He remembered the last words of his sainted mother on her deathbed.

"Promise me just one thing," she whispered. "Don't ever get mixed up with a Nutsy Fagan."

Over the weekend Dr. Degradian recalled her plea and made a firm resolution. But on Monday afternoon, when Angela came in, his resolution turned to flab. One look at her and he knew the truth—he had fallen in love with a flake.

"Surprised to see me?" she said.

"Yes, I am." He ventured a wary smile. "Changed your mind, did you?"

"What do you mean? Father O'Flannery performed the exorcism Friday night."

"How did it go?"

"Very quickly. So quickly that Father never even had a chance to see it."

"But you're sure the incubus was exorcised?"

"Positive."

"Then what's wrong?"

"Father O'Flannery." She fluttered her eyelashes nervously. "You see, once the incubus was gone, that left just the two of us. There I was, lying naked on the bed, and there was Father O'Flannery standing over me with that big font in his hand, and—well, it just happened—"

Dr. Degradian's eyes widened. "You seduced a priest?"

"It wasn't a seduction." She reddened. "Like I told you, he had this perfectly enormous font, and the next thing you know—"

"Bam."

"Several bams." Angela sighed. "It was then I realized I still had a problem."

"And what about Father O'Flannery?"

"I'm afraid the poor man took it very hard, if you'll pardon the expression. When we talked afterwards he said he'd decided to leave the priesthood and enter a convent."

"You mean a monastery."

"No, a convent. He's not gay, you know."

"These things happen." Dr. Degradian nodded. "You mustn't burden yourself by feeling guilty."

"That's just it," Angela said. "I don't feel guilty. I feel—neglected."

"Neglected?"

"Well, I mean, all this happened on Friday night. Saturday and Sunday night I slept like a baby."

"So?"

"I'm not a baby! I'm a woman, and I haven't had sex for two whole nights in a row."

Dr. Degradian took a deep breath. "You really do need help."

"Exactly." Angela dropped onto the couch and lay back, smiling. "I knew I could count on you. But would you mind locking the door first?"

Now it was Dr. Degradian's turn to redden. "None of that, young lady," he said. "If you really want help, just sit up and pay attention. Get into this chair and let me run a Rorschach on you."

"In a chair? Oh, neat—"

"It's a test," the psychiatrist told her. "I want you to look at these inkblots and tell me what you see."

He held up the first card. "What does this look like?"

"That's easy. It's a whale."

"Are you sure?"

"Of course. It's a sperm whale."

Dr. Degradian gulped and reached for a second card. Angela stared at it, nodding. "This one is a bird."

"A bird?"

"Yes. A cockatoo."

He held up a third card. "And this?"

Angela studied the squiggles. "A man and a woman, twisting each other's necks around."

"And what does that mean?"

"They're screwing their heads off."

The psychiatrist threw the rest of the cards in the wastebasket. "Angela, let me speak frankly. You are suffering from a severe case of sexual fixation."

"Is it contagious?"

"I certainly hope not. And there may be a remedy, if you'll permit me to suggest it."

"Go ahead." Angela smiled in happy anticipation. "Be as suggestive as you like."

Dr. Degradian leaned forward. "Last year I had a patient with a complaint very similar to your own. Her obsession with sex reached the point where she was taking obscene phone-calls even when they were collect."

"You cured her?"

"No, but a gynecologist did." He nodded. "I came to the conclusion that her mental condition was linked to a physical disturbance. So I sent her to a gynecologist and sure enough, he discovered she had a chronic inflammation of the uterus. A few days of medication and her troubles were over."

"Do you think something like that is wrong with me?"

"Let's find out." Dr. Degradian buzzed his receptionist on the intercom. "Miss Carriage? Get me Mount Sinus Hospital. I want to refer a patient to Dr. Pruritis. That's right, the specialist—eye, ear, nose and vagina—"

Angela listened as he set up an appointment for her the following morning.

"Let me see you tomorrow afternoon when it's over," he told her. "With any luck, this could be the solution to your sexual problems."

She rose and wiggled to the door. "I'll keep my fingers crossed."

"Good idea," Dr. Degradian said. "Also your legs."

It was already five o'clock next afternoon when Angela appeared at Dr. Degradian's office.

"Sorry I'm late," she said. "I got waylaid."

"I know." The psychiatrist frowned. "Dr. Pruritis just called me." He shook his head. "It's unbelievable—an old man like that—how could you do such a thing?"

"It was easy. All I did was—"

"Spare me the details." He sat back, sighing. "Poor old Pruritis! You have just ruined one of the profession's finest and most upstanding members."

"But I didn't ruin it," the girl protested. "As a matter of fact, he told me it had never felt better in years."

"Incredible." Dr. Degradian shook his head. "And here I thought we were making progress."

"But we are. Didn't he tell you the results of the examination?"

"That's just it. He said you were in perfect physical condition. No inflammation, infection or abnormality whatsoever. Which means the trouble is all in your mind. If you'd just consent to analysis and put your trust in me and Medicare—"

"I can't wait three years." The blue eyes clouded with tears. "The way I feel now I can't wait three minutes. I need him now."

"Who?"

"The incubus. I want him back."

"But my dear young lady—"

"I'm not your dear young lady!" Angela began to sob quietly. "And if you won't help me I won't be your patient, either." She started for the door and Dr. Degradian raised his hand hastily.

“Let’s talk this over—”

“Talking doesn’t work. I’ve had enough of that, Dr. Degradian.” She paused abruptly. “You’re Armenian, aren’t you?”

He nodded.

“And is it true most Armenian names end in ‘ian’?”

“Yes. That means ‘son of.’ ”

“Then you ought to call yourself Dr. Bitchian!”

“Now see here—”

“I’m sorry.” Angela’s voice softened. “It’s just that I’m so uptight. I thought the incubus was bad, but now that he’s gone this hangup is ten times worse. I don’t want to go through the rest of my life coming on with every man I meet. If there was only some way to get the incubus back again —”

Once more her sobs began, and Dr. Degradian’s heart melted in her tears.

“Stop sniffling,” he told her. “Perhaps there is a way.”

“You mean you could do it?”

“Give me a chance to think. This is Friday. Suppose you come in on Monday afternoon.”

Angela stared at him, new hope in her eyes. “Can you really bring the incubus back for me?”

“I’ll try,” said Dr. Degradian.

Alone in his office, he pondered the problem. Removing a patient’s hallucinations was part of his job, but restoring them would be quite another matter. Nothing in psychiatric procedure offered any precedent, and he’d have to start from square one.

Suppose Angela had been right and he’d been wrong? Suppose there actually was such a thing as an incubus? She thought so, and so did the priest who’d exorcised it. And since the exorcism had worked, maybe the incubus did exist.

But if so, how could he find it? You just don't look up an incubus in the Yellow Pages—

Stung by inspiration, he reached for the phone-book, then riffled through it as he searched for the proper heading.

Obstetricians, Ophthalmologists, Opticians—nothing there. He turned back a few pages and suddenly he found it.

Occultists.

The list was long and the accompanying display advertisements were of little help. He couldn't use a palmist, a spirit medium, or a team of fortune-tellers who promised to work their crystal balls off for you.

For a moment he was tempted by a necromancer who proclaimed "You Raise the Cash—We Raise the Dead! Contact the corpse of your choice without paying a stiff price! All Major Credit Cards Accepted."

It sounded good, but he wasn't looking for a chance to palaver with a cadaver. The incubus, if such a thing existed, was very much alive. He needed someone specializing in witchcraft or black magic.

Suddenly his eyes strayed to the bottom of the listings. "Malcolm Hex, M.D. Practising witchdoctor. Call anytime—midnight til dawn."

He reached for the phone.

Promptly at the stroke of twelve, Dr. Degradian entered the witch-doctor's office in a rundown section of town and seated himself in the shabby little reception-room. He picked up a tattered copy of Who's Who in Hoodoo but before he could start reading it in the guttering candlelight Malcolm Hex appeared and ushered him into his private office.

The office looked encouraging; its walls were covered with magical spells scrawled in chicken-blood and there was a goat-skeleton hanging at one corner. Malcolm Hex was obviously a black magician, black as the ace of spades.

It seemed a little strange to see this tall man in a conventional business suit seated behind his desk while he stirred the contents of a bubbling cauldron, and Dr. Degradian couldn’t control his curiosity.

“What’s in the pot?” he inquired.

“Just the usual voodoo goo.” Malcolm Hex smiled. “Bat brains, human entrails, lizard eyes, that sort of thing.”

“Toadstools?”

“No. My toads are all constipated.”

Dr. Degradian stared uneasily at a shrunken head dangling from the ceiling; it reminded him of his congressman. “Your ad said you’re an M.D.,” he said.

“And so I am.” Malcolm Hex nodded. “Master of Demonology. Graduated from Miskatonic University back in ’78.”

“Can you conjure up a demon?”

“Evocation is my vocation. Just say the word and I’ll say the spell.”

“What about an incubus?”

“No problem.” The black man rose, stripping off his jacket and shirt. He stood there, naked to the waist, his body glistening in the candlelight as he rubbed a pungent ointment into his gleaming torso. “I always scrub before an operation,” he said.

Reaching into a desk-drawer he pulled out a jar of newt’s blood and smeared its contents over his face, then stuck a gleaming white object in his nose.

“What’s that?” the psychiatrist asked.

“Just a baby’s femur. I’ve got to bone up for the occasion.”

Malcolm Hex began to stir the cauldron again, using a rooster’s claw, and a hiss of steam arose. “Now about this incubus of yours,” he said. “Are you quite sure that’s what you want? Most of my male clients prefer a succubus.”

Dr. Degradian reddened. “This isn’t for me. It’s for a young lady I know.”

“I see. Suppose you tell me about her.”

“Well to begin with, she’s a widow—”

Malcolm Hex frowned and stopped stirring. Then he took the bone out of his nose and dropped it into the pot.

“Sorry,” the black man said. “I don’t do widows.”

Sunday arrived, and with it came a call from Dr. Degradian’s answering-service. He dialed the number given to him and Angela’s voice greeted him.

“Any luck?” she murmured.

“Not yet. But I’m still trying.”

“You’d better come up with something,” she told him. “If not, I’m leaving town tomorrow.”

The psychiatrist’s heart skipped a beat. “Where on earth are you going?”

“Bangkok. I like the name.”

She hung up, leaving him speechless. Poor girl—he knew he couldn’t bear to lose her now, but how could he prevent it?

Desperately, Dr. Degradian wrestled with his problem and lost. If the witch-doctor wouldn’t help, he’d have to do the job himself.

Way to go—and he went. The psychiatrist spent the entire morning racing from one bookstore to another. Most of them were closed, and the few remaining open couldn’t supply him with what he needed.

It was late afternoon when he stumbled into a dingy second-hand shop and unearthed the proper volume from behind a dusty stack in the rear of the establishment, wedged beside an autographed copy of the Bible.

Back at home he spent the entire evening hours feverishly scanning the crumbling yellowed pages of the ancient iron-bound grimoire, translating the Latin text as he did so. Just before midnight he found the right incantation, and another hour passed before he finished drawing the pentagram on the kitchen floor, set the tall candles in place, and began to utter the spell aloud.

As he did so he was still conscious of his own doubts. Here he was, the member of an illustrious profession that included such historic figures as

Sigmund Freud and Dr. Joyce Brothers, resorting to sorcery! But he had no choice, and if it worked—

A rumbling sound arose. Suddenly his nostrils were assailed with the noxious odor of sulphur and brimstone, like rush-hour on the freeway.

Then, just beyond the chalk-drawn outline of the pentagram, a towering spiral of smoke whirled and coalesced into solid shape.

Dr. Degradian stared at the incubus in horror as it squatted before him.

The naked body was manlike, but its skin was green and purple; no man ever wore such horns or looked so horny. It was an incubus, no doubt of that, for now its grinning countenance changed into the face of Burt Reynolds.

“Jesus Christ!” the psychiatrist muttered.

“Sorry—you must have the wrong spell,” the creature told him. “I’m an incubus.” He gestured towards his thighs.

“I can see that, all right,” Dr. Degradian said. “You certainly are well-organized.”

“Flattery will get you nowhere,” the creature growled. “Why did you summon me?”

“I have a task for you.”

The incubus blinked its scaly eyelids. “What sort of task?”

“No big deal. Just the usual.”

The demon cringed. “Please—” He sighed loudly, and the dishes in the kitchen cupboard began to shake. “In case you don’t know it, I happen to be the last of my line. Nobody else does this sort of thing any more, and I’m all booked up. Fed up, too.” He sighed again, breaking several glasses on the sink-top. “If you only knew how sick I am of visiting all those little old ladies in the retirement homes—all those members of Women’s Lib—”

“It’s nothing like that,” Dr. Degradian soothed.

But the incubus ignored him. “You don’t know what I’ve been through,” he croaked. “In the good old days, before this damned permissiveness came in, everything was easy. I dated good-looking unmarried women, beautiful young wives with elderly husbands, even school-girls. A little loving went a long way and giving them what they wanted was a piece of cake, in a manner of speaking. But today—" The incubus shuddered. "Today they've all read those sex-manuals, they've watched too many X-rated movies." He gestured towards his face. "I even have to keep changing my appearance to satisfy them. First it was Paul Newman, then Robert Redford. Now it's this Burt Reynolds character, and next year I suppose I'll have to do an entire rock-group. Look at me—I'm worn out, nothing but skin and bones! It's getting so I'm not even good for a one-night stand any more. What I need is a leave of absence, a black sabbatical. And you expect me to take on a new job?"

Dr. Degradian shrugged. "Calm yourself. It's not a new job. All I want you to do is go back to an old one. There's a girl named Angela—"

"Angela?" The creature began to tremble. "Oh no—not Angela!"

"You remember her?"

"Remember her?" the incubus wailed. "Why do you think I'm in this condition? She's the one who really wore me out. Another go-round with her and I'll be wearing a truss!" He shook his head so emphatically that his horns rattled. "No way! Angela is a nympholept. An incubus can't help her—what she needs is a psychiatrist."

"But you're my last chance—"

"Sorry." The thing rose from his crouching position and yawned wearily, blowing out several candles in the process. "Now if you'll excuse me, I must be on my way. I'm calling it a night just as soon as I finish at the orphanage."

"Orphanage?"

The incubus nodded. "It's my duty," he murmured. "You know the old saying—spare the rod and spoil the child."

Then, in a puff of smoke, he disappeared.

Monday dawned. Dr. Degradian scrubbed the kitchen floor and aired the place out, then sank into bed and an uneasy slumber. He wouldn't have gone to the office at all if it wasn’t for Angela’s afternoon appointment.

He dragged himself in, carrying his load of guilt. He had failed the girl, failed himself, and now there was no hope to cling to.

Instead he clung to his desk as she breezed in, buoyant and lovely as ever, her eyes bright with expectation.

“How did you manage yesterday?” Dr. Degradian asked. “Were you able to cope?”

Angela blushed prettily. “There was no one to cope with,” she said. “Finally I went for a walk to take my mind off you-know-what.”

“Did that help?”

“Yes, a little. I lucked out by finding a construction site where I could watch the erection of a tall building.”

Dr. Degradian nodded, bracing himself for the inevitable question.

The blue eyes turned to him, alive with anticipation. “And what about you, Doctor—did you get the incubus back?”

“I’m afraid not.”

The eyes began to brim with tears, and Dr. Degradian agonized at the sight of her despair. “He said you were a nympho, and no one could help you now but a psychiatrist.”

Angela stared at him. Then, surprisingly she smiled. “You’re a psychiatrist.”

Dr. Degradian shrugged. “But you refuse treatment. What can I do?”

“Marry me.”

“What—?”

“Marry me!” Angela rose. “Don’t you see I’ve had a thing about you all along?” She nodded eagerly. “Who needs an incubus anyway—all those horns and that smelly sulphur and brimstone!”

“But—”

“No buts. I’ve made up my mind. We’re going to get married!”

And then the nympho leapt.

The wedding took place the following week and Dr. Degradian stiffened himself for the ordeal ahead. That night, after Angela retired to bed, he was still undressing in the bathroom when she called to him.

"Coming," he said.

The prediction proved correct. And much to his astonishment his new bride was completely satisfied. Snuggling against the pillows she offered him a happy smile. "So that's what an orgasm is," she murmured. "I always wondered."

"You mean you never—?"

"Not until now." Angela put her arms around him. "Darling, do you think you could possibly—?"

"It seems highly probable," Dr. Degradian told her.

And so it turned out to be a happy marriage after all. As a matter of fact, she didn't really become frigid until almost three months later . . .

The Undead

Every evening at six Carol took off her glasses, but it didn’t seem to help. In the old movie reruns on TV, Cary Grant was always there to exclaim—with a mixture of surprise and gentlemanly lust—“Why, you’re beautiful without your glasses!”

No one had ever told Carol that, even though she really was beautiful, or almost so. With her light auburn hair, fair skin, regular features and sapphire-blue eyes, she needed only the benefit of contact lenses to perfect her image.

But why bother, when Cary Grant wasn’t around? The bookshop’s customers for first editions and rare manuscripts seemed more interested in caressing parchment than in fondling flesh.

And by nightfall the place was empty; even its owner had departed, leaving Carol to shut up shop, lock the doors, and set the alarms. With a valuable stock on hand she was always mindful of her responsibility.

Or almost always.

Tonight, seated in the rear office and applying her lipstick preparatory to departure, she was surprised to hear footsteps moving across the uncarpeted floor in the hall beyond.

Carol frowned and put her compact down on the desktop. She distinctly recalled turning out the shop lights, but in her preoccupation with self-pity could she have forgotten to lock the front entrance?

Apparently so, because now the footsteps halted and a figure appeared in the office doorway. Carol blinked at the black blur of the body surmounted by a white blob of head and hair.

Then she put on her glasses and the black blur was transformed into a dark suit, the white blob became the face of an elderly gentleman with a receding hairline. Both his suit and his face were wrinkled, but the old man's dignified bearing overshadowed sartorial shortcomings and the onslaughts of age. And when he spoke his voice was resonant.

"Good evening. Are you the proprietor of this establishment?"

"I'm sorry," Carol said. "He's already left. We're closed for the night."

"So I see." The stranger nodded. "Forgive me for intruding at this late hour, but I have traveled a long way and hoped I might still find him here."

"We open tomorrow at ten. He'll be here then. Or if you'd like to leave a message—"

"It is a matter of some urgency," the old man said. "Word has reached me that your firm recently came into the possession of a manuscript—a manuscript which supposedly disappeared over seventy years ago."

Carol nodded. "That's right. The Dracula original."

"You know the novel?"

"Of course. I read it years ago."

Reaching into his pocket the stranger produced an old-fashioned calling card and handed it to her. "Then perhaps you will find this name familiar."

Carol peered at the lettering. The Gothic typescript was difficult to decipher and she repeated aloud what she read.

"Abraham Van Helsing?"

"Correct." The old man smiled.

Carol shook her head. "Wait a minute. You don't expect me to believe —"

"That I am the namesake of my great-grandfather, Mynheer Doctor Professor Van Helsing of Amsterdam?" He nodded. "Oh yes, I can assure you that Dracula is not entirely a work of fiction. The identity of some of its characters was disguised, but others, like my illustrious ancestor, appeared under their own names. Now do you understand why I am interested in the original manuscript?" As he spoke, the old man glanced at the safe in the far corner. "Is it too much to hope that you have it here?"

"I'm sorry," Carol said. "I'm afraid it's been sold."

"Sold?"

"Yes. The day after we sent out our announcement the phones started ringing. I've never seen anything like it; just about every customer on our mailing list wanted to make a bid. And the final offer we got was simply fantastic."

"Could you tell me who purchased the manuscript?"

"A private collector. I don't know his name, because my boss didn't tell me. Part of the deal was that the buyer would remain completely anonymous. I guess he was afraid somebody would try to steal it from him."

The old man's frown conveyed a mingling of anger and contempt. "How very cautious of him! But then they were all cautious—concealing something which never truly belonged to any of them. That manuscript has been hidden away all these years because it was stolen in the first place. Stolen from the man to whom the author gave it in gratitude for providing him with the basis of the novel—my own greatgrandfather." He stared at Carol. "Who brought this to your employer?"

"He didn't tell me that, either. It's very hush-hush—"

"You see? Just as I told you. He must have known he had no right to possess it. Thieves, all of them!"

Carol shrugged. "Really, I didn't know."

"Of course. And I'm not blaming you, my dear young lady. But perhaps you can still be of some assistance to me. Did you happen to see the manuscript before it was sold?"

"Can you describe it?"

"Well, to begin with, it wasn't called Dracula. The handwritten title was The Undead."

"Ah yes." The old man nodded quickly. "That would be the original. What else can you recall about it?"

"The cover page was in Bram Stoker's handwriting, but the manuscript was typed. The author's changes and editorial corrections were done by hand, and so was the renumbering of the pages. It looked as though a lot of pages had been omitted—almost a hundred, I'd guess." Carol paused. "That's really just about all I remember."

"And more than enough. From your description there's no doubt it is the genuine manuscript." The old man nodded again. "You're sure about pages being omitted?"

"Yes, quite sure, because my boss commented on that. Why, is it important?"

"Very. It seems Bram Stoker was wiser than his informant. Although the published novel does refer to Count Dracula's plan to bring vampirism to England, this motive is not stressed. What the missing pages contained is what Van Helsing revealed about Dracula's ultimate goal—to spread vampirism throughout the world. They also presented factual proof of Dracula's existence, proof too convincing to be ignored. Stoker wrote down everything Van Helsing told him but had second thoughts about including it in his final draft. I wished to make certain, however, that those pages didn't still exist in manuscript form. Now that I know, it won't even be necessary to seek out the new owner."

"But you talk as though all this was true," Carol said. "It's only a novel. And Count Dracula gets killed in the end."

"Again an example of Stoker's caution," the old man told her. "He had to invent a death scene to reassure his readers. Even so, just think of the influence that novel has had on millions of people who learned of Dracula and vampirism through the book and the theater and films. As it is, many of them still half believe." The resonant voice deepened. "What do you think would have happened if Stoker hadn't novelized the story—if he'd written it for what it was, a true account of the actual experiences of Abraham Van Helsing? Even in novel form, if those missing pages still existed their message might bring a warning to the world which would endanger Dracula's plans."

Carol glanced at her watch as he spoke. Six-thirty. She was getting hungry and the old man's hangup was getting on her nerves. She stood up, forcing a smile.

“This has been very interesting,” she said. “But I really must close up now.”

“You have been most kind.” The old man smiled. “It seems a pity you do not entirely believe me, but I speak the truth. Count Dracula is as real as I am.”

Carol reached for her open compact on the desk. In the oval mirror she saw her reflection, but there was none of her visitor, even though he was standing quite close. Close enough for her to smell the rank breath, see the whiteness of the pointed teeth, feel the surprising strength of the hands that rose now to imprison her in their implacable grip.

As he forced her head back Carol’s glasses dislodged, clattering to the floor, and for a moment her image in the compact mirror was indeed quite beautiful. Then the bright droplets spurted down, blotting it out forever.

Everybody Needs A Little Love

During the 1960s, the odds were good that, if you were watching TV drama, it had been written by Rod Serling, Richard Matheson, Paddy Chayefsky, Charles Beaumont, Reginald Rose—or Robert Bloch. In winning awards from Screenwriters Guild and Writers Guild of America, his screenplays and scripts, many for Alfred Hitchcock, were beyond uncomputerized counting, and standard-setters for two media.

Yet Bloch, born April 5, 1917, in Chicago, has also found the invention and industry to write such hypnotically-named novels and stories as Out of the Mouths of Graves, Firebug, "The Scarf," Spiderweb, The Couch, "Yours Truly Jack the Ripper" Such Stuff as Screams Are Made Of, "The Old College Try"—oh, yes, and Strange Eons, Twilight Zone: The Motion Picture, Psycho, and Psycho II.

Robert A. Bloch sold his first story at 17 but earned his bread as a lecturer and ad copywriter, in Milwaukee, until the famous Psycho did for him what most writers pray their books will do, and Hollywood beckoned. He's remained, since 1960. William F. Nolan remarked, as editor of his Bantam anthology entitled The Sea of Space, that Bob has "produced more than four hundred stories and articles, some two-dozen books, plus radio and TV scripts uncounted." But Nolan's anthology was published in 1970!

Charles L. Grant, another anthologist, speaks of Bloch's fiction leaving an "afterimage." Stephen King, who admires the filmed Psycho as much as most, reminds us (in Danse Macabre) that Norman Bates' dichotomous disposition was well-drawn in Bob's pre-Hitchcock novel. The surprising twists of "Everybody Needs a Little Love," your upcoming love-feast, are state-of-the-art Bloch, told, as always, in his quick-paced style. Quite often, I might add, Robert Bloch is the state of this art.

It started out as a gag.

I'm sitting at the bar minding my own business, which was drinking up a storm, when this guy got to talking with me.

Curtis his name was, David Curtis. Big, husky-looking straight-arrow type; I figured him to be around thirty, same as me. He was belting it pretty good himself, so right off we had something in common. Curtis told me he was assistant manager of a department store, and since I'm running a videogame arcade in the same shopping mall we were practically neighbors. But talk about coincidence—turns out he'd just gotten a divorce three months ago, exactly like me.

Which is why we both ended up in the bar every night after work, at Happy Hour time. Two drinks for the price of one isn't a bad deal, not if you're trying to cut it with what's left after those monthly alimony payments.

"You think you got zapped?" Curtis said. "My ex-wife wiped me out. I'm not stuck for alimony, but I lost the house, the furniture and the car. Then she hits me for the legal fees and I wind up with zero."

"I read you," I told him. "Gets to the point where you want out so bad you figure it's worth anything. But like the old saying, sometimes the cure is worse than the disease."

"This is my cure," Curtis said, finishing his scotch and ordering another round. "Trouble is, it doesn't work."

"So why are you here?" I asked. "You ought to try that singles bar down the street. Plenty of action there."

"Not for me." Curtis shook his head. "That's where I met my ex. Last thing I need is a singles bar."

“Me neither,” I said. “But sometimes it’s pretty lonesome just sitting around the apartment watching the Late Show. And I’m not into cooking or housework.”

“I can handle that.” Curtis rattled his rocks and the bartender poured a refill. “What gets me is going out. Ever notice what happens when you go to a restaurant by yourself? Even if the joint is empty they’ll always steer you to one of those crummy little deuce-tables in back, next to the kitchen or the men’s john. The waiter gives you a dirty look because a loner means a smaller tip. And when the crowd starts coming in you can kiss service goodbye. The waiter forgets about your order, and when it finally comes, everything’s cold. Then, after you finish, you sit around ’til hell freezes, waiting for your check.”

“Right on,” I said. “So maybe you need a change of pace.”

“Like what?”

“Like taking a run up to Vegas some weekend. There’s always ads in the paper for bargain rates on airfare and rooms.”

“And every damned one of them is for couples.” Curtis thumped his glass down on the bar. “Two-for-one on the plane tickets. Double-occupancy for the rooms.”

“Try escort service,” I told him. “Hire yourself a date, no strings—”

“Not on my income. And I don’t want to spend an evening or a weekend with some yacky broad trying to make small-talk. What I need is the silent type.”

“Maybe you could run an ad for a deaf-mute?”

“Knock it off! This thing really bugs me. I’m tired of being treated like a cross between a leper and the Invisible Man.”

“So what’s the answer?” I said. “There’s got to be a way—”

“Damn betcha!” Curtis stood up fast, which was a pretty good trick, considering the load he was carrying.

“Where you going?” I asked.

“Come along and see,” he said.

Five minutes later I'm watching Curtis use his night-key to unlock the back door of the department store.

Ten minutes later he has me sneaking around outside a storeroom in the dark, keeping an eye out for the security guard.

Fifteen minutes later I'm helping Curtis load a window dummy into the back seat of his rental car.

Like I said, it started out as a gag.

At least that's what I thought it was when he stole Estelle. "That's her name," he told me. "Estelle."

This was a week later, the night he invited me over to his place for dinner. I stopped by the bar for a few quickies beforehand and when I got to his apartment I was feeling no pain. Even so, I started to get uptight the minute I walked in.

Seeing the window dummy sitting at the dinette table gave me a jolt, but when he introduced her by name it really rattled my cage.

"Isn't she pretty?" Curtis said.

I couldn't fault him on that. The dummy was something special—blonde wig, baby-blue eyes, long lashes, and a face with a kind of what-are-you-waiting-for smile. The arms and legs were what you call articulated, and her figure was the kind you see in centerfolds. On top of that, Curtis had dressed it up in an evening gown, with plenty of cleavage.

When he noticed me eyeballing the outfit he went over to a wall closet and slid the door open. Damned if he didn't have the rack full of women's clothes—suits, dresses, sports outfits, even a couple of nighties.

"From the store?" I asked.

Curtis nodded. "They'll never miss them until inventory, and I got tired of seeing her in the same old thing all the time. Besides, Estelle likes nice clothes."

I had to hand it to him, putting me on like this without cracking a smile.

“Sit down and keep her company,” Curtis said. “I’ll have dinner on the table in a minute.”

I sat down. I mean, what the hell else was I going to do? But it gave me an antsy feeling to have a window dummy staring at me across the table in the candlelight. That’s right, he’d put candles on the table, and in the shadows you had to look twice to make sure this was only a mannequin or whatever you call it.

Curtis served up a couple of really good steaks and a nice tossed salad. He’d skipped the drinks-before-dinner routine; instead he poured a pretty fair Cabernet with the meal, raising his glass in a toast.

“To Estelle,” he said.

I raised my glass too, feeling like a wimp, but trying to go along with the gag. “How come she’s not drinking?” I asked.

“Estelle doesn’t drink.” He still didn’t smile. “That’s one of the things I like about her.”

It was the way he said it that got to me. I had to break up that straight face of his, so I gave him a grin. “I notice she isn’t eating very much either.”

Curtis nodded. “Estelle doesn’t believe in stuffing her face. She wants to keep her figure.”

He was still deadpanning, so I said, “If she doesn’t drink and she doesn’t eat, what happens when you take her to a restaurant?”

“We only went out once,” Curtis told me. “Tell me truth, it wasn’t the way I expected. They gave us a good table all right, but the waiter kept staring at us and the other customers started making wise-ass remarks under their breath, so now we eat at home. Estelle doesn’t need restaurants.”

The straighter he played it the more it burned me, so I gave it another shot. “Then I guess you won’t be taking her to Vegas after all?”

“We went there last weekend,” Curtis said. “I was right about the plane-fare. Not only did I save a bundle, but we got the red-carpet treatment. When they saw me carrying Estelle they must have figured her for an invalid—we got to board first and had our choice of seats upfront. The stewardess even brought her a blanket."

Curtis was really on a roll now, and all I could do was go with it. "How'd you make out with the hotel?" I asked.

"No sweat. Double-occupancy rate, just like the ads said, plus complimentary cocktails and twenty dollars in free chips for the casino."

I tried one more time. "Did Estelle win any money?"

"Oh no—she doesn't gamble." Curtis shook his head. "We ended up spending the whole weekend right there in our room, phoning room service for meals and watching closed-circuit TV. Most of the time we never even got out of bed."

That shook me. "You were in bed with her?"

"Don't worry, it was king-size, plenty of room. And I found out another nice thing about Estelle. She doesn't snore."

I squeezed-off another grin. "Then just what does she do when you go to bed with her?"

"Sleep, of course." Curtis gave me a double-take. "Don't go getting any ideas. If I wanted the other thing I could have picked up one of those inflatable rubber floozies from a sex-shop. But there's no hanky-panky with Estelle. She's a real lady."

"A real lady," I said. "Now I've heard everything."

"Not from her." Curtis nodded at the dummy. "Haven't you noticed? I've been doing all the talking and she hasn't said a word. You don't know how great it is to have someone around who believes in keeping her mouth shut. Sure, I do the cooking and the housework, but it's no more of a hassle than when I was living here alone."

"You don't feel alone anymore, is that it?"

"How could I? Now when I come home nights I've got somebody waiting for me. No nagging, no curlers in the hair—just the way she is now, neat and clean and well-dressed. She even uses that perfume I gave her. Can't you smell it?"

Damned if he wasn't right. I could smell perfume.

I sneaked another peek at Estelle. Sitting in the shadows with the candlelight soft on her hair and face, she almost had me fooled for a minute. Almost, but not quite.

“Just look at her,” Curtis said. “Beautiful! Look at that smile!”

Now, for the first time, he smiled too. And it was his smile I looked at, not hers.

“Okay,” I said. “You win. If you’re trying to tell me Estelle is better company than most women, it’s no contest.”

“I figured you’d understand.” Curtis hadn’t changed his expression, but there was something wrong about that smile of his, something that got to me.

So I had to say it. “I don’t want to be a party-pooper, but the way you come on, maybe there’s such a thing as carrying a gag too far.”

He wasn’t smiling now. “Who said anything about a gag? Are you trying to insult Estelle?”

“I’m not trying to insult anybody,” I told him. “Just remember, she’s only a dummy.”

“Dummy?” All of a sudden he was on his feet and coming around the table, waving those big fists of his. “You’re the one who’s a dummy! Get the hell out of here before I—”

I got out, before.

Then I went over to the bar, had three fast doubles, and headed for home to hit the sack. I went out like a light but it didn’t keep the dreams away, and all night long I kept staring at the smiles—the smile on his face and the smile on the dummy’s—and I don’t know which one spooked me the most.

Come to think of it, they both looked the same.

That night was the last night I went to the bar for a long time. I didn’t want to run into Curtis there, but I was still seeing him in those dreams.

I did my drinking at home now, but the dreams kept coming, and it loused me up at work when I was hungover. Pretty soon I started pouring a shot at breakfast instead of orange juice.

So I went to see Dr. Mannerheim.

That shows how rough things were getting, because I don't like doctors and I've always had a thing about shrinks. This business of lying on a couch and spilling your guts to a stranger always bugged me. But it had got to where I started calling in sick and just sat home staring at the walls. Next thing you know, I'd start climbing them.

I told Mannerheim that when I saw him.

"Don't worry," he said. "I won't ask you to lay on a couch or take ink-blot tests. The physical shows you're a little rundown, but this can be corrected by proper diet and a vitamin supplement. Chances are you may not even need therapy at all."

"Then what am I here for?" I said.

"Because you have a problem. Suppose we talk about it."

Dr. Mannerheim was just a little baldheaded guy with glasses; he looked a lot like an uncle of mine who used to take me to ballgames when I was a kid. So it wasn't as hard to talk as I'd expected.

I filled him in on my setup—the divorce and all—and he picked up on it right away. Said it was getting to be a common thing nowadays with so many couples splitting. There's always a hassle working out a new life-style afterwards and sometimes a kind of guilty feeling; you keep wondering if it was your fault and that maybe something's wrong with you.

We got into the sex bit and the drinking, and then he asked me about my dreams.

That's when I told him about Curtis.

Before I knew it I'd laid out the whole thing—getting smashed in the bar, stealing the dummy, going to Curtis's place for dinner, and what happened there.

"Just exactly what did happen?" Mannerheim said. "You say you had a few drinks before you went to his apartment—maybe three or four—and you drank wine with your dinner."

"I wasn't bombed, if that's what you mean."

"But your perceptions were dulled," he told me. "Perhaps he intended to put you on for a few laughs, but when he saw your condition he got carried away."

"If you'd seen the way he looked when he told me to get out you'd know it wasn't a gag," I said. "The guy is a nut-case." Something else hit me all of a sudden, and I sat up straight in my chair. "I remember a movie I saw once. There's this ventriloquist who gets to thinking his dummy is alive. Pretty soon he starts talking to it, then he gets jealous of it, and next thing you know—"

Mannerheim held up his hand. "Spare me the details. There must be a dozen films like that. But in all my years of practice I've never read, let alone run across, a single case where such a situation actually existed. It all goes back to the old Greek legend about Pygmalion, the sculptor who made a statue of a beautiful woman that came to life.

"But you've got to face facts." He ticked them off on his fingers. "Your friend Curtis has a mannequin, not a ventriloquist's dummy. He doesn't try to create the illusion that it speaks, or use his hand to make it move. And he didn't create the figure, he's not a sculptor. So what does that leave us with?"

"Just one thing," I said. "He's treating this dummy like a real person."

Mannerheim shook his head. "A man who's capable of carrying a window dummy into a restaurant and a hotel—or who claims to have done so in order to impress you—may still just have taken advantage of your condition to play out an elaborate practical joke."

"Wrong." I stood up. "I tell you he believes the dummy is alive."

"Maybe and maybe not. It isn't important." Mannerheim took off his glasses and stared at me. "What's important is that you believe the dummy is alive."

It hit me like a sock in the gut. I had to sit down again and catch my breath before I could answer him.

"You're right," I said. "That's why I really wanted out of there. That's why I keep having those damned dreams. That's why there's a drinking problem. Maybe I was juiced-up when I saw her, maybe Curtis hypnotized me, how the hell do I know? But whatever happened or didn't happen, it worked. And I've been running scared ever since."

"Then stop running." Dr. Mannerheim put his glasses on again. "The only way to fight fear is to face it."

"You mean go back there?"

He nodded at me. "If you want to get rid of the dreams, get rid of the dependency on alcohol, the first step is to separate fantasy from reality. Go to Curtis, and go sober. Examine the actual circumstances with a clear head. I'm satisfied that you'll see things differently. Then, if you still think you need further help, get in touch."

We both stood up, and Dr. Mannerheim walked me to the door. "Have a good day," he said.

I didn't.

It took all that weekend just to go over what he'd said, and another two days before I could buy his advice. But it made sense. Maybe Curtis had been setting me up like the shrink said; if not, then he was definitely a flake. But one way or another I had to find out.

So Wednesday night I went up to his apartment. I wasn't on the sauce, and I didn't call Curtis in advance. That way, if he didn't know I was coming, he wouldn't plan on pulling another rib—if it was a rib.

It must have been close to nine o'clock when I walked down the hall and knocked on his door. There was no answer; maybe he was gone for the evening. But I kept banging away, just in case, and finally the door opened.

"Come on in," Curtis said.

I stared at him. He was wearing a pair of dirty, wrinkled-up pajamas, but he looked like he hadn't slept for a week—his face was grey, big circles under his eyes, and he needed a shave. When we shook hands I felt like I was holding a sack of ice-cubes.

"Good to see you," he told me, closing the door after I got inside. "I was hoping you'd come by so's I could apologize for the way I acted the other night."

"No hard feelings," I said."

"I knew you wouldn't hold it against me," he went on. "That's what I told Estelle."

Curtis turned and nodded across the living room, and in the dim light I saw the dummy sitting there on the sofa, facing the TV screen. The set was turned on to some old western movie, but the sound was way down and I could scarcely hear the dialogue.

It didn't matter, because I was looking at the dummy. She wore some kind of fancy cocktail dress, which figured, because I could see the bottle on the coffee table and smell the whisky on Curtis's breath. What grabbed me was the other stuff she was wearing—the earrings, and the bracelet with the big stones that sparkled and gleamed. They had to be costume jewelry, but they looked real in the light from the TV tube. And the way the dummy sat, sort of leaning forward, you'd swear it was watching the screen.

Only I knew better. Seeing the dummy cold sober this way, it was just a wooden figure, like the others I saw in the storeroom where Curtis stole it. Dr. Mannerheim was right; now that I got a good look the dummy didn't spook me anymore.

Curtis went over to the coffee table and picked up the bottle. "Care for a drink?" he asked.

I shook my head. "No, thanks, not now."

But he kept holding the bottle when he bent down and kissed the dummy on the side of its head. "How can you hear anything with the sound so low?" he said. "Let me turn up the volume for you."

And so help me, that's what he did. Then he smiled at the dummy. "I don't want to interrupt while you're watching, honey. So if it's okay with you, we'll go in the bedroom and talk there." He moved back across the living room and started down the hall. I followed him into the bedroom at the far end and he closed the door. It shut off the sound from the TV set but now I heard another noise, a kind of chirping.

Looking over at the far corner I saw the bird-cage on a stand, with a canary hopping around inside.

“Estelle likes canaries,” Curtis said. “Same as my ex. She always had a thing for pets.” He tilted the bottle.

I just stood there, staring at the room. It was a real disaster area—bed not made, heaped-up clothes lying on the floor, empty fifths and glasses everywhere. The place smelled like a zoo.

The bottle stopped gurgling and then I heard the whisper. “Thank God you came.”

I glanced up at Curtis. He wasn’t smiling now. “You’ve got to help me,” he said.”

“What’s the problem?” I asked.”

“Keep your voice down,” he whispered. “I don’t want her to hear us.”

“Don’t start that again,” I told him. “I only stopped in because I figured you’d be straightened out by now.”

“How can I? She doesn’t let me out of her sight for a minute—the last time I got away from here was three days ago, when I turned in the rental car and bought her the Mercedes.” That threw me. “Mercedes? You’re putting me on.”

Curtis shook his head. “It’s downstairs in the garage right now—brand new 280-SL, hasn’t been driven since I brought it home. Estelle doesn’t like me to go out alone and she doesn’t want to go out either. I keep hoping she’ll change her mind because I’m sick of being cooped-up here, eating those frozen TV dinners. You’d think she’d at least go for a drive with me after getting her the car and all.”

“I thought you told me you were broke,” I said. “Where’d you get the money for a Mercedes?”

He wouldn’t look at me. “Never mind. That’s my business.”

“What about your business?” I asked. “How come you haven’t been showing up at work?”

“I quit my job,” he whispered. “Estelle told me to.”

“Told you? Make sense, man. Window dummies don’t talk.” He gave me a glassy-eyed stare. “Who said anything about window dummies? Don’t you remember how it was the night we got her—how she was standing there in the storage room waiting for me? The others were dummies all right, I know that. But Estelle knew I was coming, so she just stood there pretending to be like all the rest because she didn’t want you to catch on.

“She fooled you, right? I’m the only one who knew Estelle was different. There were all kinds of dummies there, some real beauties, too. But the minute I laid eyes on her I knew she was the one.

“And it was great, those first few days with her. You saw for yourself how well we got along. It wasn’t until afterwards that everything went wrong, when she started telling me about all the stuff she wanted, giving me orders, making me do crazy things.”

“Look,” I said. “If there’s anything crazy going on around here, you’re the one who’s responsible. And you better get your act together and put a stop to it right now. Maybe you can’t do it alone, the shape you’re in, but I’ve got a friend, a doctor—”

“Doctor? You think I’m whacko, is that it?” He started shaking all over and there was a funny look in his eyes. “Here I thought you’d help me, you were my last hope!”

“I want to help,” I told him. “That’s why I came. First off, let’s try to clean this place up. Then you’re going to bed, get a good night’s rest.”

“What about Estelle?” he whispered.”

“Leave that to me. When you wake up tomorrow I promise the dummy’ll be gone.”

That’s when he threw the bottle at my head.

I was still shaking the next afternoon when I got to Dr. Mannerheim’s office and told him what happened.

"Missed me by inches," I said. "But it sure gave me one hell of a scare. I ran down the hall to the living room. That damn dummy was still sitting in front of the TV like it was listening to the program and that scared me too, all over again. I kept right on running until I got home. That's when I called your answering service."

Mannerheim nodded at me. "Sorry it took so long to get back to you. I had some unexpected business."

"Look, Doc," I said. "I've been thinking. Curtis wasn't really trying to hurt me. The poor guy's so uptight he doesn't realize what he's doing anymore. Maybe I should have stuck around, tried to calm him down."

"You did the right thing." Mannerheim took off his glasses and polished them with his handkerchief. "Curtis is definitely psychotic, and very probably dangerous."

That shook me. "But when I came here last week you said he was harmless—"

Dr. Mannerheim put his glasses on. "I know. But since then I've found out a few things."

"Like what?"

"Your friend Curtis lied when he told you he quit his job. He didn't quit—he was fired."

"How do you know?"

"I heard about it the day after I saw you, when his boss called me in. I was asked to run a series of tests on key personnel as part of a security investigation. It seems that daily bank deposits for the store show a fifty-thousand dollar loss in the cash-flow. Somebody juggled the books."

"The Mercedes!" I said. "So that's where he got the money!"

"We can't be sure just yet. But polygraph tests definitely rule out other employees who had access to the records. We do know where he bought the car. The dealer only got a down-payment so the rest of the cash, around forty thousand, is still unaccounted-for."

"Then it's all a scam, right, Doc? What he really means to do is take the cash and split out. He was running a number on me about the dummy, trying to make me think he's bananas, so I wouldn't tumble to what he's up to."

"I'm afraid it isn't that simple." Mannerheim got up and started pacing the floor. "I've been doing some rethinking about Curtis and his hallucination that the dummy is alive. That canary you mentioned—a pity he didn't get it before he stole the mannequin."

"What are you driving at?"

"There are a lot of lonely people in this world, people who aren't necessarily lonely by choice. Some are elderly, some have lost all close relatives through death, some suffer an after-shock following divorce. But all of them have one thing in common—the need for love. Not physical love, necessarily, but what goes with it. The companionship, attention, a feeling of mutual affection. That's why so many of them turn to keeping pets.

"I'm sure you've seen examples. The man who spends all his time taking care of his dog. The widow who babies her kitten. The old lady who talks to her canary, treating it like an equal." I nodded. "The way Curtis treats the dummy?" Mannerheim settled down in his chair again. "Usually they don't go that far. But in extreme cases the pretense gets out of hand. They not only talk to their pets, they interpret each growl or purr or chirp as a reply. It's called personification."

"But these pet-owners—they're harmless, aren't they? So why do you say Curtis might be dangerous?"

Dr. Mannerheim leaned forward in his chair. "After talking to the people at the store I did a little further investigation on my own. This morning I went down to the courthouse and checked the files. Curtis told you he got a divorce here in town three months ago, but there's no record of any proceedings. And I found out he was lying to you about other things. He was married, all right; he did own a house and furniture and a car.

But there's nothing to show he ever turned anything over to his wife. Chances are he sold his belongings to pay off gambling debts. We know he did some heavy betting at the track."

"We?" I said. "You and who else?"

"Sheriff's department. They're the ones who told me about his wife's disappearance, three months ago."

"You mean she ran out on him?"

"That's what he said after neighbors noticed she was missing and they called him in this morning. He told them downtown that he'd come home from work one night and his wife was gone, bag and baggage—no explanation, no note, nothing. He denied they'd quarreled, said he'd been too ashamed to report her absence, and had kept hoping she'd come back or at least get in touch with him."

"Did they buy his story?"

Mannerheim shrugged. "Women do leave their husbands, for a variety of reasons, and there was nothing to show Curtis wasn't telling the truth. They put out an all-points on his wife and kept the file open, but so far no new information has turned, up, not until this embezzlement matter and your testimony. I didn't mention that this morning, but I have another appointment this evening and I'll tell them then. I think they'll take action, once they hear your evidence."

"Wait a minute," I said. "I haven't given you any evidence."

"I think you have." Mannerheim stared at me. "According to the neighbors, Curtis was married to a tall blonde with blue eyes, just like the window dummy you saw. And his wife's name was Estelle."

It was almost dark by the time I got to the bar. The Happy Hour had started, but I wasn't happy. All I wanted was a drink—a couple of drinks—enough to make me forget the whole thing.

Only it didn't work out that way. I kept thinking about what Mannerheim told me, about Curtis and the mess he was in.

The guy was definitely psyched-out, no doubt about that. He'd ripped-off his boss, lost his job, screwed up his life.

But maybe it wasn't his fault. I knew what he'd gone through because I had been there myself. Getting hit with a divorce was bad enough to make me slip my gears, and for him it must have been ten times worse. Coming home and finding his wife gone, just like that, without a word. He never said so, but he must have loved her—loved her so much that when she left him he flipped-out, stealing the dummy, calling it by her name. Even when he got to feeling trapped he couldn't give the dummy up because it reminded him of his wife. All this was pretty far-out, but I could understand. Like Mannerheim said, everybody needs a little love.

If anyone was to blame, it was that wife of his. Maybe she split because she was cheating on him, the way mine did. The only difference is that I could handle it and he cracked up. Now he'd either be tossed in the slammer or get put away in a puzzle-factory, and all because of love. His scuzzy wife got away free and he got dumped on. After Mannerheim talked to the law they'd probably come and pick him up tonight—poor guy, he didn't have a chance.

Unless I gave it to him.

I ordered up another drink and thought about that. Sure, if I tipped him off and told him to run it could get me into a bind. But who would know? The thing of it was, I could understand Curtis, even put myself in his place. Both of us had the same raw deal, but I'd lucked-out and he couldn't take it. Maybe I owed him something—at least a lousy phone-call.

So I went over to the pay-phone at the end of the bar. This big fat broad was using the phone, probably somebody's cheating wife handing her husband a line about why she wasn't home. When I came up she gave me a dirty look and kept right on yapping.

It was getting on towards eight o'clock now. I didn't know when Dr. Mannerheim's appointment was set with the Sheriff's department, but there wouldn't be much time left. And Curtis's apartment was only three blocks away.

I made it in five minutes, walking fast. So fast that I didn't even look around when I crossed in front of the entrance to the building's underground-parking place.

If I hadn't heard the horn I'd have been a goner. As it was, there were just about two seconds for me to jump back when the big blue car came tearing up the ramp and wheeled into the street. Just two seconds to get out of the way, look up, and see the Mercedes take off.

Then I took off too, running into the building and down the hall.

The only break I got was finding Curtis's apartment door wide open. He was gone—I already knew that—but all I wanted now was to use the phone.

I called the Sheriff's office and Dr. Mannerheim was there. I told him where I was and about seeing the car take off, and after that things happened fast.

In a couple of minutes a full squad of deputies wheeled in. They went through the place and came up with zilch. No Curtis, no Estelle—even the dummy's clothes were missing. And if he had forty grand or so stashed away, that was gone too; all they found was a rip in a sofa-cushion where he could have hid the loot.

But another squad had better luck, if you can call it that. They located the blue Mercedes in an old gravel-pit off the highway about five miles out of town.

Curtis was lying on the ground next to it, stone-cold dead, with a big butcher knife stuck between his shoulder-blades. The dummy was there too, lying a few feet away. The missing money was in Curtis's wallet—all big bills—and the dummy's wardrobe was in the rear seat, along with Curtis's luggage, like he'd planned to get out of town for good.

Dr. Mannerheim was with the squad out there and he was the one who suggested digging into the pit. It sounded wild, but he kept after them until they moved a lot of gravel. His hunch paid off, because about six feet down they hit pay-dirt.

It was a woman's body, or what was left of it after three months in the ground.

The coroner's office had a hell of a time making an ID. It turned out to be Curtis's wife, of course, and there were about twenty stab-wounds on her, all made with a butcher knife like the one that killed Curtis.

Funny thing, they couldn't get any prints off the handle; but there were a lot of funny things about the whole business. Dr. Mannerheim figured Curtis killed his wife and buried her in the pit, and what sent him over the edge was guilt-feelings. So he stole the dummy and tried to pretend it was his wife. Calling her Estelle, buying all those things for her—he was trying to make up for what he'd done, and finally he got to the point where he really thought she was alive.

Maybe that makes sense, but it still doesn't explain how Curtis was killed, or why.

I could ask some other questions too. If you really believe something with all your heart and soul, how long does it take before it comes true? And how long does a murder victim lie in her grave plotting to get even?

But I'm not going to say anything. If I told them my reasons they'd say I was crazy too.

All I know is that when the Mercedes came roaring out of the underground garage I had only two seconds to get out of the way. But it was long enough for me to get a good look, long enough for me to swear I saw Curtis and the dummy together in the front seat.

And Estelle was the one behind the wheel.

Pumpkin

A ghoulish little tale in the grand old Halloween tradition.

Night came early in the country.

The sun disappeared into the woods and shadows started slinking out from between the trees. Twilight brought a chill wind whipping across fallen leaves and in the distance the huddling hills were hidden in autumn haze.

That’s when David began moving through the farmhouse, locking the doors and windows.

It was a regular ritual now, but tonight Vera rebelled.

“For heaven’s sake, must you close things up so early? Well suffocate in here without fresh air.”

David didn’t answer. Instead he opened the kitchen cabinet, pulled out the vodka bottle, and poured himself a shot.

“Please, David,” she said, “couldn’t you wait until after dinner? I’ll have it on the table just as soon as Billy shows up.”

David was staring out the window, squinting at the woods across the road, but now he turned and his eyes widened.

“I thought he was in his room,” he said. “How often do I have to tell you I don’t want that kid outside when it gets dark?”

“But he’s just across the way—”

David turned so quickly that Vera got only a momentary glimpse of his face, but what she saw frightened her because he looked so frightened. And now he was hurrying to the door, flinging it open, rushing out.

As Vera moved to the window she could see him running across the road and into the tangled, weed-choked remnants of the vegetable garden beside the old Holloway place. Then he was swallowed up in the dusk and Helen lost sight of him.

I lost sight of him a long time ago, she told herself. Ever since we moved here to the farmhouse.

Perhaps it started even earlier than that, back in town, when David was terminated just before Easter.

"Terminated, hell!" he'd raged. "Bastards fired me, that's what they did. Ten years working my butt off for the company and now they're giving my job to a lousy computer!"

"It's not the end of the world," Vera said. "There must be other openings for controllers and you know a lot of people in the business. The thing to do is start making some calls, get out a resume."

So David called around and circulated his resume. He had several promising interviews, a few nibbles, and no firm offers. By Labor Day they'd run through his severance pay, and it was then that Vera suggested moving to the farm.

"You're out of your mind," he said. "I'm an accountant, not a manure-spreader."

"No one expects you to work the place, darling.

But it's only forty minutes from town on the turnpike and if you get a job —"

"If? I'll land something, just be patient."

"I am patient," Vera told him. "But we're already digging into our savings. And here you have a perfectly good piece of property your uncle left you, standing idle all these years, where we can live rent-free."

"That's crazy," David said. "The whole place is rundown—cost a fortune just to fix it up halfway decently."

Vera shook her head. “We’ve got our furniture and the appliances. Maybe we’ll have to spend some money on minor repairs, but the house is sound. I’m sure we can manage on far less than we’re paying here. Besides, it’ll be good for Billy, living in the country. And it will be good for you too, getting away from this rat race.”

“I don’t want to go there,” David told her. “And that’s final.”

Only it wasn’t final. Vera went right ahead on her own and made all the arrangements. Their lease on the apartment was up at the end of the month and by then she’d got the painters and carpenter and the electrical contractor working against the deadline. Just as she thought, it was no big deal.

The big deal turned out to be persuading David to make the move. But she kept after him, and when it came to facing the hike in the new leasing agreement he finally saw the light.

They’d moved in at the beginning of October, and even David had to admit she’d done a wonderful job transforming the old farmhouse into a comfortable home. Billy lost a few weeks of school but for an eight-year-old it wasn’t important, and he liked his new surroundings—ten full acres to run wild in, plus the woods behind the abandoned Holloway place across the road.

But right from the start David put his foot down. He didn’t want Billy playing anywhere near the deserted farmhouse with its caved-in roof, and served notice that the woods were strictly off-limits; in fact, he wasn’t permitted to cross the road at all.

Vera could understand about the farmhouse because it was boarded-up, and there was no telling if the structure was safe. What she couldn’t understand was why Billy couldn’t play in the yard or the wooded area beyond.

“Private property,” David said. “No trespassing. Folks out here are funny about such things.”

Vera tried Jo reason with him. “There’s nobody living within a mile of this place. And Billy isn’t going to harm anything.”

“That’s not the point. I don’t want anything to harm Billy.”

“What do you mean?”

David didn’t answer her. But it was then she began to notice the way he acted every night as darkness came, locking everything up. Vera believed in taking precautions—after all, you never know who might be driving around nowadays, looking for a place to break into—but he started so early, even before twilight, and if he found anything left open by accident he blew his stack.

But it was the drinking that bothered her the most. Back in town they usually had a cocktail before dinner to help him unwind when he came home from work. Now there was no work and he wasn’t sharing a martini with her; he was drinking straight vodka and going through as much as half a bottle a night. He’d gotten into the habit of sleeping all morning and watching television all afternoon. Funny, he’d always hated soap operas before. Maybe he still did because he never commented on them, just sat staring at the tube with a sort of glazed look in his eyes. But when Billy came home on the school bus, David turned off the set and the glazed look disappeared. He watched the youngster like a hawk if he went out to play, and chewed Vera out for not doing the same.

It’s David I should have been looking at, not Billy. Vera frowned, peering through the window. Where did I lose him?

She found him now, moving forth from the deep shadows across the road and pulling Billy along by the collar. As they neared the house she could hear the muffled sound of sobbing.

Now David’s voice rose as Vera opened the door. “I warned you, remember? Why didn’t you keep away from there like you were told?”

Billy raised a tear-stained face. “Honest, I was only—”

“Never mind the excuses! I give the orders here and don’t you forget it. I want you to march upstairs to your room and go straight to bed.”

“But Dad—”

“You heard me. Now get going!”

Shoulders shaking with suppressed sobs, Billy made his way up the staircase as his parents stood watching in the hall, avoiding each other's gaze. The sound of his footsteps faded and they heard the bedroom door closing in the hall above.

Vera turned, speaking softly. "Really, David, must you? The poor kid hasn't even had his dinner."

"It won't hurt him to miss a meal. And he's got to learn to obey the rules. I don't want him going over there."

Vera took a deep breath. "You keep saying that, but you never give any reasons. Just as long as he keeps away from the house I don't see—"

"You don't see anything," David said. "Come on, let's eat. I'm starving."

But when she served dinner David didn't seem hungry. He scarcely touched his food; instead he got up and poured himself another drink, bringing the bottle back to the table with him.

"Want some coffee?" she said.

"No, I'm okay." He gulped the drink, then refilled his glass.

Vera took another deep breath. "You're not okay."

David shrugged. "Have it your own way. I've got no job and no prospects. Winter's coming, we're stuck out here in the middle of nowhere, and God knows what happens next year when we run out of savings. Is it any wonder I'm uptight?"

"That part I can understand. But since we came here you act as if you were afraid of something—"

"Afraid? You're imagining things."

"I think you're the one who's imagining. That look you had when I said Billy was across the road tonight. And other times, when you just stare out the window."

David scowled. "I told you I never wanted to live here in the first place. It gives me the creeps."

"What does?"

He lowered his glass. It was empty, and so was the expression in his eyes. "All right. I didn't want to say anything but it's probably better than letting you think I don't have both oars in the water." He sighed and leaned back. "If you must know, this isn't the first time I've come to live here."

"David—you never told me that—"

"I never told anyone. But a long time ago, when my mother took sick after the divorce, I spent a summer and part of the fall with my aunt and uncle in this house. I was just about Billy's age then. So you see, I know."

"Know what?"

"About the place across the road. The first thing Uncle George did was warn me never to go over there, because the old man didn't like strangers."

"Who was he talking about?"

"Jed Holloway. He lived on the property all alone, ever since anyone around here could remember. Uncle George moved in here right after he and Aunt Louise were married, but he said that even then Jed Holloway was an old man. God only knows how long he'd been there or what he did to keep going. Maybe he raised enough food from his vegetable garden, because nobody ever saw him at the stores in town. Folks said he had a wife once, and after she died he never left the place, just boarded up all the windows like they are today. If the salesmen or anybody else showed up he'd run them off the property with a shotgun."

"Didn't anyone ever do anything about it?"

David shrugged. "Like what? It was his place. If he wanted to cut off the water and electricity that was his own affair. He had an old well and an outhouse in back, and he must have used candles in the house because some nights you could see lights flickering from cracks between the boards on the windows. It wasn't as if he was breaking any law—just an old coot who went off his rocker when he lost his wife. Maybe he lost a kid too, because she was supposed to have died in childbirth. That would explain why he hated children so much.

"I know he hated me. Playing in the yard here, sometimes I saw him puttering around in his garden, mumbling to himself. I'd never seen anyone talking to empty air before and it scared me. The way he looked was pretty scary, too—tall and skinny, with long white hair down to his shoulders and a beard that hid all of his lace except the eyes. That was the worst, those eyes of his, glaring at me when he noticed I was playing outside. I'll never forget it, him standing there dressed in rags like some kind of scarecrow come to life, a scarecrow with little red-rimmed eyes staring—"

David broke off and reached for the bottle again.

"So that's why you didn't want to come here again," Vera said.

David finished pouring and raised his glass. "There are other reasons. Oh, I never believed those stories floating around about Holloway getting into magic and practicing witchcraft. That stuff about his putting curses on people and making spells to wither their crops and kill off cattle sounded pretty wild even then, and nobody ever proved anything. I probably would have gotten used to how he looked and acted if it hadn't been for Halloween."

David drank, then sat back. From the hall beyond, the ticking of the grandfather's clock echoed through the silence.

Vera leaned forward. "Aren't you going to tell me what happened?"

"Jed Holloway left the house," David said. "That's what happened. Two other kids and myself, we were playing out by the barn after supper and we saw him come out and start walking into the woods behind his house. He was carrying an armful of candles and something that looked like a big book—black, with metal bands around it.

"These kids I was playing with, Tom and Terry, were older than me, and I guess they'd heard all those stories. Tom told us Holloway was going down into the woods to pray to the Devil. That's what witches and wizards did on Halloween, they prayed to the Devil and conjured up ghosts and demons.

"Terry didn't buy that. He said there were no such things as witches or ghosts and Jed Holloway was crazy as a bedbug. The way he acted, chasing kids and yelling at them and all, maybe it was time to teach him a lesson. So later that night, after dark, we did it."

"What did you do?"

"We tipped over Jed Holloway's outhouse."

Vera started to laugh, but David's face was grim.

"You think it's funny?"

"Of course it is."

David nodded. "So did we, at first. I remember the way we kept giggling when we sneaked across the road. It was a moonless night, everything dark and still. Not quite everything, because far away through the trees we could see little glimmers of light. Tom said Jed Holloway must be off in the woods down there fighting his candles, and sure enough we did hear a voice that sounded like someone saying a prayer, very solemn and deep.

"That sobered us a little, that and the way the shadows seemed to move in the darkness around the outhouse up ahead. Then we set to work and forgot about being scared. The outhouse was old and rickety and quite small, but prying it loose from the foundation with a shovel was a big job for kids our age. And when we did, the next problem was how to tip it over without making a racket.

"Only noise wasn't that much of a problem after all, because all at once a cold wind began to whistle through the trees. It seemed to come from somewhere back in the woods and Terry said we were in for a storm. Sure enough, the sky was pitch-black overhead and we could hear thunder growling off in the hills.

"But we didn't mind, since it drowned out the creaking when we started to lift the outhouse and tilt it over on its side. Then, just as we got ready to ease it down, lightning turned everything green and there was a clap of thunder so close and loud it almost deafened us.

"One thing for sure, it scared the hell out of Tom and Terry. They let go of their hold and took off for the road, leaving me standing there trying to balance the damned thing all by myself. I guess I was too startled to move. Then the lightning flashed again and I looked up over my shoulder.

"Jed Holloway was standing there at the edge of the woods, and he was the lightning. It was playing all around his body like green fire, playing around his hair and beard and his little, red pig eyes. Only it wasn't just around—the lightning seemed to be coming from his eyes. Then he opened his mouth and the thunder boomed right out of his throat.

"I let go of the outhouse and it dropped back into place on its foundation. At least I think it did, but I didn't wait to see. I turned and ran and the lightning followed me, stabbing into the ground at my heels. I swear one bolt came so close it grazed the hairs on my neck.

"The next thing I remember was blubbering in my bed, with Uncle George and Aunt Louise trying to calm me down. Of course they didn't believe what I told them. They even dragged me over to the bedroom window so I could look for myself. By this time the storm was howling and the rain kept coming down in buckets, but I saw that the old farmhouse was completely dark and Jed Holloway had disappeared.

"They tried to tell me he'd never been there, that it was all just my imagination, but I knew better. And when they realized I wouldn't go outside to take the school bus the next day or the day after, they finally decided to pack me up and ship me back to my mother in town." David forced a smile. "So that's the way it was."

"Was," Vera said. "Not is." She met his gaze. "Look, David, I understand, really I do. Living with that traumatic experience bottled up inside you all these years must have been a terrible thing. But it's over now and you've got to realize that. You're not a kid anymore, and Jed Holloway is long dead and gone."

She rose briskly, glancing at her watch. "Look at the time! We'd better get to bed."

David's hand curled around the bottle. "I'll be up later."

Vera hesitated. "Sure you don't want me to sit with you a while longer?"

"Of course not. I'll be all right now that I've gotten this out of my system. Thanks for being such a good psychiatrist."

"Come up soon." Vera smiled. "I may be able to offer you another kind of therapy."

Vera's smile faded quickly once she got upstairs. She'd done her best not to let David see how his story had disturbed her—not what he said, but the way he said it. Maybe telling all this would really help him; she hoped so.

Of course there was nothing to be alarmed about, but just the same she looked in on Billy before going on to the other bedroom. He was sound asleep.

That relieved her, and by the time she'd undressed and slid under the covers the tension began to ease. Now, if only David would come up—

The grandfather's clock tolled the hours in the hall. Windows rattled in reply, and somewhere a door groaned on rusty hinges. Vera snuggled back against her pillow, fighting a sudden childish impulse to bury her head beneath it.

No wonder David had a hang-up about returning here. To a small boy, suddenly being torn away from his home and family was a disturbing experience; living here in this lonely old house must have been an ordeal for him.

Vera sighed, shifting her head on the pillow. Thank heaven Billy didn't seem to have that problem—

"Mommy!"

Vera levered upright in sudden shock, alarm propelling her out of bed and into the hall.

"Mommy—"

The shrill cry rose again as she raced into Billy's room. Crouching amidst the tangled covers he turned to her, eyes alive with terror. Vera sank to the side of the bed and he buried his contorted face against her breast.

"There now, it's all right." Her fingers smoothed tousled hair, soothed trembling shoulders.

"That's better," she said. "What happened?"

Billy moved back on the bed, eyes darting around the room. "Where is he?"

"Nobody's here, nobody but us. You can see for yourself."

The boy stiffened. “No, he’s coming—can’t you hear him?”

And she did hear something, the sound of footsteps from the hall. For a moment Vera panicked, then relaxed as David entered.

Billy looked up. “Dad—did you see him?”

“See who?”

“That man. The one who was looking at me through the window.”

David strode across the room and stared out into the night. “Nobody’s outside,” he said. “Look—the window’s locked.”

“But he was here.” Billy’s lower lip quivered. “He was standing there, outside.”

“Now you know better than that.” David turned, shaking his head. “We’re upstairs here, on the second floor. So how could anyone be standing outside?”

Vera held Billy close. “It was only a bad dream,” she said.

“No!” The boy pulled away. “I saw him! This old man—he had long white hair and a beard and little red eyes staring at me—”

Seeing the fear in Billy’s face was all Vera could bear. Luckily for her, she couldn’t see David’s.

David’s face was haggard in the hazy afternoon sunlight filtering through the parlor window. No wonder he was beat today; it had been a rough night before they got Billy calmed down and back to sleep again, and there’d been little enough rest for him afterward.

Vera was probably right about the nightmare—what else could it have been? She said the description of the face wasn’t even a coincidence, really; most kids tend to be afraid of old men and it’s only natural when they show up in their dreams.

Natural or not, David didn’t want to think about explanations now because other things were more important. Bad enough that this place bugged him, but if it spooked Billy that was the last straw. He’d made up his mind this morning; they had to get out of here. Monday he’d drive back to the city and make the rounds and this time he wouldn't be so choosy, just take anything he could get, as long as they could move away before winter.

Right now the thing to do was revise his resume, play down all that executive-experience stuff that might turn off employers who were only looking for somebody to fill an ordinary accounting job. A pay cut didn't matter; what mattered was getting out.

But it was hard to concentrate, hard to figure how to rewrite the damned thing. Maybe Vera could help; she was good with words.

David looked up and called. "Honey—can you come here for a minute?"

No answer.

"Vera—"

Still no reply, only the tick-tock of the grandfather's clock.

He pushed back his chair and rose, striding down the hall to the kitchen. He could have sworn he saw her go there only minutes ago, but the room was empty now. Where had she disappeared to?

Peering across the room he saw that the kitchen door was ajar.

It was fear that forced him forward. Flinging the door wide, he moved out into the yard, calling her name. Before he realized it, he was at the edge of the road.

For a moment David hesitated, glancing off into the purple haze haloing the ruined house, the weed-infested garden patch and the treetops rising darkly from the slope below. He wanted to stop but he couldn't, because he knew. It hit him the moment he saw the open kitchen door.

Crossing the road, he raised his voice in a shout. No response came, and desperation drove him past the huddled house and the windswept weeds, his feet churning dead leaves as he stared at the dead limbs of the towering trees beyond.

Then he did halt, heart hammering. Something was moving down there below between the twisted tree trunks—moving and emerging.

"Vera!"

She came toward him, hair disheveled, her housedress splotched and stained. But she was smiling.

“I thought I heard you,” she said.

David stared at her, numb with relief. “Are you all right?”

“Of course. Why shouldn’t I be?”

“But what were you doing over here?”

She reached out and took his hand. “I’ll show you.”

Before he could resist she was leading him forward, down into the woods, into the forbidden forest, while the voices rose. “No—don’t go—keep away from there, you hear?” His aunt’s voice, and his uncle’s, dead voices echoing over the years.

Now Vera’s voice, here and very much alive. “After last night I couldn’t help it. Oh, I knew there was nothing to worry about, but I had to make sure. And I did find something—here.”

She halted in a little clearing deep down under the trees, pointing to a cluster of matted grass and wilted wildflowers which sprouted from an oblong mound. “You know what this is?”

David blinked, silent and uncomprehending.

“Can’t you guess?” Vera smiled again. “It’s a grave.”

She stooped, parting the tangled growth at the far end of the mound and disclosing a weathered wooden slab. It bore neither dates nor inscription, only the crudely carved lettering of a name:

JED HOLLOWAY

“You see?” Vera nodded toward the mound. “Now we know there’s nothing to be afraid of. He’s been dead and buried here for years.”

Nothing to be afraid of. David nodded automatically and again she took his hand, leading him away from the dead man’s grave, past the twisted trunks of the dead trees, up the path between the skeleton of the dead house and the ruined remains of the dead garden.

But the garden wasn’t entirely dead. A flash of vivid color caught his eye in the rays of the setting sun and then he saw it clearly—the orange outline, rounded and resting amidst the weeds. Vera saw it too.

“Look, a pumpkin!” Her smile broadened. “Just what we needed.”

“Needed?” David frowned.

“Don’t tell me you’ve forgotten. Tonight’s Halloween.” She stooped, reaching toward the pumpkin, but David yanked her away.

“Leave it alone.”

“But David—”

“Leave it alone, I said!”

A sudden blast of sound interrupted Vera’s reply. The two of them turned, glancing toward the road at another orange object—the school bus, halting before their yard.

They crossed over to it just as Billy got out. The bus moved off, trailing a cloud of exhaust, and he turned to them, his face flushed with excitement.

“Guess what?” he cried. “We had a Halloween party at school. Miss Zelisko gave us a whole bunch of colored paper to make masks and black cats and witches and ghosts and we had a cake and orange soda and boy was it ever neat—”

“Take it easy, young man,” Vera said. “If you don’t slow down you’ll trip over your tongue.”

They moved across the yard to the back door. “You should of been there,” Billy said. “All the kids, they’re getting ready to go in town tonight for trick or treat. Can you drive me, Dad?”

“Sorry, son, I’ve got work to do.” Anticipating the next question, David continued quickly. “And don’t ask your mother. I’m going; to need her help.”

Vera glanced at him. “Maybe for just an hour, if we went early—?”

David shook his head. “I really do need you. I’m stuck in the middle of that damned resume.”

The boy’s smile withered, then suddenly blossomed anew. “Okay. But I can have a jack-o’-lantern, can’t I?”

“A what?”

“Don’t you know about jack-o’-lanterns? Miss Zelisko made one and brought it to class for the party. It’s a big pumpkin, only you carve a face on it. Then you squish out the insides and put in a candle to light up the face.”

“Now I remember,” David nodded. “We used to put one in the window on Halloween night when I was a kid.”

“Can I do it tonight, Dad? If we put it in the front window it would look —”

“Real neat,” David said. “Trouble is, we don’t have a pumpkin.”

“Yes we do.” Billy beamed happily. “I saw one yesterday—a great big one, too. It’s across the way in that old garden. We can get it right now—”

“No.”

“But it’s just an old pumpkin.” Billy’s voice took on a shrill edge. “Nobody even lives there, so it’s not like stealing. Why can’t I have it?”

“Because I say so, that’s why.” Ignoring Vera’s look, David took his son’s arm. “It’s getting dark. Time to go inside.”

Billy gazed up at him in mingled disappointment and defiance. “What’s the matter, Dad—you afraid of ghosts or something?”

“There are no ghosts,” Vera said.

But she wasn’t talking to Billy.

Nobody was talking to Billy now. He could hear Mom and Dad in the front parlor, arguing about the resumay, whatever that was. Something you showed people when you wanted to get a job, like. Anyhow he hoped it wouldn’t work because then they’d have to move back into town and he liked it here. This place was neat and even school was better than that old dump in the city. The only thing wrong was Dad, the funny way he acted lately. Like yesterday when he caught him sneaking across the road, and tonight, not letting him have the pumpkin.

No fair, that’s what it was. Other kids were going trick or treating, getting money and candy and good stuff like that. But he couldn’t even have a plain old pumpkin lying right there on the ground across the way. What good did it do to leave it? When the frost came it would only spoil. And it would make a real neat jack-o’-lantern, too, sitting there in the front window for kids to see when they came driving past with their folks on the way to trick or treat in town.

But what did Dad care? All he cared about was this resumay thing and now he was yelling at Mom again, real loud this time. So loud that he wouldn't even hear if somebody went out the kitchen door.

Two minutes is all it would take. Two minutes to sneak across the road and get that old pumpkin. Nobody would notice, not if you were quiet.

Just to prove it Billy came downstairs slow and careful. Sure enough, both of them were sitting in the parlor at the table under the lamp and they kept on arguing without looking up.

And the lock on the kitchen door opened easy.

It was almost dark outside now, dark and sort of chilly with a lot of clouds in the sky and a big orange moon coming up over the trees. Orange like the pumpkin across the road.

Billy crossed real fast and headed for the garden patch. He could hear the leaves scrunching under his feet and the wind blowing through the trees down there in the woods. When he got to the garden it was all shadows and he couldn't see the pumpkin lying under the weeds. The wind was sort of wailing now.

But Billy wasn't afraid of the shadows. And he wasn't afraid of that old house no matter how spooky it looked, because nobody lived inside. If the boards creaked that was just the wind. He was all alone here with nobody to see or stop him.

Now he saw the pumpkin next to a vine where the weeds were hiding it. Billy bent down to reach out for it.

And felt the cold hand gripping his shoulder.

I shouldn't have scared the kid, David told himself. Sitting there in the kitchen with only the bottle for company he stared out into the moonlight and poured himself another drink.

How was he to know the kid would be so shook up? He'd been shook up too when he noticed Billy was gone, and running across the road to get him was the natural thing to do. It wasn't as if he really feared for Billy's safety, but somebody had to teach him to follow orders. Why couldn't Vera understand?

But she didn't understand, any more than Billy. Instead she took his part. "Never mind that stupid old pumpkin," she told him. "How about you and I driving into town for trick or treat?"

Stupid pumpkin. Stupid David, that's what she really meant, and it hurt. Did she think he was wigging out? All he wanted was to protect the boy, teach him a little discipline.

Instead she rewarded him for his disobedience. Naturally, Billy was overjoyed and the two of them left happily together. Left him without another word, left him alone there feeling like a fool.

David raised his glass, watching it turn orange-gold in the moonlight streaming in from the window. The whiskey was orange-gold too, and as he drank it kindled a golden glow inside, warming and expanding.

He set the glass down with a sigh. Maybe I am a fool. Was it the liquor talking or did he really feel that way? He wasn't quite sure, but now he was able to face the possibility as his anger ebbed.

Perhaps he'd overreacted. After all, Billy was just a kid and his excitement was normal for his age. It wasn't his fault David felt the way he did about Halloween and something that had happened twenty-five years ago.

Vera was right; he was a grown man now and Jed Holloway was in his grave. Why keep him alive in his own mind?

David brought himself another drink. Bottle getting empty, he was getting full. But the whiskey was helping, helping him to think straight for the first time in months.

When you came right down to it, what did he really know about Jed Holloway? Seen through a child's eyes he'd been pure evil, but as a reasoning adult David knew nothing is completely pure or entirely evil. That talk about witchcraft was just local gossip, but even if it had been true, all it meant was that an eccentric old man got mixed up in superstitious nonsense.

There was no proof he'd ever actually harmed anyone, not even David himself. The events of that long-ago Halloween night had been colored by a child's imagination. Nothing actually happened except that Holloway had run him off his property.

Besides, he was dead now and David didn't believe in ghosts. So why was he acting this way? He'd only end up harming himself, and perhaps harming Billy too. No, Vera was right and he was wrong. No sense passing along his own foolish fears to the youngster.

Maybe it was already too late now, but at least he could try to undo the damage. He owed it to Billy, and to Vera. And there was a way.

David lurched to his feet and opened the top drawer at the side of the sink. His fingers fumbled, then closed around the handle of a big butcher knife. Pulling it out, he headed for the kitchen door. By God, if my boy wants a jack-o'-lantern he's going to have one.

Stumbling across the road, David felt no fear. He wasn't afraid of the night, not even when the moon hid behind a cloud. Perhaps the moon was afraid of the wind and the way the shutters banged against the boarded-up windows of the old house, but David didn't care. The woods down below were black as ink and he could hear the groaning of dead branches rubbing against the gnarled tree trunks, but that didn't scare him.

He weaved across the weedy garden, searching for the dark outline of the pumpkin on the ground below. When he found it there was nothing frightening about that either. Perhaps this was why people got the idea in the first place—carving a harmless vegetable into a hobgoblin face just to show they weren’t afraid.

David knelt beside the pumpkin, wrenched it free from the rotting vine, and lifted his knife. Drink made his fingers clumsy at first, but they steadied when he went to work. Squatting in the darkness he hollowed out the inside, then sliced away at the surface. First he cut two inverted triangles for eyes, then a longer one for the nose below.

Now the moon came out from behind the clouds and David wielded the knife quickly, forming the mouth into a grinning gash. The result was a perfect pumpkin head and he stared at it with a smile of satisfaction.

Suddenly the face of the pumpkin disappeared in shadow, looming from behind.

Then David turned and looked up into the other face.

It was a wonderful surprise, seeing the face in the front window as Vera drove into the yard. Billy saw it too and he bubbled. “Look, Mom—the jack-o’-lantern!”

Vera nodded. Gazing at tine pumpkin resting against the window ledge inside she felt as though a weight had been lifted from her. The candle within the hollowed-out pumpkin danced merrily behind the eyes and nose and mouth as the jack-o’-lantern smiled its warm welcome.

Her own smile warmed as she realized what its presence meant. David had come to his senses and from now on all would be well.

She cut the lights and motor, then emerged from the car. Billy’s door was already open and he slid out from the seat; he was so excited he dropped his trick-or-treat bag, and its contents spilled across the ground below.

“Pick that stuff up,” she told him. “I’m going in.” The front door was unlocked and she entered quickly, not even stopping to turn on the light.

The parlor was dark, but over at the window the jack-o'-lantern cast its friendly glow.

"David, where are you?" she called.

There was no answer, nor any need of one. For as she moved to the window sine saw what rested beneath it.

David was slumped against the windowpane. And the jack-o'-lantern wasn't on the ledge. Instead the pumpkin was perched between David's shoulders. On the stump where his head had been.

Somehow Vera found the strength. The strength to keep Billy in the yard while she called the state police, the strength to tell them what happened when they came, the strength to lead them down into the woods to Jed Holloway's grave.

It had been disturbed, its surface uprooted, the earth mound yawning open so there was scarcely need to dig. But setting down a lantern at the graveside, they did. A trooper offered a sympathetic shoulder and Vera pressed against it, averting her gaze as the other two officers wielded their shovels.

One of them spoke now. "Hey, look at the coffin—the lid's all splintered."

He slid it back, then gasped.

It was his gasp that caused Vera to look up, then run forward and peer down into the grave, into the open coffin and the moldering outline of what lay within—a fully articulated skeleton, the skull mouth frozen in a ghastly grin.

Cradled in its bony arm was David's head.

1985

Nocturne

Listen to me, darling.

You don't mind if I talk now, do you? I'm not sleepy yet, and there's so much I want to tell you. I couldn't before, because I was always afraid.

If that sounds funny to you, I can understand why. When you're young and beautiful there's nothing to be afraid of, is there?

I'm the one who was always getting put down, laughed at, rejected. And because of that I guess I came to the point where I rejected myself. Looking back I can see how that would make me afraid, make me a loner.

But you changed all that. I'm not afraid anymore, and with you beside me the loneliness is gone too.

That's another thing you never had to worry about, darling. People like you are never lonely, because they always have love. You get it from your folks when you're a kid, you get it from friends along the way, and then when you grow up you've got it made. Don't think I haven't noticed—all those jocks, the Big Men on Campus, coming on to you, making their moves. And you smiling, taking it all for granted.

Don't get me wrong, I'm not blaming you. Why shouldn't you take it for granted when that's how it's always been?

The reason I'm telling you this is to try and make you understand how different it was for me. Ever since I can remember I was running scared. And the worst time was at night when everything came together—being afraid because I was all alone in the dark and nobody cared, not even my folks.

I used to lie awake here in bed, crying because of the things Mom said, the things Dad did to hurt me. Looking back now I don't think they tried to make me feel bad on purpose; it's just that they didn't know how sensitive I was. To them, telling me I had a zit on my nose was just a joke. When they called me a klutz it was only their way of reminding me to be more careful. Saying that wearing glasses would keep me from making the team didn't mean they blamed me for it. But at the time it really got to me.

That's what made me afraid the most—when I realized I hated them for what they said, how they laughed. If my very own father and mother didn't care about hurting my feelings, how could I expect better from anyone else? To the other kids, the teachers, I must be ten times worse, so I hated them too. But I didn't want to hate them, I was afraid of hating everybody, so—like the shrink said—I projected my fear on the darkness instead.

Oh yes, I went to a shrink. You didn't know that, did you, darling? My folks never told anyone they sent me, it was a kind of guilty secret, something they were ashamed to admit. Their son going to a head doctor because he cried at night. And wet the bed. What's the matter, a big boy like you, acting like a baby? Grow up, be a man, they told me.

The shrink never said that, of course. He tried to help, I know he did, and after a while I got over the enuresis. That's the word he used, I've always remembered it. I remember a lot of things he told me, the things he taught me. But the main thing he taught me was something he didn't realize. He taught me not to show my feelings.

He thought he cured me of being afraid of the dark, and that's why I could stop seeing him. What really happened was I just stopped talking about the things that scared me. I wanted to please him, please my folks, get a taste of what it was like to be praised instead of blamed.

But all I could taste was the fear.

I'd lie awake in the dark night after night, fighting to keep from trembling. Now, instead of being afraid of hating others, I was afraid of things. Things like shadows, the shadows that crawled out of the corners, things like the wind howling outside the window. I’d hide my head under the pillows to shut out the shapes and the sounds, but it never worked.

Because then I’d fall asleep and the dreams came. That’s when the wind sounds changed into voices laughing at me, and the shadows turned into faces, all staring eyes and mouths that grinned. Every night they came, and every night I’d wake up screaming.

Please, darling, try to remember I’m not telling you this to frighten you, only to make you understand what it was like for me all these years.

The worst part was that I couldn’t say anything to anyone. Now I was an adult and everyone thought I’d outgrown my “little problem.”

That’s what my folks used to call it, my “little problem.” At least they didn’t talk to me that way when I got older. Instead it was, “I don’t see what a humanities major is going to do for you when you get out of school. Time you started thinking about something practical, a career. Here you are, going on twenty-one already, and you still have no idea what you want to do with your life.”

Not true, of course. I knew what I wanted to do. I wanted to crawl into a hole somewhere and die. And if I couldn’t manage that, maybe I’d have to do something else. Like committing suicide.

Don’t think it hadn’t crossed my mind. Nights like this, lying alone in bed here, I even planned the ways. But it was no use, I knew I didn’t have the guts to go through with it.

Afraid to live, afraid to die. So I read a lot, listened to music, went to the movies, watched TV. It filled time, but it couldn’t fill up my life. For that you need friends, people who care.

Please don’t get the wrong impression, darling. It isn’t like I just turned my back on everybody. I got to know a lot of people on campus and in my classes, and I tried to make friends with them, but it never seemed to work that way. Nobody wanted to hang out with me, invite me to their parties. I guess I know why. Who cares about a skinny little runt with glasses, somebody who’s afraid to look anyone in the eye and stutters when he tries to talk?

You never had that problem, did you? I know, because I was watching. Ever since the day you enrolled in English lit class I used to watch. Only it was more than just watching; I memorized you. The way you looked and walked and smiled and laughed, even little things like brushing the hair back from your forehead before you stood up to answer a question.

I don't suppose you noticed me at all. And I never got up enough nerve to talk to you or even say hello, not with that gang always around you—all those grinning guys with Burt Reynolds mustaches doing their macho numbers. Oh, I can't blame you for liking that attention. It's just that I didn't have a chance, and I knew it.

But I needed someone to care, and for a while I thought my folks might still be the answer. Seeing me graduate magna cum laude and all that, maybe they'd change their minds about me.

I remember how excited I was when they phoned and said they were cutting their vacation trip short and coming back in time for graduation ceremonies, and how good it felt driving out to the airport to pick them up.

You know what happened, of course. It was on the news, all over the papers. That damned freak crash, taking off from the stopover in Denver. They never got to see me graduate and I never saw them again, just the closed coffins. Then the funeral, and the lawyer, and settling the estate—but I don't want to talk about it. I'm not looking for sympathy, darling, just trying to make you understand.

At first it looked like things would get better for me, because I inherited enough to live on without worrying about a regular job. And there was nobody to put me down now or boss me around.

But that's what made it so bad. I was all alone, rattling around in this big house with no one to see or talk to. I got to feeling like I was in solitary confinement, and maybe I went a little stir-crazy.

That's the only way I can explain what I did. Up to now I've been ashamed to tell anyone, but I can tell you. Maybe you've already guessed the reason I had.

It's because I'd never been with a woman.

Hard to believe in this day and age, isn’t it? Twenty-three years old and still a virgin.

So I went to this hooker.

It happened because I couldn’t stand being alone anymore, so one night I drove over to this bar. That’s another thing: I never did dope and all I’d ever had to drink up until then was a beer or two once in a while. But this time I thought to hell with it, I’m going to find out what it’s like, and of course the straight shots hit me right away.

I didn’t even know I was drunk, just felt relaxed, almost like I am with you now. I was all alone in the place and I got to talking to the bartender. I don’t remember exactly what I said or how it came up, but he told me about this hooker and gave me the address. He even phoned to let her know I was coming; I suppose they had some kind of an arrangement.

If it wasn’t that I was drunk I’d never have gone through with it, but I went up to her apartment and she was waiting for me. She was a lot younger and prettier than I expected, more like a high-class call girl. Looking back now I can see she must have known what the situation was and did her best to make things easy, even helping me get my clothes off, and then—

And then, nothing. I won’t go into the gory details, I don’t want to think about it even now, but everything went wrong, and I couldn’t, and she started to laugh and called me a name. I didn’t care, all I wanted was out of there.

It wasn’t until later that I thought about the name she called me. Then I got mad, but I was really angry at myself for being such a fool.

The only thing I got out of it was learning how the drinks could help. I bought some whiskey to keep in the house and did my drinking at home. Don’t worry, I’m not an alcoholic or anything like that. I can quit whenever I want, and I know how to handle the stuff. But a few shots make me sleep better, without the dreams. The trouble is, when I’m awake I still get uptight and I have to take a couple of drinks just to calm down.

But I won’t have to depend on whiskey anymore. Now I have you. I don’t know how you feel, but to me it’s like a miracle. A dream come true.

Because sometimes even the drinks don’t help. Like tonight, when I got so worked up remembering all the bad things and wondering if there was any sense in trying to go on. Sitting here in the house when the storm started, listening to the wind rattling the shutters, looking at the empty bottle on the table, I knew I just had to get out. I hadn’t eaten anything since breakfast so I figured maybe some food would help. The rain was really coming down heavy when I left; it was hard to see ahead and the car kept skidding, so I decided to turn off on the side road and take the long way into town.

That’s when it really hit me—driving along the pitch-black road in the storm with no lights anywhere, no traffic, nothing but the woods all around. I guess the drinks were hitting me too, because when the fog started to roll in I got this terrible empty feeling inside, as if I was all alone and lost in the middle of nowhere. And I knew that even if the storm stopped and the fog lifted I would still be alone, still be lost, and nothing would ever happen to save me.

Then you happened, darling. You saved me.

The moment I saw you standing there next to that silly little red convertible and waving your flashlight, it was as though everything changed. Just recognizing you, knowing that you were really there and calling out to me, turned a nightmare into a dream come true.

Maybe you think it was just chance that made me take the side road so that I’d find you stranded there after your tire blew. But it wasn’t chance, darling; it was fate.

Looking back now I can see that it was meant to be.

Driving you to the service station, finding it closed, bringing you here to the house to use the phone, all this was fate too.

And the way you looked at me, the way you smiled, did something I can’t explain. For the first time in my life I felt like a real man. And for the first time in my life I could act like a man.

Let me confess something. I lied when I told you the phone was out. It really worked, but I didn't want you to know. What I wanted was to have you here with me, have you and hold you the way a real man holds the woman he loves.

That's what I did and I hope you understand now. I hope you realize what this has meant to me, and that it means something to you too. I knew I loved you too much to force you, so I'm glad it worked out the way it did. Everything just seemed to happen, because it was fate.

You were so wonderful, darling—not like that hooker, not like the girls who always laughed. I can forget them now, forget the shame and the tears, because I have you. From now on we'll always be together.

Thank you, darling. Thank you for making me happy with the gift of your love.

I only wish now that I hadn't killed you first.

The Shaggy Dog Bite

In all the world no man was more blessed than Khu, the Grand Shan of Tartary—nor more cursed.

None exceeded him in power or riches, the breadth of his domain, the virtues of his wife, and the vices of his concubines. Such were his blessings, but heed ye his curse.

For Khu, the Grand Shan, suffered from epilepsy, which men call the “falling sickness”—an affliction of sudden seizures, of convulsions occurring without warning.

Like many great rulers, the Shan had enemies. And it remained for one, whose name was Ling-Po, to discover the cause of his curse. The Shan, a learned and intelligent man, was unusually sensitive to crude japes and mindless jests. It was on occasions when he was exposed to such idiocies—most notably in the form of puns—that he became enraged, and thus responsive to his seizures.

Knowing this, Ling-Po devised what is called, in the heathen lands of the West, a “shaggy dog” story—a witless and revolting piece of nonsense designed to lead the unsuspecting reader to a “punchline” in the form of a truly disgusting pun. This particular story might well sicken any reader—and in the case of someone susceptible to epileptic seizures, it might even bring about his death.

Ling-Po inscribed his work on a scroll of parchment inserted in a golden tube, and personally presented it to the Shan as a birthday gift from an anonymous admirer.

Presently it came to pass that the Shan unrolled the scroll. Ling-Po waited, his heart pounding in uncertainty as the Shan began to read. Would the Shan indeed experience an epileptic seizure when he came upon the filthy pun at the end?

The Return of Lefty Feep

The first person I saw when I walked into Jack’s Shack was Lefty Feep.

I recognized him immediately, and I was half-way out the door again when he collared me. The tall, thin man dragged me into one of the ancient booths—so named because a sojourn there wotdd certainly have killed Lincoln, or anyone over five-feet-five in height—and greeted me with relish, which spilled out of the sandwich he was devouring.

“Slip me the grip,” he commanded. “Let the finger linger! Long time, no, si?”

“Lefty Feep!” I sighed. “What brings you here?”

“I just stop in for a bite,” he told me. “Can you lend me—”

“Same old Lefty.” I sighed again. Then I glanced at him closely. “Wait a minute—you’re not the same, are you? Where did you get that beanie?” I reached out to grasp it, but Feep twisted his head away.

“Not so much with the touch and clutch,” he warned me. “This is a souvenir of last year’s Convention.”

“Convention?”

“The Solacon,” Feep nodded. “Don’t tell me you are gafia?”

“What? Since when did you become a science fiction fan?”

“Smile when you say that,” the thin man replied. “I am a fan from way before Gernsback. Don’t you read about me in Fantastic Adventures?”

“Yes, but I never dreamed you were interested in the field.”

“Who do you think helps Campbell dig up those editorials?” he smirked. “I am a fan ever since Doc Smith is an intern.”

“So you went to the Solacon, eh? I can’t get over it.”

“Neither can I. But six months in an iron lung will help.” Feep grinned. “You want me to tell how it is to go around the Worldcon in eighty daze?”

“No,” I said, firmly.

But not half as firmly as Feep gripped me by the collar while he wagged his tongue and his tale.

“I wander into the Alexandria Hotel a few days ahead of time,” Feep began. “There was a big sign over the door which says SUOTHGAYTE IN FIVTEY-AIGHT, so I know Rick Sneary is already here.” He paused, long enough to get rid of the quotation marks hanging in the air, then continued.

Not being a Califoreigner, I am not familiar with this roach-ranch, but I get my bearings and also a room. The Alexandria is an old hotel but a spry one—on account of the management keeps pouring Geritol down the elevator shaft.

I get to my room and start to unpack, but just as I pull the cork out, the phone makes with a tone.

“Hello . . . this is Ron Ellik . . . can I come up for a minute? Okay.”

Two minutes after this conversation there are five fans and a case of warm beer in my room. There is also a lot of Ellikution going on because this is the smoke-filled room bit. Since the management does not provide ashtrays, we use the fan with the biggest mouth. Finally, around one a.m., we empty the ashes out of Ellik’s mouth and I go slack in the sack.

The next morning—which they call Tuesday, in California—I cut out for Ackerman’s house with Dave Kyle and spend the afternoon admiring Ackerman’s science fiction collection and Ruth Kyle, though not necessarily in that order. While Dave brushes the eye-tracks off his wife we talk with Barbara Silverberg and her husband, whose name I do not catch. Then seventeen fans show up and we make the scene in Pacific Palisades where Mark Clifton is talking at a salon. I ride out in a car piloted by Helen Urban and sit next to a sensitive fannish type name of Miriam Dyches. I can tell she is a fan because she is knitting a bra made out of two propellor beanies.

"The woman who runs this salon has her grips on the chips," the chick informs me. "Every Tuesday night she hurls a bash for the mink-and-vermin crowd, featuring guest celebrities. Why, one night she even has Maureen O'Hara's brother."

I am properly impressed, but even more so when we arrive and find a parking-place behind about $250,000 worth of Detroit iron. We approach a large mansion set behind a charming border of money-trees, and are greeted at the door by a collar-ad lad who seats us on the terrace. Fortunately, our hostess has an extremely large patio.

She is a gal of about 60-odd, and reminds me of Spring Byington's mother.

After the bash, we end up in a Pizzatorium in Hollywood, and Gordon Dewey and his wife drive me back to the hotel. It is then that I discover just how rich our hostess is, when I am told she is married to the young collar-ad lad.

Wednesday I meet and greet. I spend time with Bob and Sadie Shaw, Boyd Raeburn, and see Anna Sinclare Moffatt, who I really meet on Monday when I arrive and have dinner at her place with her husband and Rick Sneary.

I am surprised to see her at the hotel all dressed up and tell her so. "Where is your pail?" I inquire. "How come you are not making with the mop?"

"What do you mean?" Anna asks. "Why should I be down here with a pail?"

"I expect it," I tell her, "ever since I get a letter from Rick Sneary. He tells me you are the Charwoman of this Convention."

Laughing heartily at Sneary's spelling, she clobbers me over the head with a gavel and disappears into the bar, and I go off to supper with Tony Boucher and his family. I know Boucher lives in Berkeley and am all hot to ask questions about Berkeley Fandom, but he does not dare talk about such things in front of his wife and kids.

Thursday I meet and eat with Earl Kemp, the Chicago mob, the Detroit hoods, and a New Zealand fan named Mike Hinge—who I naturally recognize by his gait. I also run into Ron Bennett, the TAFF representative from England. I think he is a real swinging cat, but of course I do not get a chance to talk to him since he does not bring an interpreter. In the bunch at lunch is Walt Daugherty, and I also see Karen Anderson and her husband, whose name I forget. Then in the evening about a hundred and fifty fans show up at Ackerman's where he is holding open house.

Before he can let go of it, just about all the sensitive fannish faces in Southern California are sitting around on their sensitive fannish fannies. Charles Burbee shows up and starts huckstering watermelons, Gertrude M. Carr delivers the Gettysburg Address, and Roberta Gibson shows up with her husband, whose name I forget.

The next day the Convention opens and I see Walt Liebscher and A. E. van Vogt, and Rory Faulkner and Fritz Leiber. Also Honey Wood Graham and her husband whose name I never do learn. There is a big tea-drinking contest where everybody has to sit at a table and slurp down the stuff without going to the washroom. The trick is to eliminate the contestants without eliminating the tea. The winner is a chick name of Djinn Faine, who gargles twenty-three cups in an hour and seventeen minutes, after which I am somewhat disappointed, since I know she can do much better on account of I see her drink forty-four cups in rehearsal just a little while before.

The Convention itself is all fun and dames. I meet Ruth Matheson and Peg Campbell and Es Cole and lots of other types, and three beards name of Rotsler, Ray Russell, and Ted White. I go to more parties than you can shake a cocktail at.

I get my right hand stuck in a sticky machine John W. Campbell is using as a substitute for flypaper, and my left hand caught in Ed Wood's mouth. Fortunately I do not get bitten, as Ed Wood never closes his mouth once during the whole Convention. I listen to the President of the Arch Oboler Fan Club, who turns out to be Arch Oboler, and I see Ray Bradbury and Charles Beaumont and Jerry Bixby telling Terry Carr he can never be a writer because his name doesn't begin with a B. I get curious about the future, so Djinn Faine sticks out her tongue and I read the tea-leaves. I watch Berkeley Fandom turning out a fanzine on the only mimeo in the world with a bongo drum attachment.

All of this excites and delights me and I do not wish to leave California ever again. Unfortunately, I get a rush telegram calling me to a meeting in Washington. It is from a Mamie Eisenhower, the name of whose husband I forget—

"Now hold it just a moment," I interrupted.

"I am holding it," Feep retorted. "I learn the secret from Djinn Faine at the tea-drinking contest—"

"Tea-drinking contest!" I snorted. "Why, you weren't even there! It so happens I was a judge at this contest, along with Poul Anderson."

"Who? I never hear the name."

"No?" I sneered. "And I suppose you never heard of Bob Silverberg and Rog Phillips and Joe Gibson and Richard Matheson and Les Cole and all those others. Any more than they—or I—ever heard of you at the Solacon. Because you actually didn't attend. Did you, now?"

"Of course I attend," Lefty Feep insisted. "Maybe the reason you do not hear of it is on account of I use my fannish pseudonym."

"Fannish pseudonym?" I asked. "What is it?"

"Carl Brandon," said Lefty Feep . . .

The Yougoslaves

The Parisian spring had lost its charm.
The weather was poor, the air acrid;
the young men dressed like vandals,
and fiendish children lurked in the shadows.

I didn't come to Paris for adventure.

Long experience has taught me there are no Phantoms in the Opera, no bearded artists hobbling through Montmartre on stunted legs, no straw-hatted boulevardiers singing the praises of a funny little honey of a Mimi.

The Paris of story and song, if it ever existed, is no more. Times have changed, and even the term "Gay Paree" now evokes what in theatrical parlance is called a bad laugh.

A visitor learns to change habits accordingly, and my hotel choice was a case in point. On previous trips I'd stayed at the Crillon or the Ritz; now, after a lengthy absence, I put up at the George V.

Let me repeat, I wasn't seeking adventure. That first evening I left the hotel for a short stroll merely to satisfy my curiosity about the city.

I had already discovered that some aspects of Paris remain immutable; the French still don't seem to understand how to communicate by telephone, and they can't make a good cup of coffee. But I had no need to use the phone and no craving for coffee, so these matters didn't concern me.

Nor was I greatly surprised to discover that April in Paris—Paris in the spring, tra-la-la-la—is apt to be cold and damp. Warmly-dressed for my little outing, I directed my footsteps to the archways of the Rue de Rivoli.

At first glance Paris by night upheld its traditions. All of the tourist attractions remained in place; the steel skeleton of the Eiffel Tower, the gaping maw of the Arch of Triumph, the spurting fountains achieving their miraculous transubstantiation of water into blood with the aid of crimson light.

But there were changes in the air—quite literally—the acrid odor of traffic fumes emanating from the exhausts of snarling sports cars and growling motor bikes racing along to the counterpoint of police and ambulance sirens. Gershwin's tinny taxi-horns would be lost in such din; I doubt if he'd approve, and I most certainly did not.

My disapproval extended to the clothing of local pedestrians. Young Parisian males now mimicked the youths of other cities; bare-headed, leather-jacketed, and blue-jeaned, they would look equally at home in Times Square or on Hollywood Boulevard. As for their female companions, this seemed to be the year when every girl in France decided to don atrociously-wrinkled patent leather boots which turned shapely lower limbs into the legs of elephantiasis victims. The chic Parisienne had vanished, and above the traffic's tumult I fancied I could detect a sound of rumbling dismay as Napoleon turned over in his tomb.

I moved along under the arches, eyeing the lighted window displays of expensive jewelry mingled with cheap gimcracks. At least the Paris of tourism hadn't altered; there would still be sex shops in the Pigalle, and somewhere in the deep darkness of the Louvre the Mona Lisa smiled enigmatically at the antics of those who came to the city searching for adventure.

Again I say this was not my intention. Nonetheless, adventure sought me.

Adventure came on the run, darting out of a dark and deserted portion of the arcade just ahead, charging straight at me on a dozen legs.

It happened quickly. One moment I was alone; then suddenly and without warning, the children came. There were six of them, surrounding me like a small army—six dark-haired swarthy-skinned urchins in dirty, dishevelled garments, screeching and jabbering at me in a foreign tongue. Some of them clutched at my clothing, others jabbed me in the ribs. Encircling me they clamored for a beggar’s bounty, and as I fumbled for loose change one of them thrust a folded newspaper against my chest, another grabbed and kissed my free hand, yet another grasped my shoulder and whirled me around. Deafened by the din, dazed by their instant attack, I broke free.

In seconds, they scattered swiftly and silently, scampering into the shadows. As they disappeared I stood alone again, stunned and shaken. Then, as my hand rose instinctively to press against my inner breast pocket, I realized that my wallet had disappeared too.

My first reaction was shock. To think that I, a grown man, had been robbed on the public street by a band of little ragamuffins, less than ten years old!

It was an outrage, and now I met it with rage of my own. The sheer audacity of their attack provoked anger, and the thought of the consequences fueled my fury. Losing the money in the wallet wasn’t important; he who steals my purse steals trash.

But there was something else I cherished; something secret and irreplaceable. I carried it in a billfold compartment for a purpose; after completing my sightseeing jaunt I’d intended to seek another destination and make use of the other item my wallet contained.

Now it was gone, and hope vanished with it.

But not entirely. The sound of distant sirens in the night served as a strident reminder that I still had a chance. There was, I remembered, a police station near the Place Vendome. The inconspicuous office was not easy to locate on the darkened street beyond an open courtyard, but I managed.

Once inside, I anticipated a conversation with an Inspecteur, a return to the scene of the affair in the company of sympathetic gendarmes who were knowledgeable concerning such offenses and alert in ferreting out the hiding place of my assailants.

The young lady seated behind the window in the dingy outer office listened to my story without comment or a change of expression. Inserting forms and carbons in her typewriter, she took down a few vital statistics—my name, date of birth, place of origin, hotel address, and a short inventory of the stolen wallet's contents.

For reasons of my own I neglected to mention the one item that really mattered to me. I could be excused for omitting it in my excited state, and hoped to avoid the necessity of doing so unless the Inspecteur questioned me more closely.

But there was no interview with an Inspecteur, and no uniformed officer appeared. Instead I was merely handed a carbon copy of the Recepisse de Declaration-, if anything could be learned about the fate of my wallet I would be notified at my hotel.

Scarcely ten mintues after entering the station I found myself back on the street with nothing to show for my trouble but a buff-colored copy of the report. Down at the very bottom, on a line identified in print as Mode Operatoire—Precisons Complementaires, was a typed sentence reading "Vol commis dans la Rue par de jeunes enfant yougoslaves."

"Yougoslaves?"

Back at the hotel I addressed the question to an elderly night-clerk. Sleepy eyes blinking into nervousness, he nodded knowingly.

"Ah!" he said. "The gypsies!"

"Gypsies? But these were only children—"

He nodded again. "Exactly so." And then he told me the story.

Pickpockets and purse-snatchers had always been a common nuisance here, but within the past few years their presence had escalated.

They came out of Eastern Europe, their exact origin unknown, but "yougoslaves" or "gypsies" served as a convenient label.

Apparently they were smuggled in by skillful and enterprising adult criminals who specialized in educating children in the art of thievery, very much as Fagin trained his youngsters in the London of Dickens's Oliver Twist.

But Fagin was an amateur compared to today's professors of pilfering. Their pupils—orphans, products of broken homes, or no homes at all—were recruited in foreign city streets, or even purchased outright from greedy, uncaring parents. These little ones could be quite valuable; an innocent at the age of four or five became a seasoned veteran after a few years of experience, capable of bringing in as much as a hundred thousand American dollars over the course of a single year.

When I described the circumstances of my own encounter the clerk shrugged.

"Of course. That is how they work, my friend—in gangs." Gangs, expertly adept in spotting potential victims, artfully instructed how to operate. Their seemingly spontaneous outcries were actually the product of long and exacting rehearsal, their apparently impromptu movements perfected in advance. They danced around me because they had been choreographed to do so. It was a bandits' ballet in which each one played an assigned role—to nudge, to gesture, to jab and jabber and create confusion. Even the hand-kissing was part of a master plan, and when one ragged waif thrust his folded newspaper against my chest it concealed another who ducked below and lifted my wallet. The entire performance was programmed down to the last detail.

I listened and shook my head. "Why don't the police tell me these things? Surely they must know."

"Oui, M'sieur." The clerk permitted himself a confidential wink. "But perhaps they do not care." He leaned across the desk, his voice sinking to a murmur. "Some say an arrangement has been made. The yougoslaves are skilled in identifying tourists by their dress and manner. They can recognize a foreign visitor merely by the kind of shoes he wears. One supposes a bargain has been struck because it is only the tourists who are attacked, while ordinary citizens are spared."

I frowned. "Surely others like myself must lodge complaints. One would think the police would be forced to take action."

The clerk's gesture was as eloquent as his words. "But what can they do? These yougoslaves strike quickly, without warning. They vanish before you realize what has happened, and no one knows where they go. And even if you managed to lay hands on one of them, what then? You bring this youngster to the police and tell your story, but the little ruffian has no wallet—you can be sure it was passed along immediately to another who ran off with the evidence. Also, your prisoner cannot speak or understand French, or at least pretends not to.

"So the gendarmes have nothing to go by but your words, and what can they do with the kid if they did have proof, when the law prohibits the arrest and jailing of children under thirteen?

"It's all part of the scheme. And if you permit me, it is a beautiful scheme, this one."

My frown told him I lacked appreciation of beauty, and he quickly leaned back to a position of safety behind the desk, his voice and manner sobering. "Missing credit cards can be reported in the morning, though I think it unlikely anyone would be foolish enough to attempt using them with a forged signature. It's the money they were after."

"I have other funds in your safe," I said.

"Tres bien. In that case I advise you to make the best of things. Now that you know what to expect, I doubt if you will be victimized again. Just keep away from the tourist traps and avoid using the Metro." He offered me the solace of a smile which all desk clerks reserve for complaints about stalled elevators, lost luggage, faulty electrical fixtures, or clogged plumbing.

Then, when my frown remained fixed, his smile vanished. "Please, my friend! I understand this has been a most distressing occurrence, but I trust you will chalk it up to experience. Believe me, there is no point in pursuing the matter further."

I shook my head. “If the police won’t go after these children—”

“Children?” Again his voice descended to a murmur. “Perhaps I did not make myself clear. The yougoslaves are not ordinary kids. As I say, they have been trained by masters. The kind of man who is capable of buying or stealing a child and corrupting it for a life of crime is not likely to stop there. I have heard certain rumors, M’sieur, rumors which make a dreadful sort of sense. These kids, they are hooked on drugs. They know every manner of vice but nothing of morals, and many carry knives, even guns. Some have been taught to break and enter into homes, and if discovered, to kill. Their masters, of course, are even more dangerous when crossed. I implore you, for your own safety—forget what has happened tonight and go on your way.”

“Thank you for your advice.” I managed a smile and went on my way. But I did not forget.

I did not forget what had happened, nor did I forget I’d been robbed of what was most precious to me.

Retiring to my room, I placed the Do Not Disturb sign on the outer doorknob and after certain makeshift arrangements I sank eventually into fitful slumber.

By the following evening I was ready; ready and waiting. Paris by night is the City of Light, but it is also the city of shadows. And it was in the shadows that I waited, the shadows under the archways of the Rue de Rivoli. My dark clothing was deliberately donned to blend inconspicuously with the background; I would be unnoticed if the predators returned to seek fresh prey.

Somehow I felt convinced that they would do so. As I stood against a pillar, scanning the occasional passerby who wandered past, I challenged myself to see the hunted through the eyes of the hunters.

Who would be the next victim? That party of Japanese deserved no more than a glance of dismissal; it wasn’t wise to confront a group. By the same token, those who traveled in pairs or couples would be spared. And even the lone pedestrians were safe if they were able-bodied or dressed in garments which identified them as local citizens.

What the hunters sought was someone like myself, someone wearing clothing of foreign cut, preferably elderly and obviously alone. Someone like the grey-headed old gentleman who was approaching now, shuffling past a cluster of shops already closed for the night. He was short, slight of build, and his uncertain gait hinted at either a physical impairment or mild intoxication. A lone traveler on an otherwise-deserted stretch of street—he was the perfect target for attack.

And the attack came.

Out of the deep dark doorway to an arcade the yougoslaves danced forth, squealing and gesticulating, to suddenly surround their startled victim.

They ringed him, hands outstretched, their cries confusing, their fingers darting forth to prod and pry in rhythm with the outbursts.

I saw the pattern now, recognized the roles they played. Here was the hand-kisser, begging for bounty, here the duo tugging at each arm from the rear, here the biggest of the boys, brandishing the folded paper to thrust it against the oldster's chest while an accomplice burrowed into the gaping front of the jacket below. Just behind him the sixth and smallest of the band stood poised. The instant the wallet was snatched it would be passed to him, and while the others continued their distraction for a few moments more before scattering, he'd run off in safety.

The whole charade was brilliant in its sheer simplicity, cleverly contrived so that the poor old gentleman would never notice his loss until too late.

But I noticed—and I acted.

As the thieves closed in I stepped forward, quickly and quietly. Intent on their quarry, they were unaware of my approach. Moving up behind the youngster who waited to receive the wallet, I grasped his upraised arm in a tight grip, bending it back against his shoulderblade as I yanked him away into the shadows. He looked up and my free hand clamped across his oval mouth before he could cry out.

He tried to bite, but my fingers pressed his lips together. He tried to kick, but I twisted his bent arm and tugged him along offbalance, his feet dragging over the pavement as we moved past the shadowy archway to the curb beyond.

My rental car was waiting there. Opening the door, I hurled him down onto the seat face-forward. Before he could turn I pulled the handcuffs from my pocket and snapped them shut over his wrists.

Locking the passenger door, I hastened around to the other side of the car and entered, sliding behind the wheel. Seconds later we were moving out into the traffic.

Hands confined behind him, my captive threshed helplessly beside me. He could scream now, and he did.

“Stop that!” I commanded. “No one can hear you with the windows closed.”

After a moment he obeyed. As we turned off onto a side street he glared up at me, panting.

“Merde!” he gasped.

I smiled. “So you speak French, do you?”

There was no reply. But when the car turned again, entering one of the narrow alleyways off the Rue St. Roch, his eyes grew wary.

“Where are we going?”

“That is a question for you to answer.”

“What do you mean?”

“You will be good enough to direct me to the place where I can find your friends.”

“Go to hell!”

“Au contraire.” I smiled again. “If you do not cooperate, and quickly, I’ll knock you over the head and dump your body in the Seine.”

“You old bastard—you can’t scare me!”

Releasing my right hand from the steering wheel I gave him a clout across the mouth, knocking him back against the seat.

"That's a sample," I told him. "Next time I won't be so gentle." Clenching my fist, I raised my arm again, and he cringed.

"Tell me!" I said.

And he did.

The blow across the mouth seemed to have loosened his tongue, for he began to answer my questions as I reversed our course and crossed over a bridge which brought us to the Left Bank.

When he told me our destination and described it, I must confess I was surprised. The distance was much greater than I anticipated, and finding the place would not be easy, but I followed his directions on a mental map. Meanwhile I encouraged Bobo to speak.

That was his name—Bobo. If he had another he claimed he did not know it, and I believed him. He was nine years old but he'd been with the gang for three of them, ever since their leader spirited him off the streets of Dubrovnik and brought him here to Paris on a long and illegal route while hidden in the back of a truck.

"Dubrovnik?" I nodded. "Then you really are a yougoslave. What about the others?"

"I don't know. They come from everywhere. Wherever he finds them."

"Your leader? What's his name?"

"We call him Le Boss."

"He taught you how to steal like this?"

"He taught us many things," Bobo gave me a sidelong glance. "Listen to me, old man—if you find him there will be big trouble. Better to let me go."

"Not until I have my wallet."

"Wallet?" His eyed widened, then narrowed, and I realized that for the first time he'd recognized me as last night's victim. "If you think Le Boss will give you back your money then you really are a fool."

"I'm not a fool. And I don't care about the money."

"Credit cards? Don't worry, Le Boss won't try to use them. Too risky."

"It's not the cards. There was something else. Didn't you see it?"

"I never touched your wallet. It was Pepe who took it to the van last night."

The van, I learned, was always parked just around the corner from the spot where the gang set up operations. And it was there that they fled after a robbery. Le Boss waited behind the wheel with the motor running; the stolen property was turned over to him immediately as they drove off to safer surroundings.

"So Le Boss has the wallet now," I said.

"Perhaps. Sometimes he takes the money out and throws the billfold away. But if there was more than money and cards inside as you say—" Bobo hesitated, peering up at me. "What is this thing you're looking for?"

"That is a matter I will discuss with Le Boss when I see him."

"Diamonds, maybe? You a smuggler?"

"No."

His eyes brightened and he nodded quickly. "Cocaine? Don't worry, I get some for you, no problem—good stuff, not the junk they cut for street trade. All you want, and cheap, too."

I shook my head. "Stop guessing. I talk only to Le Boss."

But Bobo continued to eye me as I guided the car out of the suburban residential and industrial areas, through a stretch of barren countryside, and into an unpaved side road bordering the empty lower reaches of the river. There were no lights here, no dwellings, no signs of life—only shadows, silence, and swaying trees.

Bobo was getting nervous, but now he forced a smile.

"Hey, old man—you like girls? Le Boss got one the other day."

"Not interested."

"I mean little girls. Fresh meat, only five, six maybe—"

I shook my head again and he sidled closer on the seat. "What about boys? I'm good, you'll see. Even Le Boss says so—"

He rubbed against me; his clothes were filthy and he smelled of sweat and garlic. "Never mind," I said quickly, pushing him away.

“Okay,” he murmured. “I figured if we did a deal you’d give up trying to see Le Boss. It’s just going to make things bad for you, and there’s no sense getting yourself hurt.”

“I appreciate your concern.” I smiled. “But it’s not me you’re really worried about. You’ll be the one who gets hurt for bringing me, is that not so?”

He stared at me without replying but I read the answer in his fear-filled eyes.

“What will he do to you?” I said.

The fear spilled over into his voice. “Please, M’sieu—don’t tell him how you got here! I will do anything you want, anything—”

“You’ll do exactly what I say,” I told him.

He glanced ahead, and again I read his eyes.

“Are we here?” I asked. “Is this the place?”

“Oui. But—”

“Be silent.” I shut off the motor and headlights, but not before the beam betrayed a glimpse of the river bank beyond the rutted side road. Through the tangle of trees and rampant underbrush I could see the parked van hidden from sight amidst the sheltering shadows ahead. Beyond it, spanning the river, was a crude and ancient wooden foot bridge, the narrow and rotting relic of a bygone era.

I slipped out of the car, circling to the other side, then opened the passenger door and collared my captive.

“Where are they?” I whispered.

“On the other side.” Bobo’s voice was faint but the apprehension it held was strong. “Please don’t make me take you there!”

“Shut up and come with me.” I jerked him forward toward the trees, then halted as I stared across the rickety old makeshift bridge. The purpose it served in the past was long forgotten, and so was the huge oval on the far bank which opened close to the water’s edge.

But Le Boss had not forgotten. Once this great circular conduit was part of the earliest Paris sewer-system. Deep within its depths, dozens of connecting branches converged into a gigantic single outlet and spewed their waste into the water below. Now the interior channels had been sealed off, leaving the main tunnel dry but not deserted. For it was here, within a circle of metal perhaps twenty feet in diameter, that Le Boss found shelter from prying eyes, past the unused dirt road and the abandoned bridge.

The huge opening gaped like the mouth of Hell, and from within the fires of Hell blazed forth.

Actually the fires were merely the product of candle light flickering from tapers set in niches around the base of the tunnel. I sensed that their value was not only practical but precautionary, for they would be quickly extinguished in the event of an alarm.

Alarm?

I tugged at Bobo's soiled collar. "The lookout," I murmured. "Where is he?"

Reluctantly the boy stabbed a finger in the direction of a tall and tangled weed bordering the side of the bridge. In the shadows I made out a small shape huddled amid surrounding clumps of vegetation.

"Sandor." My captive nodded. "He's asleep."

I glanced up. "What about Le Boss and the others?"

"Inside the sewer. Further back, where nobody can see them."

"Good. You will go in now."

"Alone?"

"Yes, alone." As I spoke I took out my key and unlocked the handcuffs, but my grip on Bobo's neck did not loosen.

He rubbed his chafed wrists. "What am I supposed to do?"

"Tell Le Boss that I grabbed you on the street, but you broke free and ran."

"How do I say I got here?"

"Perhaps you hitched a ride."

"And then—"

"You didn't know I was following you, not until I caught you here again. Tell him I'm waiting on this side of the river until you bring me my key.

Once I get it I will go away—no questions asked, no harm done.”

Bobo frowned. “Suppose he doesn’t have the key?”

“He will,” I said. “You see, it’s just an old brass gate-key, but the handle is shaped into my family crest. Mounted in the crest is a large ruby.”

Bobo’s frown persisted. “What if he just pried it loose and threw the key away?”

“That’s possible.” I shrugged. “But you had better pray he didn’t.” My fingers dug into his neck. “I want that key, understand? And I want it now.”

“He’s not going to give it to you, not Le Boss! Why should he?”

For answer I dragged him toward the sleeping sentry in the weeds. Reaching into my jacket I produced a knife. As Bobo gaped in surprise, I aimed a kick at the slumbering lookout. He blinked and sat up quickly, then froze as I pressed the tip of the broad blade against his neck.

“Tell him that if you don’t bring me back the key in five minutes I’ll cut Sandor’s throat.”

Sandor believed me, I know, because he started to whimper. And Bobo believed me too, for when I released my grip on his collar he started running toward the bridge.

Now there was only one question. Would Le Boss believe me?

I sincerely hoped so. But for the moment all I could do was be patient. Yanking the snivelling Sandor to his feet, I tugged him along to position myself at the edge of the bridge, staring across it as Bobo reached the mouth of the sewer on the other side. The mouth swallowed him; I stood waiting.

Except for the rasp of Sandor’s hoarse breathing, the night was still. No sound emanated from the great oval of the sewer across the river, and my vision could not penetrate the flashing of flame from within.

But the reflection of the light served me as I studied my prisoner. Like Bobo, he had the body of a child, but the face peering up at me was incongruously aged—not by wrinkles but by the grim set of his cracked lips, the gaunt hollows beneath protruding cheekbones, and the sunken circles outlining the eyes above. The eyes were old, those deep dark eyes that had witnessed far more than any child should see. In them I read a present submissiveness, but that was merely surface reaction. Beyond it lay a cold cunning, a cruel craftiness governed not by intelligence but by animal instinct, fully developed, ready for release. And he was an animal, I told myself; a predator, dwelling in a cave, issuing forth to satisfy ageless atavistic hungers.

He hadn't been born that way, of course. It was Le Boss who transformed the innocence of childhood into amoral impulse, who eradicated humanity and brought forth the beast beneath.

Le Boss. What was he doing now? Surely Bobo had reached him by this time, told his tale. What was happening? I held Sandor close at knife-point, my eyes searching the swirl of firelight and shadow deep in the tunnel's iron maw.

Then, suddenly and shockingly, the metal mouth screamed.

The high, piercing echo rose only for an instant before fading into silence, but I knew its source.

Tightening my grip on Sandor's ragged collar and pressing the knife blade close to his throat, I started toward the foot bridge.

"No!" he quavered. "Don't—"

I ignored his panting plea, his futile efforts to free himself. Thrusting him forward, I crossed the swaying structure, averting my gaze from the dank depths beneath and focusing vision and purpose on the opening ahead.

Passing between the flame-tipped teeth of the candles on either side, I dragged Sandor down into the sewer's yawning throat. I was conscious of the odor now, the odor of carrion corruption which welled from the dark inner recesses, conscious of the clang of our footsteps against the rounded metal surface, but my attention was directed elsewhere.

A dark bundle of rags lay across the curved base of the tunnel. Skirting it as we approached, I saw I'd been mistaken. The rags were merely a covering, outlining the twisted form beneath.

Bobo had made a mistake too, for it was his body that sprawled motionless there. The grotesque angle of his neck and the splinter of bone protruding from an outflung arm indicated that he had fallen from above. Fallen, or perhaps been hurled.

My eyes sought the rounded ceiling of the sewer. It was, as I'd estimated, easily twenty feet high, but I didn't have to scan the top to confirm my guess as to Bobo's fate.

Just ahead, at the left of the rounded iron wall, was a wooden ladder propped against the side of a long, broad shelf mounted on makeshift scaffolding which rose perhaps a dozen feet from the sewer's base. Here the candles were affixed to poles at regular intervals, illuminating a vast humbled heap of handluggage, ruck-shacks, attaché cases, boxes, packages, purses, and moldy, mildewed articles of clothing, piled into a thieves' mountain of stolen goods.

And here, squatting before them on a soiled and aging mattress, amid a litter of emptied and discarded bottles, Le Boss squatted.

There was no doubt as to his identity; I recognized him by his mocking smile, the cool casualness with which he rose to confront me after I'd forced Sandor up the ladder and onto the platform.

The man who stood swaying before us was a monster. Forgive the term, but there is no other single word to describe him. Le Boss was well over six feet tall, and the legs enclosed in the dirt-smudged trousers of his soiled suit were bowed and bent by the sheer immensity of the burden they bore. He must have weighed over three hundred pounds, and the fat bulging from his bloated belly and torso was almost obscene in its abundance. His huge hands terminated in fingers as thick as sausages.

There was no shirt beneath the tightly-stretched suit jacket and from a cord around his thick neck a whistle dangled against the naked chest. His head was bullet-shaped and bald. Indeed, he was completely hairless—no hint of eyebrows surmounted the hyperthyroid pupils, no lashes guarded the red-rimmed sockets. The porcine cheeks and sagging jowls were beardless, their fleshy folds worm-white even in the candle light which glittered against the tiny, tawny eyes.

I needed no second glance to confirm my suspicions of what had occurred before my arrival here; the scene I pictured in my mind was perfectly clear. The coming of Bobo, the breathless, stammered story, his master's reaction of mingled disbelief and anger, the fit of drunken fury in which the terrified bringer of bad tidings had been flung over the side of the platform to smash like an empty bottle on the floor of the sewer below—I saw it all too vividly.

Le Boss grinned at me, his fleshy lips parted to reveal yellowed stumps of rotting teeth.

"Well, old man?" he spoke in French, but his voice was oddly accented; he could indeed be a yougoslave.

I forced myself to meet his gaze. "You know why I'm here," I said.

He nodded. "Something about a key, I take it."

"Your pack of thieves took it. But it's my property."

His grin broadened. "My property now." The deep voice rumbled with mocking relish. "Suppose I'm not inclined to return it?"

For answer I shoved Sandor before me and raised the knife, poising it against his neck. My captive trembled and made mewing sounds as the blade pressed closer.

Le Boss shrugged. "You'll have to do better than that, old man. A child's life isn't important to me."

I peered down at Bobo's body lying below. "So I see." Striving to conceal my reaction, I faced him again. "But where are the others?"

"Playing, I imagine."

"Playing?"

"You find that strange, old man? In spite of what you may think, I'm not without compassion. After all, they are only children. They work hard, and they deserve the reward of play."

Le Boss turned, gesturing down toward the far recesses of the sewer. My eyes followed his gaze through the shifting candle glow, and for the first time I became aware of movement in the dim depths. Faint noises echoed upward, identifiable now as the sound of childish laughter. Tiny shapes moved below and beyond, shapes which gleamed white amid the shadows.

The yougoslaves were naked, and at play. I counted four of them, scuffling and squatting in the far reaches of the tunnel.

But wait! There was a fifth figure, slightly smaller than the others who loomed over it and laughed as they pawed the squirming shape or tugged at the golden hair. Over their mirth rose the sound of sobbing, and over that, the echo of Bobo's voice.

Hey, old man—you like girls? Fresh meat, only five, six maybe—

Now I could see only too clearly. Two of the boys held their victim down, spread-eagled and helpless, while the other two—but I shall not describe what they were doing.

Glancing away, I again met Le Boss's smile. Somehow it seemed more hideous to me than the sight below.

He groped for a bottle propped against the pile of loot beside him and drank before speaking. "You are distressed, eh?"

I shook my head. "Not as much as you'll be unless you give me back my key."

He smiled. "Empty threats will get you nothing but empty hands."

"My hands aren't empty." I jabbed the knife at Sandor's neck, grazing the flesh, and he squealed in terror.

Le Boss shrugged. "Go ahead. I told you it doesn't matter to me."

For a moment I stood irresolute. Then, with a sigh I drew the knife back from Sandor's throat and released my hold on his sweat-soaked collar. He turned and raced off to the ladder behind me, and I could hear his feet scraping against the rungs as he descended. Mercifully, the sound muffled the laughter from below.

Le Boss nodded. "That's better. Now we can discuss the situation like gentlemen."

I lifted the knife. "Not as long as I have this, and you have the key."

"More empty threats?"

"My knife speaks for me." I took a step forward as I spoke.

He chuckled. “I swear I don’t know what to make of you, old man. Either you are very stupid or very brave.”

“Both, perhaps.” I raised the blade higher, but he halted my advance with a quick gesture.

“Enough,” he wheezed. Turning, he stopped and thrust his pudgy hand into a tangle of scarves, kerchiefs, and handbags behind him. When he straightened again he was holding the key.

“Is this what you’re after?”

“Yes. I knew you wouldn’t discard it.”

He stared at the red stone gleaming dully from the crested handle. “I never toss away valuables.”

“Just human lives,” I said.

“Don’t preach to me, old man. I’m not interested in your philosophy.”

“Nor I in yours.” I stretched out my hand, palm upward. “All I want is my key.”

His own hand drew back. “Not so fast. Suppose you tell me why.”

“It’s not the ruby,” I answered. “Go ahead, pry it loose if you like.”

Le Boss chuckled again. “A poor specimen—big enough, but flawed. It’s the key itself that interests you, eh?”

“Naturally. As I told Bobo, it opens the gate to my estate.”

“And just where is this estate of yours?”

“Near Bourg-la-Reine.”

“That’s not too far away.” The little eyes narrowed. “The van could take us there within the hour.”

“It would serve no purpose,” I said. “Perhaps ‘estate’ is a misnomer. The place is small and holds nothing you’d be interested in. The furnishings are old, but hardly the quality of antiques. The house itself has been boarded up for years since my last visit, I have other properties elsewhere on the continent where I spend much of my time. But since I’ll be here for several weeks on business, I prefer familiar surroundings.”

“Other properties, eh?” Le Boss fingered the key. “You must be quite rich, old man.”

“That’s none of your affair.”

“Perhaps not, but I was just thinking. If you have money, why not conduct your business in comfort from a hotel in Paris?”

I shrugged. “It’s a matter of sentiment—”

“Really?” he eyed me sharply, and in the interval before speaking, I noted that the sounds below had ceased.

My voice broke the sudden silence. “I assure you—”

“Au contraire. You do not assure me in the least.” Le Boss scowled. “If you do own an estate, then it’s the key to the house that’s important, not the one for the gate. Any locksmith could open it for you without the need of this particular key.”

He squinted at the burnished brass, the dulled brilliance of the ruby imbedded in the ornate crest. “Unless, of course, it isn’t a gate key after all. Looks to me more like the key to a strongbox, or even a room in the house holding hidden valuables.”

“It’s just a gate key.” Again I held one hand out as the other gripped the knife. “But I want it—now.”

“Enough to kill?” he challenged.

“If necessary.”

“I’ll spare you that.” Grinning, Le Boss reached down again into a bundle of discarded clothing. When he turned to face me against he held a revolver in his hand.

“Drop that toothpick,” he said, raising the weapon to reinforce his command.

Sighing, I released my grip and the knife fell, clattering over the side of the open platform to the surface of the sewer below.

Impelled by blind impulse, I turned hastily. If I could get to the ladder—

“Stand where you are!”

It wasn’t his words, but the sharp clicking sound that halted me. Slowly I pivoted to face the muzzle of his cocked revolver.

“That’s better,” he said.

“You wouldn’t murder me—not in cold blood.”

“Let’s leave it up to the kids.” As Le Boss spoke his free hand fumbled for the whistle looped around his neck. Enfolding it in blubbery lips, he blew.

The piercing blast echoed, reverberating from the rounded iron walls beside me and below. Then came the answering murmurs, the sudden thud of footsteps. Out of the comer of my eye I glanced down and saw the four naked figures—no, there were five now, including the fully clothed Sandor—moving toward the platform on which we stood.

Again I conjured up a vision of Hell, of demons dancing in the flames. But the flames were merely candle light and the bodies hurrying beneath were those of children. It was only their laughter which was demonic. Their laughter, and their gleefully contorted faces.

As they approached I caught a glimpse of what they held in their hands. Sandor had scooped up the knife from where it had fallen and the others held weapons of their own—a mallet, a wooden club, a length of steel pipe, the serrated stump of a broken wine bottle.

Le Boss chuckled once more. “Playtime,” he said.

“Call them off!” I shouted. “I warn you—”

He shook his head. “No way, old man.”

Old man. That, I swear, is what did it. Not the menace of the gun, not the sight of the loathsome little creatures below. It was just the phrase, the contempt with which it had been repeated over and over again.

I knew what he was thinking—an unarmed, helpless elderly victim had been trapped for torment. And for the most part he was right. I was weaponless, old, trapped.

But not helpless.

Closing my eyes, I concentrated. There are subsonic whistles which make no audible sound, and there are ways of summoning which require no whistles at all. And there’s more than human vermin infesting abandoned sewers, lurking in the far recesses of tangled tunnels, but responsive to certain commands.

Almost instantly that response came.

It came in the form of a purposeful padding, of faint noises magnified by sheer numbers. It came in the sound of squeaks and chittering, first as distant echoes, then in closer cacophony as my summons were answered.

Now the yougoslaves had reached the ladder at the far side of the platform. I saw Sandor mount the lower rungs, knife held between clenched teeth—saw him halt as he too heard the sudden, telltale tumult. Behind Sandor his companions turned to seek its source.

They cried out then, first in surprise, then in alarm, as the grey wave surged toward them along the sewer's length; the grey wave, flecked with hundreds of red and glaring eyes, a thousand tiny teeth.

The wave raced forward, curling around the feet and ankles of the yougoslaves before the ladder, climbing and clinging to their legs and knees. Screaming, they lashed out with their weapons, trying to beat back the attack but the wave poured on, forward and upward. Furry forms leaped higher, claws digging into waists, teeth biting into bellies. Sandor pulled himself up the ladder with both hands, but below him the red eyes rose and the grey shapes launched up from behind to cover his unprotected back with a blanket of wriggling bodies.

Now the screams from below were drowned out by the volume of shrill screeching. The knife dropped from between Sandor's lips as he shrieked and toppled down into the writhing mass that had already engulfed his companions. Flailing helplessly, their faces sank from sight in the rising waves of the grey sea.

It happened so quickly that Le Boss, caught by surprise, could only stare in stunned silence at the shambles below.

It was I whose voice rose above the bedlam. "The key," I cried. "Give me the key."

For answer he raised his hand—not the one holding the key, but the one grasping the gun.

His fingers were trembling, and the muzzle wavered as I started toward him. Even so, at such close range I realized he couldn't miss. And he didn't.

As he squeezed the trigger the shots came in rapid succession. They were barely audible in the uproar from the tunnel, but I felt their impact as they struck my chest and torso.

I kept on, moving closer, hearing the final, futile click as he continued to press the trigger of his emptied revolver. Looking up, eyes red with rage, he hurled the weapon at my head. It whizzed past me, and now he had nothing left to clutch but the key. His hands started to shake.

My hand went out.

Snatching the key from his pudgy paw, I stared at his frantic face. Perhaps I should have told him he'd guessed correctly, the key was not meant to open a gate. I could have explained the ruby in the crest—the symbol of a lineage so ancient that it still adhered to the old custom of maintaining a tomb on the estate. The key gave me access to that tomb, not that it was really needed; my branch of the line had other resting places, and during my travels I always carried with me what was necessary to afford temporary rest of my own. But during my stay here the tomb was both practical and private. Calling a locksmith would be unwise and inconvenient, and I do not relish inconvenience.

All this I could have told him, and much more. Instead I pocketed the key bearing the great flawed ruby that was like a single drop of blood.

As I did so, I realized that the squeals and chittering below had faded into other sounds compounded of claws ripping through cloth, teeth grating against bone.

Unable to speak, unable to move, Le Boss awaited my approach. When I gripped his shoulders he must have fainted, for there was only a dead weight now to ease down onto the platform floor.

Below me my brothers sated their hunger, feasting on the bodies of the yougoslaves.

Bending forward to the fat neck beneath me, in my own way I feasted too.

What fools they were, these creatures who thought themselves so clever! Perhaps they could outwit others, but their little tricks could not prevail against me. After all, they were only yougoslaves.

And I am a Transylvanian.

Pranks

Robert Bloch has been heard to say that he'd prefer to be known as the man who wrote the Bible, rather than as the man who wrote Psycho, but that's not likely to happen. Since his first story was published in 1934, his writing has definitely tended toward the unholy. With his screenplays, novels—The Scarf and American Gothic are particularly notable, and his recent The Night of the Ripper—and many collections of stories, Bloch has long since proved himself an undisputed master of the macabre.

And nowhere is he more masterful—or more macabre, for that matter—than in the short story. Here are some Halloween pranks from a man who definitely did not write the Bible.

The lights came on just after sunset.

He stood in the hallway, near the front door, filling the candy dish on the table with a skill born of long practice. How many times had he done this, how many Halloweens had he spent preparing for the joyful hours of the evening ahead? No use trying to remember; he'd lost count. Not that it mattered, really. What mattered was the occasion itself, the few hours of magic and make-believe one was privileged to share with the children. What mattered was the opportunity, however brief, to enter into the spirit of things, participate in the let's-pretend on the one night of the year when a childless couple could themselves pretend that they were truly no different from the members of the community around them; solid, ordinary citizens who took pride in their homes and their offspring.

Actually it wasn't all pretense; he was proud of this house, and rightly so, for it was he who had designed and created it, right down to the last knickknack and stick of furniture. And they had always loved children.

But truth to tell, it was the make-believe that thrilled him. Maybe they both had a childish streak of their own, dressing up to surprise the youngsters. And part of the fun was surprising one another, for it was an unspoken rule that neither of them ever revealed in advance just what sort of costume they'd be wearing.

Now, hearing her footsteps on the stairs, his eyes brightened in eager anticipation. One year she'd come sailing down the steps in hoopskirts as Scarlett O'Hara, another time she'd gotten herself up as a black-braided Pocahontas, once she'd worn the powdered wig of a Marie Antoinette. What would he see tonight—Cleopatra, the Empress Josephine, Joan of Arc?

Leave it to her to fathom his expectations and astonish him with the unexpected. And that, as she descended into full view, was exactly what she did. For instead of a figure out of film or fiction he beheld a little old lady with a motherly smile, wearing an apron over a simple housedress, as though she had just stepped out of an old-fashioned country kitchen.

"How do you like it?" she said.

For a moment he stared at her, completely taken aback, yet puzzled by the odd familiarity of her appearance. Where had he seen this smiling elderly woman before? Then, suddenly, his gaze darted toward the candy dish on the table and the empty box beside it. And there on the front of the box was his answer—the oval photographic portrait purporting to represent the candymaker herself. Tonight she was Mrs. See.

Now it was his turn to smile. "Marvelous!" he said. "It's hard for me to imagine you as an old lady, but I must say you look the part."

She nodded, pleased with his reaction. "I think the kids will like it. And they certainly should be able to recognize you too, Ben."

He peered at her through the tiny rimless spectacles and patted his paunch. “I hope so. At least I make a better Ben Franklin than last year’s Abraham Lincoln. Though I admit I was tempted to try something different for a change. Remember when I did Adolf Hitler—”

“And scared half the children out of their wits?” She shook her head. “Halloween’s for fun, not fright. No, I think you made a good choice.”

She bustled over to the table, inspecting the mound of chocolates heaped on the candy dish. “I see you’ve done my job for me.”

“That’s right.” He paused, listening to the sudden chiming of the grandfather’s clock beside the stairs. “Half past seven. They should start coming soon.” Then the doorbell rang.

She opened the door and the two of them stood side by side, gazing down at the little ragamuffin in the cowboy outfit as he clutched his crumpled shopping bag and rattled off the time-honored greeting. “Trick-or-treat,” he said.

She stepped back, smiling. “Isn’t he adorable?” she murmured. Then, “Come right in and help yourself. The candy’s on the table.”

The moment the front door closed, Joe Stuttman turned to Maggie, scowling. “Jesus H. Christ!” he said.

“Now, Joe, please!” Maggie sighed. “Don’t get yourself upset over nothing.”

“You call that nothing?” His scowl and voice deepened. “Those damned costumes must have cost a fortune. I’m not blind, you know—I read the ads. Okay, so most of Angela’s witch outfit you made yourself, but why in hell you had to go and buy Robbie that fancy space suit—”

“Simmer down,” Maggie told him. “You don’t have to pay for it. I’ve been saving up from my household allowance these past two months.”

“So that’s it!” Joe shook his head. “No wonder we’ve been eating so many of those lousy casserole messes lately. I work my tail off down at the shop and all I get to eat is glob because your son has to dress up like a goddamn astronaut for Halloween!”

"Our son," Maggie said softly. "Robbie's a good boy. You saw his last report card—all those A's mean he's really been doing his homework. And he still finds time to help me around the house and do your yard work for you. I think he deserves a treat once in a while."

"Treat." Joe went over to the coffee table in front of the television set, picked up the six-pack resting there, then yanked out a can of beer. "That's another thing I don't like—this trick-or-treat business. Running up and down the street at night, knocking on doors and asking for a handout. I don't care what kind of a fancy getup a kid's wearing. What he's really doing is acting like some wino on Main Street, a bum mooching off strangers. You call that good behavior? It's nothing but blackmail if you ask me." He thumbed the beer can tab. "Trick-or-treat—it's a threat, isn't it? Pay up or else. What are you training Robbie for, to grow up and join the Mafia?"

"For heaven's sake," Maggie said. "You don't have to go on a roll about it. You know as well as I do that trick-or-treat is just a phrase. People expect kids to ask them for candy or cookies on Halloween, it's just a tradition, that's all. And if somebody doesn't come through with a treat I'm sure neither Robbie nor Angela is going to do anything about it. They'll just go on to another house." She glanced unhappily toward the front door. "I only wish you'd let me put out a few little goodies for the kids who come here."

"No way," Joe said. He took a gulp of beer. "I thought we had that all settled. I'm not wasting my money on a mess of junk food for a bunch of little bastards who dress up in stupid costumes and come banging on my front door."

"But, Joe—"

"You heard me." Joe scooped up the six-pack with his free hand. "Now let's get those lights turned off, quick, before anyone shows up. I'm gonna watch the game on the set in the bedroom, and I don't want any interruptions. That means don't answer the door, do you read me?"

"Yes," Maggie said. "I read you."

Wearily she turned and started down the hallway toward the kitchen as Joe turned the living room lamp off behind her.

Do you read me? What a stupid question! Of course Maggie could read Joe, she'd been reading him like a book these past twelve years. And there were no surprises awaiting her; the stinginess, the rages, the insensitivity to the needs of others, all were part of an old, old story she'd come to know only too well.

Sighing softly, Maggie began to stack the dishes in the sink. As she did so she reminded herself that she had to be fair. Joe did work awfully hard, he did try to protect his family, and as husbands went he was probably better than most. In spite of his faults, Joe was a good man.

And maybe that was the trouble—he was a good man. A man who seemed never to have enjoyed his childhood, and who couldn't share in the fun his own children wanted to enjoy.

So it was up to her to see that they had a little of that fun in their lives. Like tonight—Halloween—a fun time for kids like Robbie and Angela. She hoped they were having a good time; perhaps when they grew up with families of their own they'd still be able to enjoy a harmless holiday.

It seemed to take forever for the twins to get ready; Pam's devil costume was too tight and had to be let out at the waist before it could be zipped up in back, and Debbie kept fussing with her clown makeup.

In point of fact, they didn't actually leave the house until almost eight-fifteen, but within three minutes after their departure Chuck and Linda Cooper were in bed.

"Alone at last!" Linda giggled. "My God, you'd think I was some kind of floozy, sneaking around like this and waiting for a chance to hop into the sack the moment the coast is clear."

"Be a floozy," Chuck said. "Come on, I dare you."

"Don't get me wrong." Linda sobered. "You know how much I love the kids, we both do. But lately it seems like we never get a chance, what with their bedroom right next door to ours and these damned mattress springs squeaking. I’m always afraid they can hear us.”

“So let them hear.” Chuck grinned. “About time they learned the facts of life.”

Linda shook her head. “But they’re still so young! Maybe I’m too self-conscious, I don’t know. It’s the way I was brought up, I guess, and I can’t help it.”

“Look, let’s not talk about it now, shall we?” Chuck tossed the covers aside. “I’m not going to spend the next two hours worrying whether or not the bedsprings squeak.”

“Sorry,” Linda said. “I know how tight things are right now, the way prices keep going up and you not getting that raise until next year. But if we could only afford a new mattress—”

“Buy you one for Christmas. How’s about that?”

“Oh, Chuck!” She turned to him, smiling. “Do you really mean it?”

“ ’Course I mean it. One new mattress for Christmas, that’s a promise. But right now we’ve got another holiday to celebrate, remember?” He took her into his arms. “Happy Halloween,” he said.

Sometime around nine-thirty Father Carmichael checked his watch. “Getting late,” he said. “I really should be going. I thank you both for a lovely dinner and a delightful evening—”

“Come on, Father, what’s your hurry?” Jim Higgins reached for the bottle and leaned forward to pour a good two inches of its contents into the priest’s brandy snifter. “One for the road, okay?” he said.

Father Carmichael shrugged in mild protest, but Martha Higgins beamed and nodded at him from her chair beside the fireplace. “Please don’t rush away. Billy and Pat should be home soon and I know they’d love to see you.”

“I’d like that.” The priest twirled his snifter, then raised it to drink, smiling as he did so. Then, as he set the glass down again, his expression changed. “Aren’t they a little young to be out at this hour?”

"It's trick-or-treat night, don't you remember?" Jim Higgins swallowed brandy in a single swig that emptied his own snifter. "After all, Halloween only comes once a year."

"Praise the Lord for that," Father Carmichael said softly.

Martha Higgins raised her eyebrows. "Don't you approve of trick-or-treat?"

"A harmless diversion," the priest told her. "But Halloween itself—"

"Now wait a minute." Jim Higgins spoke quickly, glancing at Martha out of the corner of his eye as he did so. "This is a nice friendly little town. You of all people should know that, Father. I realize a lot of parents go along with their youngsters on a night like this, but we talked it over and decided it was time for Billy and Pat to make the rounds alone if they wanted to. Sort of gives them a grown-up feeling, and helps them to understand there's nothing to be afraid of."

"Nothing to be afraid of." The priest sighed. Then, conscious of Martha Higgins' sudden frown, he forced a smile. "Don't mind me," he said. "It's the brandy talking."

"What do you mean?" Jim Higgins was frowning too. "What's all this about Halloween? Are you trying to tell us we ought to be afraid of goblins and witches? I thought people stopped believing in that stuff a couple of hundred years ago."

"So they did." Father Carmichael took a hasty sip from his glass. "They stopped believing. But that in itself didn't necessarily stop the phenomena."

"Don't talk like a damned fool!" Jim Higgins said, then halted, his face reddening. "Sorry, Father—no offense—"

"And none taken." The priest nodded. "You're quite right, of course. We're all of us God's fools, and some of us, I fear, are damned. But I spoke as neither, merely in my capacity as a servant of the Church. And though the Church no longer concerns itself with suppressing old wives' tales about pixies and leprechauns, it has not abandoned the fight against true evil. There are still those of us who are ordained to seek out and dispel the unclean and the unholy, or exorcise unfortunates possessed by demons."

"But isn't a lot of that just superstition?" Martha said. "All this nonsense about vampires and werewolves and the dead coming out of their graves? And even if such things were possible, I don't see what it has to do with Halloween. It's just another holiday." Father Carmichael finished his brandy before speaking. "The real holiday—holy day, that is—will come tomorrow, on the Feast of All Saints. It's then we celebrate Hallowmass in honor of Our Lady and all the martyrs unknown who died to preserve the faith. The faith which Satan abhors, because it affirms the power of Almighty God.

"But Satan too has power. And he chooses to manifest his defiance on the eve of Allhallows by loosing the forces of evil which he commands." The priest broke off, smiling self-consciously. "Forgive me—I didn't mean to start preaching a sermon. And I hope you realize I was just speaking figuratively, so to say."

"Sure thing." Jim Higgins moved to his wife and put his hand on her shoulder. "Just a little Halloween ghost story, right?"

Martha nodded but her eyes were troubled, intent on Father Carmichael as he glanced at his watch again, then rose.

"Time I was leaving," he said. "I take it I'll be seeing you both at Mass tomorrow—"

Martha gestured quickly. "But you haven't seen the children yet! They should be here any minute now. Please, Father. Won't you stay?"

The priest hesitated, conscious that the smile had faded from her face as he stared into the troubled eyes. "Of course," he said. "Of course I'll stay."

Then there was silence, except for the crackle of flames in the fireplace and the faint, faraway ticking of a clock.

Jim Higgins frowned. "Almost ten-thirty," he murmured. "They promised to be back by ten at the latest." The frown deepened. "You'll pardon my language, Father—but where in hell are those kids?"

"Heavely," Irene Esterhazy said. "I mean heavenly." She lurched against the buffet table as she took another bite of her croissant. "Try one, honey—they're soooo good!"

Howard Esterhazy shook his head. “No time for that,” he told her. “We’ve stayed too long as it is.”

“But it’s such a lovely party.” Irene turned, nodding toward the crowd of couples milling about in the living room beyond, her voice rising above the babble of animated conversation. “Besides, I want ’nother drink—”

She lurched again and Howard gripped her shoulder. “You’ve had enough,” he said. “We’re going home.”

“Oh, Howie—”

“You heard me.” He guided her forward. “Now pull yourself together and say good night to our host and hostess.”

Irene made a face. “Must I?”

“You must,” Howard said.

And she did, somehow managing not to slur her words as they exchanged farewells and made their way out to the driveway.

Once in the car, with the windows open and the night air fanning her face, Irene sobered slightly. “You mad at me, honey?”

“No.” Howard sighed, eyes intent on the road. “I guess you’re entitled to a little diversion once in a while. But do you realize what time it is?”

Irene focused her eyes on the illuminated dial of the dashboard clock. “My God, you’re right! It’s almost eleven. I had no idea—”

Her husband nodded. “I know. And I didn’t want to spoil your fun. It’s just that I told Connie we wouldn’t be late.”

“Maybe we ought to give her a little something extra,” Irene said. “She’s always been so good about sitting with Mark, even though she does play that damn stereo full blast.”

“You can say that again,” Howard muttered as they pulled up before the house. The wind was rising, sending surges of sound through the treetops, but the screech of the stereo echoed so loudly that even their voices were drowned by its pounding beat as they left the car and moved up to the front door.

Howard’s thumb jabbed at the buzzer. “Maybe I should use the key,” he said. “She can’t hear anything over that racket.”

But as he fumbled in his pocket the door swung open quickly and Connie peered out. “Oh, it’s you—” she said.

“Who did you expect, Michael Jackson?” Howard scowled.

“I thought it was Mark.” Connie’s voice faltered. “Mark?” Irene moved into the hall, her forehead furrowing. “You mean he isn’t here?”

“Please, Mrs. Esterhazy.” The girl gestured helplessly. “Don’t be angry with me. I thought it would be all right.” Her voice was muffled by stereophonic stridency.

“Turn that thing off!” Howard shouted.

Retreating to the living room, Connie hastily obeyed, then turned to confront the Esterhazys’ accusing stare.

“Now what’s all this about Mark?” Howard said. “Where is he?”

Connie’s gaze dropped and her words came with forced bravado. “You know Bill Summers, that friend of his from down the street? Well, he came to the door and I thought it was trick-or-treat, but it turned out he wanted Mark to come out with him. Just around the block, he said, because he didn’t want to go alone. I told Mark no, he wasn’t supposed to, and he had all the candy he wanted right here at home that you left for him. Besides, he didn’t even have a costume. But Bill said it would only be for a few minutes, and Mark was almost crying, he wanted to go so bad. So I figured why not let him just as long as he promised to come right back and not go off the block? Besides, I told my boyfriend where I was sitting tonight and he called on the phone right in the middle of all this going on, so—”

“You mean you disobeyed our orders?” There was no slur in Irene’s voice now, only the sharp shrill of sudden anger. “You let him go?”

“I’m sorry. I guess I wasn’t thinking—”

“Never mind that.” Howard’s hoarse voice held apprehension as well as anger. “How long ago was this?”

“How long?” Connie shook her head. “I don’t know. I mean, I was on the phone and then I started playing the stereo, like maybe around ten o’clock.”

“Then he’s been gone over an hour.” Howard’s face was grim. “Maybe an hour and a half, while you sat there blabbing with your boyfriend and listening to that goddamn rock crap!”

Connie began to cry, but Irene ignored her. She turned to her husband. “Why don’t you get in the car and take a run around the block? He can’t have gone very far.”

“I hope to God you’re right.” Howard moved toward the hall. “Meanwhile, you better phone the Summerses and see if Bill brought him back over there.”

“Good idea. I never thought of that.” Irene was already dialing as Howard started up the car outside, and she could hear it pulling away as Mrs. Summers responded to her call.

“Hello—Midge?” Irene spoke quickly. “Sorry to bother you at this late hour, but I was wondering—” Connie stood beside her, trying to control her sniffles as she listened. But Irene’s words and the pauses between them told their own story, and when at last she hung up and turned her anguished face to the light Connie started to cry again.

“You heard?” Irene said. “Bill’s gone too.” Then her voice broke. “Oh my God!” She rose. “What’s keeping Howard so long?”

The answer came as a car screeched to a halt in the driveway and Irene opened the front door to admit her husband. The night wind was cold, but what really chilled her as he entered was the realization that Howard was alone.

“No sign of him,” he muttered. “I covered everything for a half mile up and down, and there’s not a kid out anywhere.”

“There wouldn’t be, at this hour.” Irene nodded. “I know he’s not at the Summerses’, but maybe he and Bill stopped by somewhere else. I’m going to phone the Coopers and see—”

“Don’t bother,” Howard said. “I’ve just come from there. And before that I looked in on the Stuttmatis and those new people, Higgins or whatever their name is. Their kids haven’t come home either.”

“But that’s impossible! Do you realize it’s past eleven-thirty?” She trembled, fighting the tears. “Where could they be?”

“We’ll find out.” Howard brushed past her, striding toward the phone. “I’m calling the police.”

The grandfather’s clock began to boom its message of midnight as potbellied Benjamin Franklin and little old Mrs. See peered into the parlor at the left of the front hallway.

“I’m glad we used candy this time,” she said. “And that was a good idea of yours, giving money instead if the youngsters came to the door with their parents.”

It was dark in the parlor and they had only a moment to stare through the shadows at the huddled forms lying motionless within.

“How many are there?” he said.

“Thirteen.” She beamed at him as the chimes came to an end. “At least we won’t be going hungry.”

Sergeant Lichner kept his cool, but it wasn’t easy. The station was like a madhouse, all those parents yelling and crying, and it took a team of four men just to question them and get some facts, instead of listening to wild guesses about kidnappers or crazies who put razor blades in Halloween candy.

But in the end he got it all together, using the statements to map out a route. Putting through some phone calls to establish where each child or group of children had last been seen, it turned out that everything must have happened somewhere within the area of one square block.

Then he called in backups and started out. There were four black-and-whites assigned to the search, each with its quota of parents, and each taking a single side of the block as they went from door to door asking questions.

On three sides the answers formed a pattern. Various youngsters had knocked on doors at various times, but all had been seen and accounted for.

Sergeant Lichner himself was in a fifth car, and to speed makers up he took one end of the block while the fourth car started at the other.

It wasn’t until the two cars converged in the middle of the block to compare notes that he got an answer. Sid Olney pulled up and got out, shaking his head. “They were here, all right,” he said. “Stopped at every house back there, right on up until around eleven. What did you find out, anything?”

Sergeant Lichner took a deep breath. “Same as you.” He glanced at the house directly behind him. “Folks in the last place said the Esterhazy kid and the Summers boy were there late, almost eleven-thirty. What time did your people see them?”

Sid Olney shook his head. “They didn’t.” He shook his head. “That’s funny.”

But there was no mirth in his eyes, or the eyes of the parents as they stared at the spot where the trail ended—the space between the two houses looming on either side of the weed-choked vacant lot lying empty and deserted under the Halloween moon.

Reaper

After the kids have grown up and moved away, a new child comes into your house.

His name is Death.

He comes quietly, without the wail of an infant, and he won't keep you up at night or make daily demands on your attention. But somehow you'll know he's there to stay. As he keeps growing, getting bigger and stronger with each passing day, you become smaller and weaker. Sooner or later there'll be the inevitable confrontation—and when it comes, you're the one who'll have to go.

Ross wrote these lines on the morning of his sixty-fifth birthday, then put them aside.

He was tired of writing about Death with a capital D. As an author of dark fantasy he'd done more than his share of dramatizing man's mortality, and it was difficult to find a fresh approach. Too many writers had exhausted the idea—Death as an angel, Death setting an appointment in Samarra, Death taking a holiday, Death trapped up a tree, Death forestalled, Death deceived. And it was all wishful thinking. There's nothing angelic about the Grim Reaper; he takes no holidays, he won't be fooled or forestalled. Death is an impersonal force, not an articulate and articulated skeleton swinging a scythe.

Ross shrugged and left his desk. After all, a man is entitled to take time off and celebrate his birthday, even if nobody else cares whether he lives or dies.

His parents and relatives were long gone and he'd never married. During the years he spent here in an old house on the peninsula of upper Michigan, Ross formed no friendships. He corresponded with his agent and editors, but his only personal contact with other people came when he drove into town for groceries.

Ross was a loner, but he never felt lonely. Newspapers, magazines and books came from his mailbox, and his children kept him company.

His children stood on the bookshelves of his workroom, row on row—the novels with their stiff spines and sturdy skins, the short stories secure within the pages of magazines and anthologies. Some of them, transformed by translation, spoke in foreign tongues. Others appeared only in original editions, their voices weakened to a whisper by the passing years. But here and abroad, in or out of print, they still lived, still possessed the power to speak to new readers in time to come.

Ross regarded them with parental pride, for even the least of the lot contained something of himself. He loved his children—and envied them, because they would outlive him. Eventually, of course, they too must die—their spines would sag, their bindings fall apart, their pages crumble. But long before that happened his own spine would cease its support, the skin binding his body would wrinkle and wither until what was within disintegrated.

It was already beginning to happen now. Now, as the years took their relentless toll; as eyes blurred, teeth decayed, aches and pains proliferated, memory dimmed and thought strayed from his control to focus on fear.

Ross sought the sunlight outside his house and went for a walk in the woods. But there were shadows lurking among the trees, and fear walked with him. Try as he would, he couldn't shake off the thought of Death—Death with a capital D. Sooner or later it would come, bringing eternal sleep.

To sleep, perchance to dream—

This was what he really feared. The mind continues to function when you sleep. Suppose it continues to function when you die. Suppose consciousness lives on, even in the grave, in the deep, damp darkness where the brain lies buried within a rotting corpse, imprisoned yet aware, unable to escape from the ultimate eternity of hopeless horror.

Does pain still register? If you avoid the terrors of entombment, will cremation bring a torment like the fires of hell?

His mind dwelt on the ways the end might come—the sudden violence of accident or even murder, or the slow agonies of terminal illness. As Ross walked on the sunlight faded and the shadows deepened. There was no solace to be found here in the woods.

Back at the house he prepared a solitary meal, then had a few drinks, but it was hardly a birthday celebration. The thought obsessed him—how would he meet Death?

And that night, after sinking into troubled slumber, he met Death in a dream.

There he was, the King of Terrors himself, a gleaming skeleton standing at the foot of Ross's bed. The bony fingers dangling from his left wrist were curled around an old-fashioned hourglass; the fleshless talons below the right wrist grasped the handle of a scythe.

Ross stared at the cruel curve of the scythe blade—the blade of the Grim Reaper. Death, he realized, was not a child. The apparition before him embodied all the attributes of legend, the skeletal symbol of tradition and the Tarot.

Ross also realized he was dreaming.

"Wrong."

There was no sound, but Ross heard the word, even as he saw the movement of the jutting jaw.

"No!" Ross was talking in his sleep. "You can't be real—you're just a figment of my imagination."

Death laughed soundlessly, but Ross heard him, heard the unspoken words that followed.

"What about those books and stories you've written? All of them are figments of your imagination too, but they're real enough. They exist because you created them.”

“I didn’t create you,” Ross murmured.

“That’s because there was no need,” said Death. “Imagination possesses a power of its own. And the imagination of millions of men before you gave me semblance and substance. Believe me, I’m as real as you are. Even more so, since you will die and I’ll go on forever.” Once more the soundless chuckle came.

“Why are you here?” Ross whispered.

Death motioned with his scythe and the sound of the swishing blade was audible enough. “Your hour has come.”

Ross’s head stirred on the pillow. “But I don’t want to die!”

“Few men do, unless prompted by unbearable agony. Consider yourself lucky to be spared such suffering.”

Ross shuddered. “Please, I beg of you—”

“Beggars die. And so do kings. That’s true democracy.”

Suddenly Ross became conscious of the creeping chill. His body was invaded by a numbing cold that turned blood into ice. “No!” he gasped. “There’s got to be some way—”

Slowly the skull nodded atop its bony perch. “You want to make a bargain, I take it.”

“Can that be possible?” Ross murmured.

“Of course.” Skeleton fingers stroked the scythe blade with a rattling sound. “Once I walked the world with this weapon and wielded it upon each man, woman or child at the appointed time.” Death shifted the hourglass cradled against his rib cage. “But the world changed. Instead of a few thousands, there are millions of mortals, far too many to fall beneath a single scythe.

“At first I had help. Famines and pestilence, epidemics of cholera, bubonic plague, a score of other fatal diseases. But medicine advanced and the numbers of survivors grew again.

“For a while wars solved my problem. Genghis Khan, Attila, Tamerlane and a hundred others in the past—men like Napoleon, Hitler, Stalin—gave me battles where fifty thousand fell in a single day.

“I still have wars, even new drugs and bugs, but it’s never enough, not in this era of population explosion. That’s why I’m prepared to make an offer.”

Ross scowled in sleep. “I’m not a ruler or a general—just an ordinary man.”

“I don’t expect anything extraordinary,” said the voice that was not a voice. “But every little bit helps. What do you say to dealing with me on a one-to-one basis? One extra year of life for each death?”

“Immortality?”

“I don’t promise that. You may grow weary and decide to end our bargain. Meanwhile let’s call it a stay of execution.” The jawbone of the skull quivered in silent mirth.

Again Ross frowned. “But you’re asking me to become a murderer—”

“You’ve already committed murder many times in your mind and described the deeds on paper.”

“That’s different. I couldn’t actually kill another human being.”

“Why not? Life is meaningless. Everyone dies, sooner or later.” The skull’s grin gleamed. “And you can choose whoever you wish. Think of the power I’m giving you.”

“I don’t want such power!”

“Not even if it’s power to do good?” Once more the bony fingers caressed the scythe. “Look around you. The world is filled with those who deserve to die. Make the proper choices and you won’t be dealing death—you’ll be dealing justice.”

“It’s still murder,” Ross whispered.

“Consider yourself an Avenging Angel,” Death murmured. “Isn’t there someone you know of who has forfeited the right to live?”

Ross hesitated, then nodded in slumber. “You’re right, there is someone. A man named Wade, the one who butchered all those women and got off with a life sentence, which means he’ll be out again in a few years. I wouldn’t mind killing a mass murderer.”

“Sorry,” Death told him. “Wade happens to be one of my emissaries. We made a deal long ago and he still has years to live, in or out of prison.”

Ross sighed. “Then I’ll settle for the people who permitted such a miscarriage of justice. His scumbag lawyer, the nit-picking judge, the stupid jury—”

The skull’s grin seemed to broaden. “Don’t forget the parole officer who was supposed to keep an eye on him after a previous conviction, or the juvenile authorities who turned him loose before that. If you expect to do away with everyone connected with the case you’ll be quite a mass murderer yourself.”

“But there must be somebody who’s ultimately responsible!”

“You decide. The power to slay or spare will be yours alone. I’ll never force you to act if you don’t want to. That’s part of our contract.”

“I still don’t like the idea—”

Death swung his scythe. “Do you like this better?” He leaned forward over the foot of the bed. “Think of what I’m offering. One whole year in return for one little life. Choose your own time, your own candidate, your own method.”

“Suppose I get caught.”

“You won’t. Your whole career has been devoted to devising fictional fatalities, putting perfect crimes on paper. Use the same ingenuity in your own behalf and there’s no danger.” The bony arm raised the scythe and a blast of freezing air fanned Ross’s face. “So what will it be? Do or die?”

Ross stirred restlessly. “And if I accept your offer—what then?” Skeleton shoulders shrugged. “Nothing. No contracts signed in blood, no hocus-pocus. Just a verbal agreement. One life, one year.

Call it a birthday present.” The skull’s eye sockets fixed on Ross’s face. “Well?”

“Done,” Ross whispered.

Death raised the hourglass and reversed it. Slowly the sand began sifting down into the lower half, grain by grain.

“One year,” Death murmured.

And vanished.

If, indeed, he had ever been there.

In the light of the morning sun Ross wasn’t sure. The mind plays tricks.

So does the body.

By midafternoon he was back in bed, shivering in the sudden onslaught of chills and fever. Dreams can herald illness, he told himself. But as darkness deepened, the fever flamed, bringing visions—Death, with his fleshless face and soundless voice, his scythe and hourglass. How soon would the sand run out? When it did, the scythe would swing, and he feared that scythe. Isn ’t there someone you know of who has forfeited the right to live?

Ross tried to think. The mind is a computer, and in delirium the computer was down. Those rich writers with their fancy word processors—did their expensive equipment ever go down too? His mind was blank, blank as a computer screen, but now something flickered into view.

A face was forming. He’d seen it many times before, in close-up on television talk shows, peering out at him from newspaper pages, smiling smugly on the backs of book jackets.

Kevin Colfax. He knew the name. Thanks to the media, everyone knew Kevin Colfax. Famous author. Owner of a villa on the Riviera, a fleet of classic cars, a sixth wife and a dozen mistresses.

Romans k clef, that’s what they called his books. He cannibalized from the pages of The National Enquirer and People magazine, took the lives of celebrities and turned them into pornography—grossly explicit sex and vulgar violence to feed the fantasies of mindless millions bent on mental masturbation. His steamy sleaze boosted him to best-seller lists and the A lists of parties where lines of coke were snorted by upwardly mobile arrivistes who no longer had any place to go except where tripping might take them. But now he was where he really belonged—on Ross’s hit list.

The face faded in the flush of fever and Ross murmured through dry, cracked lips. “Kill Kevin Colfax.” Perspiration bathed his body as he sank into slumber.

When he awoke the following morning the fever was gone but resolution remained. Kevin Colfax deserved to die.

The only question was how—there must be a way that left no clue.

Poison?

Over the years Ross had researched toxicology and amassed an imposing number of reference works. Amazing how many lethal compounds existed that were easy to procure, or concoct from simple substances found in almost every household. Fast-acting, fatal and almost undetectable if proper precautions were taken.

Once he knew what to look for, Ross lost no time in finding it. The insecticide had been outlawed years ago but he’d never bothered to throw it away and still had half the contents in a spray can. A bit of boiling on the stove and the stuff condensed, leaving a deadly distillate that would kill on contact.

But how to make that contact?

He didn’t know Kevin Colfax or anyone in the privileged circles which he orbited. There was no way of introducing a pinch of the poisonous substance into his food or drink or the powder he inhaled through his nasal passages. Colfax was surrounded by personal security designed to protect him from friends, foes and fans alike.

Fans.

Ross sat down at the typewriter and wrote a letter. A fan letter to Kevin Colfax, asking for an autographed photo.

He typed it quickly; the rubber gloves he’d donned didn’t interfere with his speed. Nor did they interfere as he added a drop of water to a smidge of the poisonous powder, turning it to a paste, which he carefully smeared on the gummed flap of the stamped self-addressed return envelope enclosed in his letter.

The name and address on the envelope were faked, of course, but the poison was real. Real and reliable. One lick and the tongue would absorb the fatal dosage, bringing death in a matter of minutes.

Ross found Colfax's address in Who's Who, copied it on the outer envelope, affixed a stamp. Then he drove to a town thirty miles away from his own zip-code area and his gloved hand dropped death into the mailbox.

After that, all he had to do was wait.

Four days later he read the item in his morning paper.

> Mystery Death
>
> NEW YORK (UPI)—Authorities here are investigating possibilities of foul play in the sudden death of Florence Rimpau, 23, personal secretary of best-selling novelist Kevin Colfax. According to her employer, Miss Rimpau appeared to be in perfect health at the time of her collapse while working on correspondence. Paramedics were unable to revive her and an autopsy has been ordered after medical reports indicated poison as a possible cause.

Ross let the paper slip from trembling fingers, and several anxious days followed before a follow-up story appeared. Florence Rimpau was more than a secretary; she had ambitions of pursuing a writing career herself, and according to grieving family members, she was eagerly awaiting the publication of her first novel when death came.

There was more. Results of the autopsy confirmed the poison theory but investigation uncovered no clues. Kevin Colfax himself was quickly exonerated of any connection with the case. Apparently the source of the poison and the method used to employ it were not discovered by police or pathologists. Ross could congratulate himself; he'd never be caught. It was indeed a perfect crime.

The perfect crime—but the wrong victim.

Ross read and shuddered. He was responsible for the death of an innocent girl, blighting a bright future and bringing sorrow to her family and friends. Why hadn’t he anticipated such a possibility?

He knew the answer, of course. His eager act had been prompted by envy; it was jealousy, not justice, that motivated him to murder.

And to what end? His self-appointed enemy, Kevin Colfax, was still alive. If anything, the publicity surrounding the mysterious tragedy actually boosted the sales of his books.

The following months passed quickly, but to Ross each day seemed an eternity, and the nights were endless agonies of guilt-haunted dreams.

But time has a way of healing trauma and mending memories; as his next birthday neared, Ross realized that he had indeed survived another year.

Of course it really had nothing to do with his bargain, he told himself. That was only a dream. He would have lived on even without the nightmare about dealing with Death. And once the pangs of guilt lessened he found life sweet again. Just as he’d wished, there was time to read, relax and enjoy comforts and diversions.

And then time ran out.

Time ran out one night as Ross lay in bed, tossing and turning and cursing himself for a fool.

Diversion had been his downfall. Diversion, in the shapely form of one Janice Coy. Coy, he reflected bitterly, was hardly an appropriate surname for the young lady he’d casually picked up a month ago during an impromptu visit to a bar in a town nearby. At his age sex was hardly an imperative—at least he’d thought so until his encounter with Janice. He’d gone to the bar just for a drink, and it came as something of a surprise to find himself engaged in byplay with an attractive female. Byplay turned to foreplay, then fulfillment. When he discovered that his pleasure was Janice’s business, Ross merely shrugged and paid. Goodbye, Janice.

Two weeks later it was Hello, Doctor.

Herpes. That’s what the slut had given him. Dirty little tramp. Now he was suffering, but the sores would heal, there would be periods of remission. It could have been worse, he told himself; at least his condition wasn’t fatal.

Only the scythe was fatal. The scythe, swinging in a silver arc through the darkness of his dreams.

Death stood beside his bed.

The scythe swung idly, but he knew its purpose. Death held up the hourglass and Ross saw that the last grains of sand were dwindling down into the lower half. And now, as the sand descended, the scythe rose. Suddenly the darkened room was very cold.

Death grinned.

"No!" Ross shook his head. "Not now—give me another chance!"

Death's grin was fixed, but the scythe wavered.

"You wish to renew our bargain?"

The voice that was not a voice echoed in Ross's ears and he nodded quickly. "Please—"

The grinning jaws moved. "As I recall, you meant to kill someone who deserved to die. But it didn't turn out that way, did it?"

"That was an accident," Ross quavered. "I made a mistake."

"A mistake which you still regret." Death paused, and then the question came. "Are you willing to take such a risk again?"

"Trust me," Ross whispered.

"It's your conscience I don't trust," said Death. "Are you really sure you can go through with this?"

Ross stared at the emptying hourglass as the final grains fell. Then he stared at the scythe as it rose, stared at the bright broad blade. If that blade descended its brightness would blur, bathed with his blood.

"I'm certain!" Ross cried. "I promise you!"

"Agreed."

The scythe withdrew, the hourglass reversed and once again the filled half of the double globe was uppermost. It would take a year for the sands to run out—the sands of Time.

"Happy birthday." Death turned, still grinning.

And disappeared.

It proved to be a happy birthday for Ross after all, because this time he knew what he must do.

This time he already had decided who deserved to die—Janice, the whore who'd infected him, who was still spreading disease among the innocent victims of her corrupt charms.

Once again it was merely a matter of method.

Ross knew nothing of Janice aside from his brief encounter, but in order to be successful the hunter must first learn the nature of the beast. Only when familiar with its habits and habitat can he stalk his prey.

So Ross hunted Janice out, hunted her down.

Finding her at the bar again was no problem. To pretend to be pleased at his second meeting was more difficult, and carrying the encounter through to its lustful conclusion was almost impossible in view of what he knew. But Ross managed.

To Janice, in the weeks that followed, Ross was just one of her regular tricks—an elderly john who made few demands on her professional skills and could always be counted on for a fast buck. Wham-bam-thank-you-ma'am.

She never realized he was a hunter studying his intended quarry, seeking a method to bring it down.

Ross already knew he possessed the means to ensure a foolproof fatality; his poison would leave no clue.

But how to use it? Janice's fans—if they could be called such—didn't write letters. It wasn't her autograph they were after. The poor fools never realized she was leaving them with a signature of another sort, the kind she'd left him. The filthy disease-spreader deserved to die, and die she must.

The good hunter is patient, and Ross's patience paid off. By the time of their third assignation he'd become familiar enough with Janice's habits to find his solution.

It was in the bathroom that he discovered it—the liquid solution of the bath oil she used. And the little plastic container which held it was almost empty.

During the course of their fourth encounter he excused himself and checked again. There was, he noted, just about enough oil left for one more loll in the tub. She'd probably bathe after he left, and neither she nor anyone else would detect the tiny amount of odorless, colorless liquid he added to it from the vial he carried. With any luck, the poison wouldn't take effect for a few minutes; by then she would have left the tub and prepared for bed. Of course there was the problem of the bath-oil container, which she'd probably empty and toss into the trash, but chances were that no one would notice. In any case he must be prepared to take that risk—and he did.

Once again he suffered the torments of waiting, but Janice didn't suffer at all. The following week, when he went back to the bar, the bartender gave him the sad news.

Only yesterday Janice's body had been discovered, sprawled across the bed in her crummy little apartment up the street. There wasn't a mark on her, outside of a few telltale herpes blisters; apparently she'd had a heart attack and there was no talk of an autopsy.

That was the bad news, and Ross took it calmly enough. It was the sad news that really shook him.

Janice hadn't died alone. What nobody knew—and what Janice never mentioned—was that the second bedroom of the shabby apartment was occupied by her child. The six-month-old baby boy had lain untended during the days following her death, and succumbed to starvation.

Ross left the bar in a daze. He went home but found no peace there. Even though the bartender had been right and there was no investigation, even though the police never knocked on his door, Ross took no comfort in his safety.

His mission was successful, but it hadn't stopped there. He was no Avenging Angel—he was the killer of an innocent child.

Inner torment turned to outer agony. It wasn't a herpes flare-up, but psyche tormented soma. Ross couldn't work, couldn't read or relax. Worse still, he couldn't eat or sleep. When at last he summoned a doctor he was too weak to walk. He ended up in the hospital with an IV in his arm and twenty-four-hour nursing care. They force-fed him, pumped him full of medication, until eventually he came around.

But the doctor was profoundly and professionally puzzled. “Frankly, I don’t know what to tell you,” he admitted. “EKG, CAT scan, all those lab tests, and I still can’t come up with a damned thing. Except the herpes, of course, and that’s in remission. If I had to make a guess, I’d say the problem is geriatric.”

“Meaning what?” Ross said.

“You’re sixty-six, going on sixty-seven. According to actuarial tables you should be good for quite a while yet. Trouble is, the human body doesn’t always go by statistics. I’ve seen cases a damn sight younger than you get a clean bill of health, and two days after the examination—bingo.” The doctor tried to soften his statement with a smile. “I guess it all comes down to the old saying. When you gotta go, you gotta go.”

“But I don’t feel old,” Ross murmured. “Just weak—”

The doctor shrugged. “That will pass. Once you get your strength back, chances are you’ll be okay. Your vital signs check out. But from now on you’d better settle down and take things easy. I’m sending you home on a strict diet, no more alcohol, no smoking. Aside from that, the only thing I can tell you is to watch yourself.”

Ross watched himself when he got home but he didn’t like what he saw. Whether the result of his crime or the ravages of illness, the face staring back at him in the mirror was that of an old man.

When you gotta go, you gotta go.

If his appearance startled him, he was even more shocked by other physical changes. Although he gradually gained weight he still hadn’t the strength to cope with daily routine. Cooking and housekeeping chores drained him to a point where leisure pursuits became pointless. Running errands became a burden, going up the stairs was like climbing Mount Everest.

Ever rest? Not here, not any longer. When you gotta go—

Finally, he went.

Though his mind balked and his body rebelled, Ross forced himself to make the rounds of local facilities. Rest homes, retirement homes, convalescent homes—none were really homelike, and most were mere warehouses for weary wretches on their last legs, wheelchairs or deathbeds.

But Ross wasn't afraid of dying; even though he'd taken a life by mistake his debt to Death was paid up for months to come. And though his search was depressing, he continued until he found a place which seemed comparatively comfortable. It was by far the most expensive of the lot but he could afford the extra outlay, once his house was sold.

Putting it on the market and making the sale took longer than he'd expected, and so did the escrow period which followed. Even with the extra time, Ross had his hands full. Emptying them was the real problem; emptying them of all he'd accumulated over the years. The hardest part was saying farewell to his children, disposing of them to a book dealer who carried them off in cartons that looked like miniature coffins. Ross wondered what kind of a coffin Janice's child had been buried in, then thrust the thought away. Forget the past, let the dead bury the dead. His job was to run the ads, confer with buyers of secondhand furniture and appliances, strip the house until only a bare box remained for him to rattle around in while waiting for the end.

Not the end, Ross reminded himself. This is a new beginning.

The Sunset Crest Rest Home proved to be a better choice than he'd hoped. Located in the suburbs of a nearby city, the building was modern and well equipped. There was laundry and cleaning service, a bus line nearby for shopping excursions into town. Meals were decently prepared, with special diets for those in need of them. His room was large, with plenty of closet space, a private bath, a comfortable bed and a view overlooking the grounds. Best of all, there was Sheila.

Sheila was one of the three RNs living in their own quarters on the premises. Tall, slender, brown-haired and blue-eyed, she might be close to fifty but didn’t look her age. Since she was assigned to his floor Ross came to see quite a bit of her, and what he saw he liked.

To his surprise she had identified him as a writer, even claimed to have read some of his work. True or false, he was flattered by her recognition and pleased with her presence. Gradually Sheila’s professional reticence relaxed and he found out more about her. As a young woman she’d worked in a major hospital, then left it for an apparently happy marriage. Three years ago, after her husband died, she returned to nursing. She bore widowhood well, but as acquaintance ripened Sheila confided that she sometimes missed the daily domesticity and privacy of her own home. This Ross could easily understand, for he missed his home too.

The thing that bothered him the most was his daily contact with fellow residents at mealtime, in the recreation room, the corridors or the outer grounds.

Ross couldn’t make friends with his fellow residents. He didn’t like the way their minds dwelt on the past or how their bodies dealt with the present. He was irritated by the click of false teeth, the tremor and twitching of aging limbs, the continual counterpoint of coughing and throat-clearing. It disturbed him to see walkers and wheelchairs, depressed him when some familiar faces disappeared into darkened rooms equipped with oxygen tanks and hospital beds.

He did his best not to think about such things—cancer, strokes, heart attacks, Alzheimer’s disease. No matter what the mirror told him, Ross didn’t feel old. In fact, since getting to know Sheila, it seemed he was both looking and feeling younger. Hadn’t the doctor said that if he took care of himself he could live for many years?

There was a future ahead for him and he needn’t spend it here. Perhaps he couldn’t manage living in another house, but there were apartments in the area. And Sheila had said she missed having a place of her own. She could make a home for herself, a home for him.

He thought about it one night as he lay in bed and stared up at the ceiling in the dark. His life wasn’t over. After all, he was still in his sixties—come to think of it, he'd turn sixty-eight tomorrow—

"Will there be a tomorrow?"

The question came with chilling clarity. Only it wasn't his question, and the chill fastening him in freezing fingers was really present in the room. His eyes darted to the foot of the bed and the phosphorescent figure standing there.

Death grinned a greeting, raising the hourglass as the sand in the upper half emptied out.

But it was the scythe Ross watched—the scythe, swinging up in an inexorable arc, then swooping down swiftly, surely, bare blade moving to menace his bare throat.

"Stop!" he cried.

The scythe wavered.

"Another year?" Death whispered.

"Yes." Ross nodded eagerly. "Another year."

But the scythe did not withdraw; it remained poised, sharp and shimmering, ready to complete its relentless swing.

"You know the price," Death murmured.

"I'll pay it—you can be sure of that."

"Can I?" The scythe hung there, so close that even in shadow Ross could see the dark stains along its edges, the dried droplets encrusting the surface of the blade.

Death fixed him in an eyeless stare. "How do you know? Have you already selected your next victim?"

"Don't use that word! This time there'll be no mistake. No innocent will suffer."

Death shrugged. "But who is innocent? All must die, sooner or later." The scythe began to move forward again. "I can't trust you to be judge and jury any longer. There is only one law—a life for a life."

The blade swung down.

"Please!" Ross gasped. "You'll have your life. I swear it!"

The blade drew back. But Ross didn't stop trembling until Death's bony claw grasped the hourglass and turned it over again.

"Quickly," Death muttered. "It must be done quickly."

His voice was audible only to Ross's inner ear; outwardly it was as soundless as the shifting sands. And now voice and vision blurred, fading into the depths of sudden slumber.

That night Ross slept like the dead, but in the morning sunlight he was alive, basking in the bright promise of days to come. Death had vanished for another year, leaving only a faint, phantasmal echo of a parting word.

"Quickly."

But how could he obey? Ross pondered the problem as he shaved and dressed. Memories of his previous errors returned and stayed with him as he fled to the outer grounds. Sitting in the garden, he stared out at the street beyond, filled with a yearning to be a part of the life there once again.

A car sped by, its driver oblivious to his presence. Somehow cars always seemed to pick up speed when passing hospitals, sanatoriums or places like this. No one wanted to be reminded of what lay within. Life is for the living. Have a good day.

Ross's day didn't improve until he returned to his room that afternoon. To his surprise he found mail awaiting him—a single envelope, but an unusual one. Generally he received nothing but his monthly pension check and a few junk prize-contest items destined for the wastebasket. Ross was puzzled; outside of the mail-order advertisers, who cared about him?

Sheila.

Somehow she'd made it her business to learn his birthday, and sent him a card. Sheila cared.

Sunlight faded, but to Ross the world was bright again. Sheila cared, and he cared too.

That night when she looked in on him, he told her how he felt, what he hoped for the future.

“Our future,” he said. “Together.”

Ross awaited her reply, hoping for acceptance and steeling himself against rejection. But Sheila remained silent and there was no answer in her eyes.

“Don’t you understand?” he murmured. “I’m asking you to marry me.”

She sighed. “Of course. The Last-Nurse Syndrome.”

Ross stared at her and Sheila nodded. “That’s what the lawyers call it. An older man, bachelor or widower, falls ill, and a nurse attends him. When he recovers he proposes to her out of gratitude—”

“It’s not just gratitude.” Ross reached for her hand, capturing warmth and softness.

Warmth kindled into heat, softness firmed in response. Then she was in his arms and it was easy to speak, to pour out his plans.

Sheila listened, her smile broadening, eyes brightening. “Not so fast,” she said. “It sounds wonderful, really it does, but you’ve got to give me a chance to think. We can’t walk out of here tomorrow, you know. We must be practical—make sure there’s enough for us to live on—find an apartment, furnish it. There’s a million and one things to take care of. And I’d have to give notice.”

“Then do it!” Ross said. “Now. Quickly.”

When at last she left him his glow remained, dimmed only by a single shadow—or was it an echo again?

Quickly. Death’s word. It must be done quickly.

That night he forced himself to consider the meaning behind the phrase, to think about the unthinkable.

And for the first time since his arrival here he sought his suitcase in the closet. To all appearances it was unpacked and empty; only he knew about the little pouch concealed in a zippered pocket at its base. Inside the pouch was the tiny glass vial and in the vial was the final potion of poison. At least he’d thought of it as the final potion when he packed it—a potion reserved for himself in case life here became unbearable.

But life was unbearable no longer and he needn't be spending it here. Which meant that now the potion would be final for somebody else.

Ross stared at the colorless contents swirling silently. Then he put the vial away and the swirling ceased. Now it was only his thoughts that swirled; poisonous thoughts which could not be put away any longer.

Tossing and turning through the night, he pondered. It must be done quickly—but to whom?

He had no enemies here. And bitter experience had taught him revenge was a meaningless motive. Ross remembered his resolve—no innocent would suffer.

"But who is innocent?" Death's words again. "All must die, sooner or later. A life for a life."

Questions in the dark, awaiting an answer. Then, just before dawn, Ross heard his own voice whispering a name.

"Mrs. Endicott."

There was his answer. Mrs. Endicott, the oldest resident here at the home. Ninety-three years old, blind and bedridden; she never ventured from her room down the hall but everyone knew about her. Sheer longevity made her an institution in the institution. "Imagine that—been here over twenty years and she still hangs on. Got to hand it to the old girl, having such a will to live."

Ross grimaced at the thought. Didn't the fools realize the truth? Couldn't they at least imagine what it must be like to lay sightless and helpless year after year without hope? Nobody had a will to live under such conditions; it was just that the poor blind body refused to obey the will to die. "Got to hand it to the old girl," they said. Well, he would hand it to her—hand her the release she longed for. It wouldn't be murder. This was euthanasia, an act of mercy.

Ross rose on Saturday morning strangely refreshed despite his lack of sleep. Now he knew what to do; better still, he knew he wanted to do it. The rest was just a matter of ways and means.

This was Sheila's day off, which made things even easier. She stopped by his room before leaving and told him she was going into town to consult with some rental agencies. "Don't worry, I'm going to stick to it until I find the right place for us. In case I get back late, I'll see you first thing in the morning. Oh, darling, I'm so excited—"

Her smile and embrace told him even more than her words, and Ross rejoiced as she went on her way.

As for him, he went to work.

He asked questions; careful, casual, unobtrusive questions. Mrs. Endicott's room was 409, halfway down the corridor to the left on this floor. Meals were brought to her at regular serving times; staff members looked in at intervals during the day. At nine the lights went off—not that it made any difference, the poor old lady. Bed checks came at three-hour intervals during the night, routine inspections by whoever was on floor duty at the opposite end of the hall. Tonight the orderly in charge was Bill Hawthorne, a nice enough young man but a bit on the lazy side. He tended to spend much of his time at the desk reading comic books between his appointed rounds. So much the better for all concerned, Ross thought. Be patient, Mrs. Endicott. Help is on the way.

It was he who had to be patient as the day dragged on. By evening he was really uptight. Sheila hadn't returned and the final hours seemed endless.

The first bed check came at midnight. When Hawthorne looked in on him Ross was under the covers, apparently fast asleep. But moments later, after Hawthorne closed the door, Ross rose and groped his way through darkness to the closet. Once he procured the vial he carried it back to bed and waited. In half an hour Bill Hawthorne would be back at his desk in the alcove at the far end of the hall. From there the orderly had no view of the corridor itself and only sounds would summon him forth to investigate their source.

But there would be no sounds.

Ross’s door swung open silently at twelve-thirty. Ross’s footsteps were noiseless as he started off slowly to the left. Hawthorne couldn’t hear the pounding of his heart.

Quietly he made his way to room 409. Quietly he opened the door. Quietly he entered, closed the door behind him, then tiptoed to the bed.

At first he saw only a blurred outline of the form nestled beneath the blankets. Gradually his eyes grew accustomed to the deep darkness. The room was cold, smelling faintly of disinfectant mingled with a sour scent, the odor of age. It emanated from the halfopen mouth of the old woman as Ross gazed down at the wrinkled ruin of her face, the white wisps of hair which framed it. She wasn’t sleeping, for the blind eyes were open in a sightless stare.

In a way the milky whiteness of the cataracts covering her pupils confirmed his conclusions; surely here was someone who would welcome the promise of relief, even though she’d never know how it came. Ross knew what to do now.

He would identify himself as Dr. Morgan, the new resident physician, come to bring her a sedative. All he need do was to pour the contents of the vial into the half-filled water glass on the nightstand and help guide it to her shriveled lips.

Softly, he spoke. “Mrs. Endicott?”

No response. Hearing isn’t keen at ninety-three, Ross reminded himself, and he bent closer. “Mrs. Endicott—”

Still no answer. Gently he reached down and placed his hand on the bony brow. The cold brow—the icy brow that turned at his touch as the face pivoted on the pillow and the mouth yawned wide. No breath issued from it, only a telltale stench, and then he knew.

Mrs. Endicott was dead.

Somehow he managed to turn, leave, retrace his way along the corridor to the safety of his room. But there control ceased and he sank down upon the bed, still holding the useless vial he'd carried on a useless mission. Ross lay shuddering in silence as the vial slipped from trembling fingers and he closed his eyes in despair.

When he opened them again he had a visitor.

Despair gave way to horror, for this time Ross knew he wasn't dreaming. The fleshless figure beyond the end of his bed was quite real—either that or he'd gone mad. He shut his eyes once more, willing mind and vision to clear.

But when he blinked the figure was still there; it had moved closer, standing now at the side of his bed.

"You!" he whispered.

The skull bobbed slightly.

"What are you doing here?" Ross said.

"I had a call to pay down the hall."

Ross read mockery in the reply, read it in the ghastly grin. "You knew what I was going to do," he muttered. "You could have waited—"

"Her hour had come."

"You cheated me!"

"I do not cheat," Death said. "Remember, I warned you to act quickly. But what's done is done."

"Then why are you here?"

Death shrugged. "I think you already know the answer."

The skull was coming closer. Now Ross could see the greenish splotches of mold rotting in the yellowed cranial ridges. He could see the bloodstained edge of the scythe blade directly above him, see the hourglass clutched closely to the hollow rib cage, its upper half still packed with sand.

He shook his head. "It isn't time!"

"That's for me to decide," Death told him. "Your time is up."

"But we made a bargain—"

"A bargain you couldn't keep. I'll take no risk of further failure."

"I won't fail!" Ross's words came in a rush. "Give me a chance and I'll prove it. You make the choice—I don't care who's the victim as long as I stay alive."

"You really mean that?"

"I promise. Tell me who to kill, just give me the name."

"Very well." Death nodded. "The name is Sheila."

"Oh no!" Ross gasped. "Not Sheila—I can't—"

The grinning skull bent closer. "You see? Your promise is worthless." Death raised his scythe. "And so are you!"

Suddenly the blade came down, slashing at Ross's throat. Frantic with fear, Ross jerked his head aside as the scythe descended, ripping into the pillow only an inch away from his neck. Blind instinct sent his hands forward, grasping the bony wrist as Death tugged to free the blade. In desperation Ross tightened his hold, twisting with all his might until the wristbones crunched under the squeezing pressure.

Then Death's grip loosened and the scythe fell free. As it dropped, Ross released his hold and his fingers closed around the handle of the weapon.

Clutching it, he felt the sudden surge of strength coursing up his arm. The power was in the scythe, and he possessed it now. Death's soundless voice rose in a wail. "Give it back!"

Ross shook his head. "No. It's mine now."

"But you have no right—"

"This is my right." Ross waved the scythe.

The skeletal figure retreated and a wordless whisper came. "You fool—do you really think you can trick me so easily?"

"But I have tricked you!" Ross cried. Rising from the bed, he swirled the weapon and Death fell back.

Death's jaws opened and closed convulsively. "Give me my scythe!"

The power Ross held infused his arm and his voice. He lunged forward, shouting, "No—get out—"

The skeleton shape shrank to one side, hourglass clutched tightly to its bony breast. Once more Ross struck out, but the blade missed its mark.

For a moment there was silence; then the skull bobbed and its rotted teeth parted in a rustling reply. "I warn you. No one cheats Death."

Ross shook his head. “I am Death now!”

Ross raised the scythe, slashing at empty air, then blinked. The figure was gone.

He blinked again, eyes widening. Or was he merely opening them for the first time? Had he been talking and walking in his sleep again, was it another dream?

Then he glanced down at what he held in his hand. Death had disappeared but the scythe remained, and it was real. Death’s weapon was here, its power pulsing from the bloodstained blade. His power, now.

As he stared at it, elation gave way to apprehension. Ross didn’t want such power. All he’d meant to do was save himself, but he could never play the role of the Reaper, never wield the scythe. His power was useless.

Or was it?

As long as he possessed the weapon Death couldn’t strike down his victims; he was vanquished. For an instant Ross warmed to the thought, but then warmth gave way to a wave of cold fear.

He stared at the blade again as the questions came. Suppose Death returned to claim the scythe while Ross slept. He couldn’t stay awake forever, couldn’t guard it night and day from now on. And what would happen if others saw the weapon; how could he explain its presence?

There was only one answer. He had to hide it. Hide it from others, hide it from Death.

Ross glanced at the bedside clock. Ten after two. In less than an hour the orderly would be making his rounds again. Whatever must be done had to be done quickly.

Gripping the handle of the scythe, he moved to the door, opened it, peered down the deserted hall. The orderly would be at his desk in the alcove at the far right and there was no way of passing him unnoticed. But to the left the hall ended in a back stairway.

It was to that stairway Ross tiptoed now, then descended silently to the first floor and the rear door leading to the grounds outside.

At the far end of the grounds was the garden, and in the garden roses bloomed, petals closed in protection against the night.

Ross inhaled their scent in darkness as he neared, knelt, then scraped away moist earth with the blade of the scythe. He dug deeply until the opening yawned clear. Taking a deep breath, he smashed the handle of the weapon down across his bended knee. The worn wood splintered and broke under the impact. His groping fingers found a rock. Raising it, he hammered at the scythe blade, hammered again and again until the metal twisted and bent, then sheared into shards. Gathering up the fragments, he thrust them into the depths of the hole. Covering it with loose dirt, he patted the soil flat so that no disturbance was detectable.

Panting, Ross rose to his feet. It was finished now. Not even Death would know where his weapon had been buried. And even if he found the hiding place it didn’t matter, for the scythe was destroyed.

As he walked back across the garden, relief returned. Mounting the stairs, gliding silently down the hall to his room, Ross felt the possession of a power even greater than that of the scythe he’d stolen. No one could stop him now. Tomorrow, when he saw Sheila, they’d carry out their plans, find their future.

Tired but triumphant, Ross sank back across his bed. He stared into the darkness but he no longer feared it. No need to fear, for the Grim Reaper was no longer grim. The King of Terrors had been toppled from his throne.

Ross realized he’d erred in imagining Death as a child—perhaps the real truth was that Death was old. Wrenching away his scythe had been unexpectedly easy, for the old lack strength to resist. Hiding the weapon had been easy too, for wits are dimmed with age.

“No one cheats Death.” Ross smiled at the memory of the threat, for it was feeble too. The passage of countless centuries had taken its toll; Death’s only remaining power lay in his scythe, and now that power was broken and buried.

There was still another possibility which Ross, thinking clearly now, did not totally discount. Perhaps his vision of Death had been a dream after all;

a recurrent dream born of vivid imagination. Maybe everything was part of nocturnal illusion; even his trip to the garden could be the product of a somnambulistic fugue in which he broke and buried something which didn't exist. But whatever the truth, he was free of it forever. Whether in nightmare or reality, the scythe would never strike him down, and he was safe at last.

Still smiling, Ross drifted into sleep.

It was sometime later that the orderly made his rounds and entered the room. He was smiling too, but not for long. What he saw there sent him stumbling out into the hall, summoning others with his screams. Others came to stare and search, but discovered no evidence of forced entry or any intruder.

What they did find, and could never explain, were the broken fragments of an empty hourglass on the floor at the bedside. And Ross, lying dead in the bed above, with his mouth wide open—and the sand stuffed down his throat.

The Chaney Legacy

Dale was a real fan,
so when he got the chance to move into the star's old bungalow
he couldn't resist it.

Nobody thought Dale was crazy until the trouble started.

True, he'd been a film buff ever since he was a kid, the way other youngsters sometimes get hung-up on baseball, football, or even chess. If they follow their hobby into adult life such interests can become an obsession, yet no one thinks it's a sign of insanity.

In Dale's case his studies led him into teaching a course on film history at the university, which seemed sensible enough. Certainly he appeared to be normal; he wasn't one of those wimpy professors seen in comedy films aimed at the junk-food generation.

Actually Dale was rather attractive. Debbie Curzon thought so. She was a newscaster on local radio where she met and interviewed many of the stud celebrities in sports or films; Dale must have had some charisma for her to choose him as a lover.

The two of them might have ended up together on a permanent basis if Dale hadn't leased the Chaney house.

That's what the realtor called it—"the Chaney house"—although Dale couldn't verify the claim and the ancient escrow was clouded. The place was really just a small cottage halfway up Nichols Canyon in the Hollywood hills. Huddled amidst a tangle of trees and underbrush on a dirt side-road which turned to quicksand during the rainy season, the weatherbeaten frame dwelling offered no exterior charm or interior comfort. Debbie's reluctance to share it was understandable, but once he found it Dale couldn't wait to move in.

"All right, do as you please," Debbie told him. "If that dump is more important to you than sharing a brand-new condo with me—"

"It's not just a dump," Dale protested. "This is the Chaney house. Can't you understand?"

"Frankly, no. What makes you want to hole up in a place like this just because some dumb actor may or may not have hung out here sixty years ago?"

"Lon Chaney wasn't dumb," Dale said. "He happens to be one of the finest performers in silent films, perhaps the greatest of them all."

"Who cares?" Debbie's voice honed to a cutting-edge. "I just hope your wonderful Mr. Chaney knows how to cook and is good in bed, because from now on you'll be living with him, not me."

It was open warfare, but Dale found no weapon to pierce the armor of feminine logic. In the end Debbie told him to bug off, and he had no choice but to obey the entomological injunction.

A week later Dale moved into the Chaney house and by then everybody thought he'd flipped out. Turning down a renewal of his teaching contract now at the end of the fall semester meant losing his chance at tenure, and that certainly was a crazy decision, because he gave no reason for leaving.

But Dale knew exactly what he was going to do. He would vindicate himself in the eyes of Debbie and the academic world by writing a Hollywood history of his own—a definitive work which would answer the questions which lurked behind the legends. Who killed William Desmond Taylor, and why? Did Thomas Ince meet his death because of illness or was it murder? What really kept Garbo from returning to the screen? Had there been cover-ups in the cases of Thelma Todd or Marilyn Monroe? So much had been surmised, so little verified. And for a starter, he meant to solve the Chaney mystery.

Of all the stars of silent films, Lon Chaney was by far the most mysterious. There were books on his films but no full-length biographies except for a reporter's inaccurate magazine series following Chaney's untimely death from cancer in 1930. Chaney's first wife died without breaking silence and his second left no memoir. His son Creighton, who later changed his name to Lon Chaney Jr., was estranged from his father for many years and avoided painful memories. To this day Chaney's private life remains an enigma. "Between pictures," he told reporters, "there is no Lon Chaney."

The coincidence of moving into one of the actor's former residences challenged Dale. Come what may, he meant to learn Lon Chaney's secret.

But first there were more practical questions to deal with. Once furniture arrived and utilities installed, he had to renovate his surroundings. The cottage had been unoccupied for many years—no wonder the realtor offered him such a bargain rental—and it was time for a thorough housecleaning.

So Dale called an agency and secured the services of an Hispanic lady named Juanita. She was short, plump, but surprisingly strong; perched on a rickety ladder she scrubbed away at the ceiling and side-walls, then descended to attack the floors with mop and brush. And on the second day she made her discovery.

Finishing up her work, she cleared out old boxes and empty cartons from the bedroom closet. The last carton, wedged in back under a jumble of debris, was not entirely empty.

"Look what I find," Juanita said, holding up her trophy for Dale's inspection.

He took the tin box from her, hefting it with both hands. Then he lifted the lid and his eyes widened.

"What is it?" Juanita asked.

The box was empty but its interior was divided into a number of small compartments lined with smudged cloth. And the underside of the lid was covered by a mirror.

“Some kind of a kit,” Dale said.

It was hard to keep his voice from quavering, hard to conceal rising excitement as he paid and dismissed Juanita. When she left Dale picked up the box again and now his hands were trembling. His hands, holding Lon Chaney’s makeup kit.

Dale had seen publicity stills of Chaney displaying a different and much larger kit with side trays, so this obviously wasn’t the only one. What made it unique was that this box was here, in Chaney’s secret hideaway.

Or was it?

Dale forced himself to face facts. In spite of the realtor’s claim, he couldn’t be certain that Lon Chaney ever lived here. For all he knew, the kit might have belonged to any one of a thousand actors residing in these hills when Hollywood was young.

What Dale needed was proof. And staring at the bottom of the box, he found it.

Wedged against the base was a coil of paper, a small square scrap which must have peeled off after being pasted below the mirror. Dale picked it up, smoothed it out, then read aloud the lettering typed across its surface.

“Property of Leonidas Chaney.”

Leonidas!

This was proof and no mistake. While the general public knew the actor as Lon and most filmographies listed his first name as Alonzo, Dale was one of the few aware that the star’s birth certificate identified him as Leonidas.

Chaney, born on April Fool’s Day, had fooled his public. And considering his passion for privacy it seemed odd he’d put his real name here. But perhaps he’d fixed on this deception later in his career. Dale’s inspection told him this battered box was old, perhaps dating back to pre-Hollywood days when Chaney was a struggling actor in traveling shows. Could this actually be his very first makeup kit?

One thing seemed certain—Chaney had lived here. But when?

Dale pondered the question as he sat in gathering darkness alone, with the makeup kit on the table before him.

From what little he knew, Chaney's homes were modest by Hollywood standards, even after he attained stardom, but he would never have settled his family here. Which left only one other plausible answer.

Suppose this place was really a hideaway, a place his family didn't know about, a place he came to secretly and alone? According to publicity he did have a cabin up in the mountains where he went fishing between films. Could it be that he actually spent some of that time here, perhaps even without his wife's knowledge?

And if so, why? Dale quickly dismissed the notion of a secret love-life; Chaney was never a womanizer, and even had he been, this was hardly the setting for a romantic rendezvous. Nor was he a closet alcoholic or drug-addict. In any case there'd be no reason for him to keep a makeup kit hidden here.

Dale leaned forward, peering at the box through the twilight shadows which fell across its murky mirror.

But the mirror wasn't murky now. As he stared, something in the mirror stared back.

For a moment Dale thought it was his own face, distorted by a flash of fading sunlight amidst the coming of the dark. Even so, he realized that what he saw was not a reflection. There was another face, a face in the mirror, a ghastly white face with painted features that glowed and grinned.

With a shock he realized what it was—the face of a clown. And before Dale's widened eyes the face was melting, changing, so that now a second clown loomed leering out a him—cheeks spotted with paint and tufts of hair suddenly sprouting above a bony brow.

Dale turned, seeking a glimpse of someone else, some intruder who must have stolen silently into the bedroom to stare over his shoulder.

But save for himself the room was empty. And when his eyes sought the mirror again the face—or faces—had vanished. All he saw now was his own face reflected in the glass, its features fading in the dark.

Dale rose, stumbling across the room to switch on the overhead light. In its welcome glare he saw the makeup box and the perfectly ordinary mirror mounted within.

The clown-images were gone. They had existed only in his imagination—or was it his memory? For there had been two clowns in Chaney's life.

Hastily Dale sought his bookshelves, fumbling and finding the volume containing Lon Chaney's filmography. He riffled through it until a page fell open upon a photograph of the actor in the title role of He Who Gets Slapped. And now it was Dale who felt the slap of recognition. The picture showed the face of the first clown he'd seen in the mirror.

Turning pages, he located the still photo of another clown with daubed cheeks and patches of hair clumped on the bone-white skull. Chaney again, in Laugh, Clown, Laugh.

But there was no mirth in the painted face, and none in Dale's as he banged the book shut and left the room. Left the room, left the cottage, left the canyon to drive down to the shelter and sanity of lighted streets below.

He parked on Fairfax and entered a restaurant, taking comfort in its crowded quarters and the presence of a friendly waitress who urged him to try tonight's special. But when his order came he had no appetite for it.

Tonight had already been too special for him, and he couldn't forget his confrontation at the cottage. Had he really glimpsed those faces in the mirror, or had the images been evoked from memories of the films seen in retrospective showings long ago? A mirror is just a sheet of silvered glass, and what it reflected must have come from his mind's eye.

Dale forced himself to eat and gradually the tension ebbed. By the time he finished and drove back up the canyon his composure had returned.

Inside the cottage the lights still blazed upon commonplace surroundings, safeguarding against shadows and dispelling doubts. If Chaney had lived here at all, that time was long-gone and the actor himself was long-dead. There were no ghosts, and the box on the bedroom table was merely an old makeup kit, not a miniature haunted house.

For a moment Dale had an impulse to lift the lid and examine the mirror for added reassurance, but he dismissed it. There was no point in dignifying his apprehensions; what he needed was a good night's sleep and a clear head for tomorrow.

Truth to tell, he felt drained after the emotional stress of the day, and once he undressed and sought his bed Dale quickly fell into dreamless slumber.

Just when the change occurred he did not know, but there was a change, and the dream came.

In the dream he found himself awakened, sitting up in bed and staring through darkness at the black blur of the box on the table. And now the impulse he'd rejected upon entering the bedroom returned with an urgency he could not deny.

Sometimes dreams seem oddly like films—movies of the mind in which one's own movements are silently commanded by an unseen director—a series of jump-cuts and sudden shifts in which one is both actor and audience.

Thus it was that Dale both felt and saw himself rise from the bed, captured in a full shot as he moved across the room. Now a cut to another angle, showing him poised above the makeup kit. Then came a close shot of his hand moving down to raise the lid.

Moonlight from the window sent a silvery shaft to strike the surface of the makeup mirror, flooding it with a blinding brightness that seethed and stirred.

Faces formed in the glass—contorted countenances which seemed frighteningly familiar, even in the depths of dream. Faces changed, and yet there was a lurking linkage between them, for all were oriental.

Some Dale had seen before only in photographs—the evil Chinaman from the lost film, Bits of Life, the benevolent laundryman in Shadows. Then, in rapid shifts, the vengeful mandarin of Mr. Wu, the bespectacled elderly image of Wu's father, and a final, frightening glimpse of the chinless, sunken-cheeked, shrivelled face of the aged grandfather. They formed and faded, smiling their secret smiles.

Now others appeared—the two pirates, Pew and Merry, from Treasure Island, a bearded Fagin out of Oliver Twist, followed by figures looming full-length in the mirror's depths. Here were the fake cripples of The Miracle Man, The Blackbird, Flesh and Blood. Then the real cripple of The Shock and the legless Blizzard in The Penalty. Now came a derby-hatted gangster, a French-Canadian trapper, a tough sergeant of Marines, a scarred animal-trapper, an elderly railroad engineer, and Echo, the ventriloquist of The Unholy Three.

In his dream Dale stood frozen before the glass as faces flashed forth in faster flickerings—the faces of madmen. Here was a crazed wax-museum attendant, a bearded victim of senile delusions, a deranged Russian peasant, the insane scientists of A Blind Bargain and The Monster. They were laughing at him, grinning in glee as Dale closed his eyes, hands clawing out to close the lid of the makeup kit.

Then he staggered back to the bed. There were no images here, only the darkness, and Dale fell into it, fleeing the faces and seeking surcease in sleep.

It was morning when Dale's eyes blinked open, welcoming the sanity of sunlight. He stirred, conscious now that last night had been a dream, knowing he'd seen nothing in the mirror; indeed, he had never even left his bed.

As he rose he glanced over at the box resting on the table, remembering how he'd closed it in reality before retiring, then closed it again in his nightmare.

But now the lid was up.

For a moment Dale recoiled, fighting the irrational explanation until sunlight and common sense prevailed.

The makeup kit was old, its hinges worn or even sprung. Sometime during the night the catch must have loosened and the lid popped up.

It was a logical answer, but even so he had to force himself toward the table, steel himself to gaze down into the mirror set inside the lid and gaze on what was reflected there.

Sunshine formed a halo around the image in its glassy surface—the image of his own face.

And as his features formed a smile of rueful relief, Dale turned away. The mirror in the makeup kit held no terrors for him now, any more than the one he faced as he shaved. He dressed and sought the makeshift kitchen, taking comfort in the familiar ritual of preparing his breakfast, then eating eggs and toast with a copy of the morning Times propped up before his coffee cup. Even the news offered an odd comfort of its own—the familiar headlines and stories of wars, terrorist bombings, political corruption, street crime, drug-busts, accidents, epidemics, natural and unnatural disasters that filled the newspaper pages. However grim, these were realities; realities which he and everyone else in the world faced with fortitude born of long familiarity. They had nothing to do with the unhealthy fantasies which took form when Lon Chaney stalked the screen—fantasies which existed now only in Dale's imagination.

Glancing at his watch, he folded the paper and rose quickly. There was a busy day ahead, and time was already running short.

Leaving the cottage, he drove down to Hollywood Boulevard, turned right, then made a left on Fairfax. He reached Wilshire and headed west, weaving through noonday traffic until he found a parking space before the imposing structure of the Motion Picture Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Here, upstairs in the Margaret Herrick Library, he turned his attention to the files he requested. Lon Chaney wasn't the only movie monster he meant to deal with in his projected history; there was research to be done on other stars of the horror film. And unlike the case with Chaney, there was ample material on men like Karloff, Lorre, and Lugosi.

But even as he scribbled notes Dale found something lacking in the interviews and biographical data of these celebrated actors who seemingly made no mystery of their careers.

The one missing element common to all was that of explanation. Why had a gentle gentleman like Boris ended up playing monsters? What led Peter Lorre, the rabbi's grandson, to the portrayal of psychopaths? How did Bela Lugosi, who played parts ranging from Romeo to Jesus Christ in early European appearances, transform himself into Dracula?

William Henry Pratt, Laszlo Loewenstein, Bela Blasko—all three men had changed their names, but what had changed their natures?

Dale found no answer in the files, but the last item he read before leaving the Academy offered a hint. It was an interview with an actress who toured with Lugosi in Dracula.

She told of how the genial cigar-smoking Hungarian prepared for his famous role, sitting before his dressing-room mirror and donning the costume and makeup of the vampire. But that was only a preliminary to performing. The next and most crucial step came as he rose, wrapped in the black cape, face contorted and eyes blazing. As he confronted himself in the mirror his deep voice invoked an incantation. "I am Dracula," he intoned. "I am Dracula. I am Dracula." Over and over again he repeated the words, and by the time he strode out upon the stage the words became reality. Lugosi was Dracula.

"He psyched himself up," the actress explained. And as the years passed, a part of him became the part he played; when he died he was buried in Dracula's cape, with Dracula's ring on his finger.

Dale jotted down his notes, then hurried out into the afternoon sunshine. Now it was time to drive into Beverly Hills for a medical appointment.

It had been made a month ago, just an annual checkup, as a matter of routine. But now, as he arrived and took a seat in the crowded waiting room, Dale felt uptight. He felt no worry about possible physical illness, but what about psychological stress? Last night's dreams might be a symptom of mental disturbance. What if Dr. Pendleton told him he was cracking up?

By the time the receptionist called his name and a nurse led him to the examining room he knew his pulse was pounding and his blood-pressure had risen. So it came as a pleasant surprise when the doctor made no comment on his readings other than remarking he thought Dale was underweight and seemed overtired. Reports on blood-tests and urine-specimen would be available in a few days, but nothing indicated cause for concern.

“Slow down a little,” Dr. Pendleton said. “Pace yourself. And it won’t hurt if you put on a few pounds.”

Armed with that advice Dale left. Relieved, he headed for a seafood restaurant on Brighton Way and there he ordered and actually enjoyed his meal. The doctor was probably right, Dale decided; he had been working too hard, and the tension flaring up after his break with Debbie took an added toll. He resolved to follow orders, rest, and relax. Then, perhaps, it might be possible to come to terms with himself, and with Debbie too. He really missed her, missed the hours they spent together, and the breach must be mended. All in good time.

As Dale left the restaurant he sensed a change in the air; the chill breeze hinted at rain and muted murmur of distant thunder confirmed its coming.

The first drops spattered the windshield as he turned onto the canyon side-road, and by the time he parked in the driveway a flicker of lightning heralded the downpour that followed. Dale hurried into the cottage beneath the wind-tossed trees. Once inside he flipped the light switches as he moved from room to room. It was only upon reaching the bedroom that he halted when its overhead light came on.

Standing in the doorway he stared at the open makeup box on the table, forehead furrowed in doubt.

Hadn’t he closed the lid before he left? Dale shrugged in uncertainty. Perhaps the loose catch was the culprit once again; he’d better examine it and put his mind to rest.

Rain drummed the rooftop in a faster tempo and lightning flashed outside the window as he crossed to the table. Then, as he reached it, a clap of thunder shook the walls and the lights went off, overhead and throughout the cottage.

Power-outages were not uncommon hereabouts during a storm and Dale wasn't alarmed; perhaps the lights would come back on in a moment. He waited, but the darkness persisted and prevailed. Perhaps he'd better look for his flashlight.

Then its illumination was unnecessary as the lightning bolt struck somewhere close outside the window, filling the bedroom with a greenish glare. As it did so Dale peered down at the mirror inside the lid of the makeup kit and froze.

The reflection peering up at him was not his own.

It was the face of Singapore Joe—the role Chaney played in The Road to Mandalay—the half-blind man whose left eye was covered with a ghastly white cast.

But the image seemed strangely blurred; Dale blinked to clear his vision as lightning faded and the room plunged into darkness again.

Dale's shudder wasn't prompted by the roar of thunder. It was what he'd seen that traumatized him. The Road to Mandalay was one of the lost films; he knew of no print in existence. But Singapore Joe existed, in the mirror, existed in an indelible image leering up at him through the dark.

And the dark must be dispelled. Dale turned and blundered his way into the hall. Reaching the kitchen he stooped and opened the cabinet beneath the sink. Lightning outside the kitchen window came to his aid and in its moment of livid life he found and grasped the flashlight. It was not just an ordinary cylinder-type but one which terminated in a square base, projecting a strong beam of almost lanternlike intensity.

Dale switched it on, and the ray guided him back to the bedroom. As he walked his relief faded with the realization that his vision had faded too.

He was seeing only with his right eye now. The left was blind. Blind—like the eye of Singapore Joe.

You're having a nightmare, he told himself. But he wasn't asleep, and if there was a nightmare it had to be in the mirror of the makeup kit. Unless, of course, he was hallucinating.

There was only one way to find out, and Dale knew what he must do. Rain swept across the rooftop above, doors creaked and groaned against the onslaught of the wind, lightning glimmered, thunder growled. Only the light he gripped in his hand was reassurance; a magic lantern to protect him on his way. Magic Lantern—that's what they called the movies in the old days. Was there such a thing as magic?

Forcing himself toward the bedroom table, he gazed down at the glass reflected in the lantern light.

Half blind, he stared, but what he saw with his right eye was just a mirror after all. A shining surface reflecting his own familiar face.

And now his left eye cleared and he could see again. Dale took a deep breath, then expelled it hastily—for now the mirror blurred and a piercing pain shot through his lower limbs, causing him to crouch. Something pressed heavily against his spine, bowing his back.

He was changing, and the image in the mirror was changing too. He saw the tousled hair, the gargoyle grimace, the twisted limbs, the body bent beneath the hideous hump. No need to ask the identity of this image—he was gazing at Quasimodo—the Hunchback of Notre Dame.

It was Chaney he saw in the glass but he himself felt the weight of the hump, the constriction of the harness binding it to his body, the pain inflicted by the mass of makeup covering his face, the jagged teeth wired into his mouth, the mortician's wax masking his right eye.

Realization brought relief. It was makeup, and only makeup after all. Gradually the image diffused and Dale's feeling of physical restraint faded until once again he stood erect.

Thunder rolled as the image dispelled. Dale sighed with relief; now was the time to slam down the lid of the kit once and for all.

He started to reach for it, but his hands were gone.

His hands—and his arms.

Illusion, of course, like the illusion of Chaney's face and form coming into focus beneath the mirror's shiny surface. Dale's eyes met those of the visage peering out at him from under the broad brim of a Spanish sombrero.

Chaney was armless, and now Dale felt the agony of numbed circulation, the constriction of his own arms bound against his body by a tight, concealing corset. That, he remembered, had been Chaney's device when portraying the armless knife-thrower in The Unknown.

With the recollection his panic ebbed, and once more features and form receded into the mirror's depths. The numbness was gone from his arms now; he could lift his hands and close the lid.

Then he fell.

His legs gave way and he slumped to the floor, sprawling helplessly, the box on the table beyond his reach. All he could do was elevate his gaze, see the shaven-headed creature crawling across the glass, dead legs dragging behind him.

It was Phroso, the paralyzed cripple in West of Zanzibar.

No makeup had been involved in the simulation of the man who had lost the use of his lower limbs; it had been Chaney's artistry which made the role seem reality.

Knowing that, Dale strove to rise, but there was no feeling in his legs—he couldn't command them. The face in the mirror glowered at him in the lamplight, bursting into brightness as lightning flashed outside the window. The eyes were mocking him, mocking his plight, and now Dale realized that the mirror's monsters sensed his purpose and were summoned to prevent it. Their appearance in the mirror gave them life, his awareness gave them strength to survive, and that strength was growing. Closing the kit would condemn them to darkness and it was this they fought against. They knew he couldn't close the lid, not if he were blind, armless, or paralyzed.

Frantically Dale balanced himself on the palm of his left hand, extending his right arm upward, inching to the table-top. Then his fingers gripped the lid of the makeup kit, wrenching it down. With a rasp of rusty hinges the box slammed shut.

The mirror disappeared from view, but Dale's paralysis persisted. Try as he would, he couldn't raise himself. All he could do was wriggle, wriggle across the floor like a snake with a broken back, and lever his arms against the side of the bed. Pulling his body upward, he lifted himself, gasping with effort, then collapsed upon the cool sheets which dampened with the sweat of fear pouring from his fevered forehead.

Fever. That was the answer; it had to be. The doctor was wrong in his diagnosis. Dale was coming down with something, something that twisted mind and body. Labeling it psychosomatic brought no relief.

Dale rolled over to face the telephone resting on the night-stand beside the bed. If he could reach it he could call the paramedics. But as his hand moved forward he felt a sudden tingling in his legs, then kicked out with both feet. The paralysis, real or imaginary, was gone.

No reason to summon paramedics now, but he still needed help. In the dim light cast by the flash-lantern standing on the table across the room he dialled Dr. Pendleton's number. The ringing on the line gave way to the mechanical message of an answering-service.

"Dr. Pendleton is not in. Please leave your name and number and he will get back to you—"

Dale cradled the receiver, frowning in frustration. Sure, the doctor would get back to him, perhaps in an hour, maybe two or three. And then what?

How could he explain all this? If he minimized his condition he'd get that take-two-aspirins-and-call-me-in-the-morning routine. And if he came on too strong the doctor would probably order up an ambulance on his own. Pendleton was a practitioner of modern medicine; he wouldn't come out in the storm to make a house-call merely to humor a hysterical patient with his presence.

But Dale had to have someone's presence here, someone to talk to, someone like—

"Debbie?"

He'd dialled her number automatically and now the very sound of her voice brought relief.

"Dale! I was hoping you'd call."

Then she did care. Thank God for that! He listened intently as the Warmth of her response gave way to concern.

“What’s wrong? Are you sick or something?”

“Something,” Dale said. “That is, I’m not sure. No, I can’t explain it on the phone. If you could just come over—”

“Tonight? In all this rain?”

“Debbie, please. I know it’s asking a lot, but I need you. I need you now—”

“And I need you.” Debbie sighed. “All right. Give me half an hour.”

The phone went dead, but as he replaced the receiver Dale came alive again. She was coming and he’d told the truth; he did need her, needed her desperately.

Listening, he realized the rain was slowing. It was a good sign. Perhaps by the time she arrived the storm would be over and they could talk without the punctuation of thunder. He’d tell her what had happened, make her understand.

But just what had happened—and why?

Dale rolled over on his back, staring at the shadows on the ceiling, facing up to the shadows surrounding the question in his own mind.

And the answer came.

He’d found it today at the Academy, found it when he read the actress’s description of Bela Lugosi preparing for his portrayal.

“He psyched himself up.” That was her explanation of how Lugosi became Dracula, and that was what Lon Chaney must have done.

No wonder he’d established a secret hideaway! Here, in this very room, he did more than experiment with physical disguise. Dale pictured him sitting alone on a night like this, creating contrivances to deform his body, refashioning his face, staring into the mirror at the creature reflected there. And then, the final transformation.

“Make up your mind.” A figure of speech, but Chaney had given it a literal application, one beyond the mere application of makeup from his kit. Seated here in the shadowed silence, this man of mystery—this son of deaf-mute parents whom he communicated with through the power of pantomime—confronted the reflections of monsters in the mirror and whispered the words. “I am the Frog. I am Blizzard. I am Dr. Ziska, Sergei, Alonzo the Armless, the Blackbird, Mr. Wu.” Each time a different incarnation, each time a new persona, each time a litany repeated hour after hour from midnight to dawn, willing himself into the role until the role became reality.

And psyching himself up, he’d psyched-up the mirror too. The intensity of total concentration had been captured in the glass forever, just as it was later captured on the blank surface of nitrate film used for silent pictures. The filmed images decayed in time but the makeup kit mirror preserved Chaney’s psychic power forever—a long-latent power revived by Dale’s own glimpses into the glass, a power that grew greater with each succeeding gaze.

Dale remembered the first apparitions—how fleetingly they appeared and how little effect they had beyond the initial shock of recognition. It was his repeated viewing which gave strength to the shifting shapes until they transformed his body into a semblance of what he saw.

But he wouldn’t repeat the mistake. From now on the makeup kit would remain closed and he’d never look into that mirror again.

The rain had ended now and so had his fear. Thunder and lightning gave way to a calm matching his own. Knowing the truth was enough; he wouldn’t repeat all this to Debbie or try to convince her. Instead he’d just tell how much he needed her, and that was true too.

But first he must dispose of the kit.

Dale shifted himself over to the side of the bed, sitting up and swinging his feet to the floor. The power-outage hadn’t ended; he’d shut the kit away in the closet, then take the flash-lantern with him and guide Debbie up the path when she arrived.

All was quiet as he crossed the room to the table where the lantern-light shone on the closed box beside it. That’s what the kit was, really; just a battered old box. Lon Chaney’s box—Pandora’s box, which opened for evils to emerge. But not to worry; the lid was down and it would stay down forever.

His hand went to the flash-lantern.

At least that was his intention, until he felt the chill of cold metal at his fingertips and found them fixed upon the lid of the makeup kit.

He tried to pull away but his hand remained fixed, fixed by a force commanding his movement and his mind, a power he could not control.

It was the power that raised the lid of the box, a power that seethed and surged, and in the uptilted mirror he saw its source.

Two eyes blazed from a face surmounted by a beaver hat and framed by matted hair; a face that grinned to display the cruel, serrated teeth. But it was from the cruel eyes that the power poured—the burning eyes of the vampire in London After Midnight. Dale knew the film, though he'd never seen a print; knew its original title was The Hypnotist. And it was a hypnotist who glared up at him, a hypnotist's power which had compelled him to open the box and stand transfixed now by the vision in the glass.

Then suddenly the face was fading and for a moment Dale felt a glimmer of hope. But as the face disappeared into the mirror's distorted depths, another face took form.

It was a face Dale knew only too well, one which had lain buried in his brain since childhood when he'd first seen it fill the screen from behind a ripped-away mask. The face of madness, the face of Death incarnate, the face of Chaney's supreme horror; the face of Erik in The Phantom of the Opera.

No wonder he'd blotted out all memory of the terror which tormented his nightmares as a child, the terror he'd hidden away in adulthood but which still survived in his unconscious. It was suppressed fear that lay behind his inexplicable interest in Lon Chaney, a fright disguised as fascination which guided him to this ultimate, inevitable confrontation with the gaping fangs, the flaring nostrils, the bulging eyes of a living skull.

The Phantom stared and Dale felt the flooding force of the death's-head's overwhelming power, to which he responded with a power of his own, born of utter dread.

For an instant, for an eternity, his gaze locked with that of the monster and he realized a final fear. The face was looming larger, moving forward—attempting to emerge from the mirror!

And then, with savage strength, Dale gripped the box in both hands, raising it high; panting, he dashed it down upon the floor. The makeup kit landed with a crash as the Phantom’s image shattered into shards of splintered glass glinting up in the lantern-light.

Chaney’s power was broken at last, and with it the power of the Phantom. Dale gasped, shuddering in relief as he felt full control return.

As the knocking sounded its summons he picked up the flash-lantern and carried it with him down the hall to the front door. Debbie was here now, his hope, his angel of salvation. And he went to her proudly and unafraid because he was free of Chaney, free of the mirror’s magic, free of the Phantom forever. This was the beginning of a new life, a life of love and beauty.

Dale opened the door and saw her standing there, smiling up at him. It was only when he lifted the lantern and Debbie saw his face that she began to scream.

Comeback

They say Southern California has no seasons, but don’t you believe it.

Hiking down Santa Monica Canyon, I felt autumn in the air. Twilight comes early in October evenings, and the wind off the ocean was clammy cold. As the fog rolled in I squinted through the haze on the hillside where silent houses huddled beneath towering trees, wrapped in a purplish pallor which only fall can bring.

“Looking for someone?”

I halted, blinking at the man who stepped forward from the shadows on the path ahead.

If the air held a hint of autumn, he was a figure out of winter; there was snow in his hair and ice in his eyes. But his frailty offered no threat and his face was creased in a lined and leathery smile.

“Just sight-seeing,” I said. “Wife and I moved in down the street the other day, so I’m exploring the neighborhood.”

“Waste of time.” He shook his head. “Nothing much to see and nobody worth looking at. Everything’s run-down here, myself included.” Chuckling, he held out his hand. “Ray Vance is the name. What’s yours?”

I told him, and our palms met. It was like shaking hands with a snowman.

“Cold hands, warm heart.” He grinned. “Get to be my age, your circulation slows down. I’m pushing eighty-seven this November.”

“You’ve got twenty years on me,” I said. “Just retired a couple of months ago.”

His grin turned wry. “I didn’t. They squeezed me out way back in forty-five. Been here ever since.” Vance nodded toward the trees. “Like to see my place?”

“I don’t want to intrude—”

“Nonsense. Glad to get a look at another human face. What I see in the mirror nowadays isn’t much of a consolation.”

Again the dry chuckle came as he turned, leading me up a side path to the weed-choked lawn beyond.

The house hidden on the hillside wasn’t as old as its owner, and far better preserved, but the pseudo-Spanish structure was an echo from the twenties. And when he opened the front door for me to enter, I walked into yesterday.

I didn’t get home until after dark. Peggy was waiting and worried.

“Where on earth have you been?” she said.

“Time-traveling.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

I told her about Ray Vance and his house. “You wouldn’t believe it—like something out of Sunset Boulevard, only this is for real. Vance was a movie publicity man back in the silent days, worked for all the big studios. After sound came in things started to get tough and finally he called it quits about forty years ago.”

“Forty years?” Peg shook her head. “And he’s been sitting up there all alone ever since?”

“Not exactly alone,” I said. “The place is full of memorabilia—posters, lobby cards, press books, inscribed photos of just about every old-time star you ever heard of. Nothing modern; instead of a TV set he’s still got one of those windup Victrolas. Did you know Rudolph Valentino did a song recording? Neither did I, until Vance played it for me. The whole house is like a museum; film buffs would go crazy over the stuff he has there. You’ve got to see it.”

Peg doesn’t share my enthusiasm for old movies, so it didn’t surprise me when she shrugged. “I can wait,” she said.

But she didn’t wait long. About a week later Ray Vance left a shakily scrawled note in our mailbox—an invitation to come for dinner on October 18.

Peggy frowned when she read it. “He’s got his nerve. Why, he doesn’t even know us!”

I nodded. “From what I gather he doesn’t know anybody anymore, and it must be pretty lonely for the old boy. Come on, Peg, be a sport; it won’t kill us to go. Besides, I’d like to find out more about the old days.”

In the end I persuaded her. And as I predicted, it didn’t kill us, though the meal was almost lethal—warmed-up TV dinners served in fancy plates that rested like tiny islands on the long table of his huge dining room. And afterward, when we moved into the den for coffee and drinks, I did find out quite a bit about the old days.

Sitting there on grotesquely overstuffed couches under the pink-bulbed light filtering through beaded lampshades, we were in the old days.

Framed three-sheets hung from the walls, featuring forgotten films and forgotten players—House Peters in Raffles the Amateur Cracksman, Alberta Vaughn in The Telephone Girl, and Raymond Griffith in Time to Love.

‘ “Knew ’em all,” Vance said. “I could tell you stories—”

And he did, while I listened eagerly, Peg sat patiently, and he kept refilling his glass from the bottle on the table.

He held it up to the light, sounding his raspy chuckle. “Old Taylor,” he said. “My drinking buddy. But I knew other Taylors back then. Ruth Taylor, before she got the lead in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. And the guy who got a writing credit on Shakespeare’s Taming of the Shrew—‘additional dialogue by Sam Taylor.’ Then there was William Desmond Taylor, the biggest of them all.”

“I’ve heard of him,” Peggy said. “He was that director who got murdered and nobody ever found out who did it.” Vance shook his head. “I know who killed him.”

"You do?"

The chuckle came. "Remember, I handled publicity in those days. Knowing the truth was part of my job. The other part was to keep it out of the papers." He poured himself a drink. "This business about mysterious deaths is all a crock. People like Tom Ince, Paul Bern, Thelma Todd—they were personal friends of mine. Don't think I didn't find out what really happened to them."

I leaned forward. "Then what are you waiting for? Write a book! If you've got the facts they're worth a bundle, and I don't have to tell you what the publicity would do. A thing like that could be a real comeback for you."

He shook his head again. "I told you they were my friends. They trusted me because I respected their privacy, never let them down. And I'm not about to start now."

"But it doesn't matter," Peggy said. "They're all dead."

"And I will be, soon enough." Vance downed his drink. "That still doesn't give me the right to take advantage of our friendship. You don't understand what Hollywood was like in the old days. More of a small town then, and we stuck together—stars, directors, writers, these people were like family. The only family I ever had." He reached for the bottle again, his voice slurring. "Now there's nothing left but this."

Peggy rose, glancing at her watch. "I think it's time to go," she said.

Vance protested, but I didn't say a word; once Peg makes up her mind, that's it.

We moved into the vestibule and there our host halted and reached for a black leather-bound volume resting on the end table. "Can't let you leave without signing the guest book," he said.

Turning the yellowed pages he reached for a pen. First I signed, then Peggy. As she did so, I noted her sudden but quickly suppressed surprise.

But it wasn't until we got home that I found out what had startled her.

"His guest book," she said. "Did you see the listings? The date on the last signature before we signed was 1959. Nobody's visited him for twenty-five years!”

As far as I know, nobody visited Vance in the days that followed. When I suggested looking in on him, Peggy put her foot down. “Forget it! That place of his gives me the creeps. And no, I don’t want him here, either. The way he keeps talking about dead people—it makes me feel as if I was in a graveyard.”

“Speaking of graveyards,” I said. “Do you know what tonight is?”

She nodded. “Halloween. All the goblins and ghosts will be out, but I’m ready for them.” Peg gestured toward a heap of candy bars on our hallway table.

“You’ve got enough there for an army,” I said. “I’ll bet Vance isn’t prepared for trick or treat. Why don’t I just take some of this junk over to him now?”

Peggy shrugged. “If you need an excuse to see him, suit yourself. Though why you’re so worried about that old lush is beyond me.”

I didn’t know the answer, but I felt my concern growing as I walked up the path in the gathering dusk and knocked on Vance’s front door.

For a moment I stood in silence, and my heart missed a beat. All I could think of was the possibility that his heart had missed a beat too. A man that old, feeble and alone, living in the past and dying in the present—

But the man who opened the door was very much alive. Preserved in alcohol, I gathered, catching a whiff of his breath as I explained my errand and handed him the bag of candy.

“Thanks for thinking of me,” he said. “Look, I’d ask you in, but I’ve got to get things ready for tonight.”

“Tonight?”

He nodded. “Had a little accident the other day. Nothing serious, but I got the message. Next month I’m moving into the Motion Picture Home.”

“Good idea.”

“It stinks.” His hoarse chuckle terminated abruptly in a coughing spell.

I stared at him as he clutched the doorframe. “Are you sure you’re all right?”

“No.” Then, surprisingly, he grinned. “That’s why I’m throwing a Halloween party. Invited all the old-timers I could think of for one last hurrah.”

“Look, if you need any help—”

“Much obliged, but I can manage. Thanks again for thinking of an old man.”

I thought of him a lot during the evening, after it got dark and the fog settled in. There weren’t as many trick-or-treaters as we’d expected, and no traffic on the street.

“If Vance is having a party,” Peg said, “how come we don’t see any cars?”

“Maybe everybody walked up.”

I said it, but I didn’t really believe it. And when Peggy opened the front door and peered up the street, I knew that she didn’t believe it either. “Just as I thought,” she told me. “No sound, no lights, and no party. You ask me, the old buzzard just flipped out.” Then she softened. “Do you think maybe you ought to take a look—?”

It was midnight when I hurried up the hill, moving through the mist toward the dark and silent house. There were no cars parked before it, no marks of tire treads in the driveway, and no response came when I knocked. I pushed the door open and entered the hall.

Vance was lying on his back in the shadows. He’d had another accident, and this time it was a big one. Dialing the paramedics, I knew there wasn’t a chance. The only thing that puzzled me was the smile on his face.

I told Peg what had happened after it was all over and I came home again. She listened, her eyes narrowing.

“What’s that you’ve got under your coat?”

I shrugged and pulled it out. “His guest book. Picked it up off the end table before the paramedics arrived.”

“You stole it?”

“It wasn’t really stealing. You know as well as I do, they’d only toss it away with all his other stuff. But this is priceless, just for its sentimental value. All those old-time movie names . . .”

I riffled it open to the page we’d signed, then stared. New entries had been added, and I scanned them quickly. The signatures were genuine; I know, because I checked them out against autographed photos later. I didn’t have to check the names.

Tom Mix. Alma Rubens. Rudolph Valentino. Thelma Todd. Jean Harlow. Paul Bern. Thomas A. Ince. William Desmond Taylor.

No wonder Vance died smiling; he’d had his Halloween party after all. For though each signature was different, the date which followed was always the same—

October 31—1987.

Die—Nasty

As every student knows, it was James David Autry who started it all.

Way back in March 1984, Mr. Autry, condemned to death by lethal injection, petitioned the Texas State Board of Corrections to allow his execution to be televised.

For some inexplicable reason his request was denied. And as a result it wasn't until 1989, after a five-year series of court battles, that the right to show executions on television was finally upheld. The ACLU proclaimed it a major victory for the freedom of the individual, but at first there was scant attention paid to this decision.

Meanwhile, of course, capital punishment was spreading. State laws against it were being repealed in the face of the increasing crime rate and the growing lack of prison facilities. Although billions had been spent to build new jails and penitentiaries, it was impossible to accommodate the great horde of murderers, forcible rapists of women and children, convicted politicians, and other major criminals.

Finally common sense prevailed, and death sentences were carried out on an ever widening scale. And in 1991 the first execution—that of Floyd Scrilch, convicted of aggravated mopery—was televised on a popular cable network. The success of the simple program, filmed by only two cameras set up outside the California gas chamber, caused wiser heads of commercial television to give the matter a second thought.

A month later a second execution was shown on the prestigious news program "30 Minutes"—formerly "60 Minutes," but renamed because of the number of commercials introduced. As expected there was a great deal of public reaction pro and con, but the winning argument proved to be the ratings. A full 55 percent share of the nation’s viewing audience watched the show.

The result was an undignified scramble on the part of network executives to secure exclusive TV rights for the carrying out of death penalties in various states. Naturally the largest crime centers—New York, Illinois, Texas, California, etc.—enjoyed the best offers. But even the smaller states such as Rhode Island and Delaware made lucrative deals with local stations.

Initially most of the programs featured gas chambers, hangings, and electrocutions. Through trial and error it was learned that gas chamber programs had little popular appeal; the proceedings were comparatively slow and lacked visual excitement.

Hangings were unpredictable as crowd pleasers; some were completed quickly while others lasted through several commercial breaks. The slower events naturally provided more drama and proved popular with bookmakers specializing in bets on just how long it would take for a given criminal to cease jerking and be pronounced legally dead.

Electrocutions were generally more successful as audience pleasers, combining our national interest in science and mechanical gadgets with the love of spectacle—such as the “special effects” of sparks curling the victim’s hair and smoke pouring out of his ears.

In the spirit of competition which made America great, state legislatures began competing for television revenues by introducing new methods of capital punishment or, more accurately, reviving old ones. Death by firing squad enjoyed a brief vogue, embodying as it did the use of colorful uniformed riflemen and the offer of a blindfold to the condemned. The once general offer of a last cigarette to the prisoner was, of course, omitted, since smoking is injurious to one’s health.

North and South Dakota, long ignored as lesser states, captured the public fancy by bringing back the guillotine. Its success prompted Alabama to go them one better in presenting a masked headsman with a quaint and picturesque ax.

Naturally the leading networks and stations entered into the spirit of these occasions. Taking their cue from the fact that beer commercials were especially popular on such programs, they introduced a whole new breed of commentators, many of them former sportscasters.

Soon the "instant replay" became a staple of execution televising. Showmanship came into play, featuring exclusive interviews with the condemned just before their sentences were filmed, then interviews with officials, executioners and clergymen, and, finally, dramatizations of the crimes for which the prisoner had paid his penalty.

Nor were youthful audiences neglected. Always important to sponsors and broadcasters alike, the young people who grew up on the "splatter films" of the past two decades constituted a huge market for this form of entertainment. Their once popular program favorite, "Saturday Night Live," enjoyed a new upsurge in ratings when it began to feature the Execution of the Week and changed its name to "Saturday Night Dead."

As the boom continued, prison officials eager for TV bids searched history for even more colorful and creative attractions. Pennsylvania reenacted the techniques used in the Indian Mutiny or Sepoy Rebellion of 1856: tying the condemned to the mouth of a cannon and "blowing him away." Multiple executions by this method were inaugurated, but ceased when local residents near the prison complained of noise.

Not to be outdone, Ohio introduced the custom of drawing and quartering, in which the prisoner's arms and legs are tied to four horses, which are then lashed to move in opposite directions, with spectacular results to the prisoner's person. This proved to be a bit of a problem, since the SPCA got into the act and promptly forbade the executioners to use a whip on the horses.

Burning at the stake was a favorite in Florida and flaying alive had its share of fans in Tennessee. Arizona gave an exotic oriental flavor to a two-hour special which featured the "Death of a Thousand Cuts."

Unfortunately, no one seems to have foreseen the inevitable result of these entertainments. But within just a few years, the number of rapes and murders suffered an alarming decline.

For a time the entire program concept, so popular with viewers and so lucrative to penologists, broadcasters, and sponsors alike, seemed fated—as they say in television circles—to “go down the tube.”

Fortunately the elected officials realized the danger, and, taking the welfare of the nation’s economy to heart, enacted legislation which labeled more crimes as capital offenses carrying the death penalty upon conviction. With the cooperation of farsighted judges who rejected appeals and did away with the old-fashioned system of public defenders, a fresh crop of prisoners soon blossomed on death row. In fact, so many were now available for public appearances that soon even the lowliest independent stations were carrying execution events weekly, then daily.

It is not definitely known to whom credit should go for the idea, but someone in Washington presently arranged to have local culprits thrown to the lions at the National Zoo. Shortly thereafter the Astrodome and various bowls and sports arenas picked up on the possibilities, and the following season saw both baseball and football give way to mass executions involving the talents of lions, tigers, leopards, bears, and other major carnivores, some of whom achieved individual celebrity for their gastronomic feats. Florence, a female polar bear borrowed for the occasion from the Seattle Zoo, won special distinction for devouring—at least in part—no fewer than six prisoners in the course of the annual Super Bowl.

Everyone seemed pleased with this development except the condemned felons. Exercising their God-given rights as citizens, they formed a union and appealed for redress. A compromise was reached, and as a result the animals were barred from program participation in favor of a new and even more amusing diversion: the gladiatorial combat.

At first large numbers of prisoners were employed, using every conceivable weapon except firearms, which were deemed dangerous to the attending officials and the television camera crews. As an additional objection, it was pointed out that filming such a crowd of combatants required a prohibitively expensive amount of equipment, and a great deal of the most impressive and bloodiest action was never recorded, due to the unpredictability of its occurrence.

Thus individual duels-to-the-death took precedence and proved much more satisfactory in the long run, particularly when embellished with attractive partisan girl cheerleaders urging on their personal "favorites." Many of the condemned entered into the spirit of the occasion, spending long hours of practice before their execution date in order to increase their skill with battle-axes, maces, spears, double-edged swords, and other useful utensils. Since they were allowed no armor for protection, they were naturally encouraged to master their talent for mayhem.

But it remained for science, ever the savior of society, to provide the final touch. In less than a year, leading television manufacturers benefitted both the national audience and the national economy by introducing a new TV set with a special attachment, directly aimed to provide viewer participation in the capital punishment process.

Now, when one condemned combatant downed or disabled his opponent, he paused for thirty seconds while the folks watching at home could press a simple button on their television control panels. Instantly, with the aid of a complex computer network, viewers all over the nation could register a "thumbs up" or a "thumbs down" verdict to decide the fate of the fallen gladiator. If spared, both he and his victorious foe still suffered death in accordance with the laws of the land, but were first given the special boon of an appearance on The Tonight Show.

The successful introduction of such customs in capital punishment had widespread repercussions in other areas of national life. Scholars, lawmakers, and laymen alike turned to a study of other constructive cultural phenomena in the past and found fresh wisdom in the ways and mores of bygone cultures.

The final and natural outcome of this preoccupation resulted in many social and legal changes. And as we are all aware, these changes came about rapidly.

It was in 1998 that we elected our first emperor.

No one can deny that his reign was eminently successful for well over three years, until this country fell to the barbarian invasion.

Now, of course, we are ruled by savages, and unhappy as it seems, it would appear that the good old days of public executions are gone forever.

Sic transit gloria . . .

The New Season

Harry Hoaker stood waiting in the wings as the lights dimmed.

Stereo sounded the familiar theme, a spot hit the announcer at stage left and framed his jolly jowly face in a golden halo. The announcer was fat, because fat men are funny.

"Hello, Harry," the announcer said, punching up the final syllables of each word so that the greeting came out as "Helloooo, Harreeee!" That was funny too.

Brasses blared, blending with applause. The spotlight swept to the right and Harry came on, moving to center stage as the applause rose to a roar.

That used to be the hard part for him, waiting out the surge of sound until it died away and left him standing there in the hushed, expectant silence. Now it was just routine, automatic, mechanical.

Harry blanked-out the thought, glancing forward as the arcs blazed up overhead, illuminating the set but blotting out his view of the audience.

"I know you're out there—I can hear you breathing." He remembered using the old line when the gags were bombing. And they bombed plenty, it was like an instant replay of Pearl Harbor, back in the early days.

But tonight was the start of a new season, and as Harry acknowledged the applause he did a little instant replay of his own. In the eyes of the audience he'd come center-stage in ten seconds, but Harry knew different—it had taken him twenty years to get there.

That's when the waiting was really rough, twenty years ago, standing there with the funny hat and the baggy trousers he wore for the kiddie show.

Clawing his way out of the Saturday morning ghetto took three years, and then all he got was an afternoon slot across the board on a game show. It was a grind, working with squealing housewives who wet their pants over hard questions like “Which ruler of England was known as the Virgin Queen? I’ll give you a hint—it wasn’t Elizabeth Taylor.” But Harry played it smart, bringing in a couple of writers on his own to get some decent material, and it paid off. When the net decided to put someone up against Johnny Carson on a late-night talk show, Harry’s agent pitched him for the host spot and he got the bid.

At first he’d been scared spitless, but the agent gave him the word. “Not to worry, kid, there’s enough insomniacs and night-people out there to fatten your ratings. All you got to do is stick to the system.”

His advice worked, and so did Harry, those first few years. He worked the writers, squeezing them dry after a season or two, then picking fresh replacements. They left him a legacy of skits and schticks that locked into a format. The viewers ate it up and he ate up his guests—chewed them up, spit them out. A whole staff of savvy programmers furnished him with current celebrities—everyone who had a new show on the network and everyone under contract who didn’t have a show but needed the exposure. The mix was sweetened by bankable stars plugging their forthcoming films, Top Ten singers pitching new recordings, old-timers pushing autobiographies, even a few real writers who came in handy as fillers when he needed somebody to bounce off a laugh. It was a system, that’s for sure, and it played.

Now the writing staff stood at seven and Harry didn’t even have to waste time with them on gag-sessions or even check a script—everything was up there on the crawl and all he had to do was read it off. If a joke died it could still be edited-out before the tape aired later that night.

Over the years he’d made it still easier on himself, cutting down from five shows a week to three, using “guest hosts” to fill in—people who were good, but not too good. It helped, and so did those long months of summer reruns every year. Sometimes he got static for his absences, critics said he was getting lazy and temperamental, but Harry didn't care as long as they never guessed the real reason.

They didn't know he was sick.

For a long while he didn't even know it himself, because the booze and the pills kept him going. Then, a couple of seasons back, he flunked his physical.

It wasn't AIDS, they told him, but it might be what they called a mutation of the virus. The bottom line was that the name didn't matter; he had it, and it had him.

They tried new pills and he kept going until the weight-loss. Then they put him on cobalt; his hair fell out but he wore a rug and nobody noticed. Finally the cobalt stopped working and he stopped working too, just before summer reruns began last year, and that gave him three months for the first bypass and recuperation.

Harry felt okay again by fall, but somewhere along the line—January, February, he wasn't sure exactly when—things came unglued and they were talking transplants. The rest of the season was just a blur, one week up, one week down, popping new pills, taking new tests, trying new treatments, living from showtime to showtime, hanging in there until the summer hiatus. Then they went to work. All the jazz he'd heard about but paid no attention to over the years—skin-grafts, amputations, prosthesis—became realities. But not too real, because they kept him under with shots and injections while they experimented with radical techniques. He couldn't remember everything they did, but now he was functioning again. A medical miracle, that's what the doctors called it, and on top of the bundle he laid out for their fees he had to fork over another bundle to keep their silence.

Harry faced silence now as the applause faded. He forced a grin and faced the crawl, going into his opening monologue without a hitch. He didn't get the point of some of the gags because they were topical and he'd been out of touch. But the crawl even cued him for pauses, and whenever he paused the laughs came.

A new season, but the same old system, plus more gimmicks—computer-selection of material to make sure it was trendy, in-depth demographic analysis to choose the right ticket-seekers for an audience. The production people knew what to do and how to do it, control the ratings, hook the viewers. It was a far cry from the days when Steve Allen pioneered talk shows on live camera with no chance to cover bloopers.

Harry squeezed off another gag, waited for his laugh, hit the topper, milked it with a double-take. Easy.

Only it wasn't easy. The crawl rolled, the laughs came, but something was wrong.

He squinted into the light that hid his audience and revealed him, wondering just how much they could see, how much they knew.

But how could they know anything? For years now his life-style protected privacy. He gave no interviews and didn't read the ones his publicists planted in print. The staff-meetings and business conferences were conducted on closed-circuit TV. There was no time to waste on friends or acquaintances, he didn't give or attend parties. Since the last divorce—Jesus, that was over six years ago—he hadn't had a woman, not even a call-girl, and he didn't want any. A limo drove him to the studio, then back to his automated house; help and security did their jobs without hitches. If liquor deadened his days and pills pacified his nights, nothing leaked to the press, so how could anyone know?

Trouble was it worked both ways. If people didn't know about him, he didn't know about people anymore. He'd lost personal contact and since the trouble started he'd been completely out of touch. Harry didn't even read the papers after he got sick—all this crap about new medical problems was a drag and he didn't want to hear scare-talk on the nightly news. The only thing he watched on television was old movies, and the stars who played in them were dead.

Dead stars—that was a laugh! The audience was laughing now but they didn't know Harry was practically a dead star himself, a brain in a mechanized body, a product of plastic and cosmetic surgery, of built-in artificial organs supported by electronic impulses and computer-circuitry.

They didn't know, and he'd keep it that way through this new season. Time to forget the past and pay attention to what he was doing. Right now the crawl cued him to bring out his first guest.

Harry read the intro and a jock came out, moving to him and shaking hands before they took their seats at stage-center. The jock was big, burly, bearded; Harry was surprised that his hand was so cold and his grip so feeble. Stage-fright, of course—funny how these steroid-stuffed apes went into flop-sweat in front of an audience.

But no sweat, all he had to do now was read the crawl. Harry fed him his first line, then waited for a response.

There wasn't any.

Harry repeated the line, making sure the jock heard him. Or did he? The nerd just sat there without a peep. What the hell—don't tell me he's illiterate?

Harry peered at him, whispering under his breath. "We're on, dummy! Answer me—say something, for Christ's sake—"

No reaction. The jock's face was blank, expressionless.

Harry's face was blank now too, but he was seething inside. Jesus, the guy's wired, he's tripped-out—

Instinct came to the rescue and he turned to the audience, rapping out an old line off the top of his head. It was a feeble gag, but anything was better than dead air.

The jock didn't move a muscle, just sat there frozen. Only one thing to do—get him off, quick. Harry gave the signal, a hand-gesture, and two bosomy blondes jiggled onstage. "Harry's Hostesses," that's what they were called, but their real job was to cover for him in emergencies like this. And while he popped a line about the jock coming down with a sudden attack of athlete's foot, the smiling girls helped the guy to rise from his seat.

Helped him, hell—they couldn't budge him, he just sat there stiff as a board. Harry shot out another line to grab the audience's attention while the girls, smiling no longer, practically carried the big ape offstage, his feet dragging between them.

Now what? Harry signalled again and the fat announcer came to his rescue, plodding onstage and going into a schtick which had nothing to do with what had happened. Looking up, Harry saw that the crawl had whirred through a speed-up and now it fed him a line which segued into a commercial break.

As it came, he switched off his mike and spoke quickly. “What’s going on here?”

“The computer’s down,” the announcer said. And walked off, striding stiffly, without another word.

“Hey, come back here—”

Harry’s voice rose, but the announcer only increased his pace, legs jerking as he lurched against the backdrop in his haste to reach the wings.

Panic impelled Harry’s fingers to the buttons on the end-table beside his chair, pressing a signal that would alert the director in the control-booth.

There was no response. A new commercial tape rolled on the monitor screen, but that didn’t tell him anything. Harry blinked up through the lights until he managed to focus on the glass-fronted booth high on the rear wall of the studio.

The booth was empty.

No director. No production people, not even a sound engineer.

Harry stared. What gives here? Don’t tell me it’s all computerized now—camera-cues, sound-levels, light-changes, the works—

Frantic, he glanced over to the wings, then wished he hadn’t. The announcer was there, sprawled face-down on the floor next to the inert jock. As Harry watched, a pair of paramedics approached, then knelt beside the fat figure as they stripped off the announcer’s jacket and shirt. Hastily they began to press the shiny studs imbedded in his bare back, fiddling with connections.

Connections.

Harry made connections of his own. Jesus, he's like me! And the jock, too.

Then the commercial faded from the monitor and Harry was on again. His eyes sought the crawl but there was no crawl. All he could do was switch his mike back on and stall for time.

But the mike was dead. Dead, like the announcer and the jock and—

Realization hit him then. He wasn't the only one. Something had been building up while he was out of it. Harry remembered the rumors about an epidemic; it must have been going on for a long time, hushed-up but happening just the same. More and more people at the top were like himself now, empty shells with artificial life-support.

How far had it spread? How long would it be before presidents were programmed, robots ruled the world? Calling it a medical miracle didn't change the facts—this was a conspiracy. Somebody had to blow the whistle, tell the truth, tell it quickly.

Now a faint hum sounded and Harry knew his mike was live again; an automatic backup had corrected its breakdown. But it was up to him to correct the other breakdown, the big one.

Facing the lights that separated him from his audience, Harry's voice bridged the gap with words. He had to warn them now, if it was the last thing he could do.

"Can you hear me? Then get out of here! You've got to understand—this isn't real. I'm not real. Tell your friends. Don't let the computers take over, don't let artificial organs and electronic implants turn you into zombies! It happened to me and it can happen to you unless you do something now. Find a cure for this—get back to reality before it's too late!"

Harry paused, waiting for a reaction.

And then it came—in a burst of sound from the laugh-track.

That was to be expected, of course. There was always a track to punch up the laughs, another to sweeten the applause.

But over the years Harry had learned to detect the difference between canned laughter and the real thing. And this mirth was mechanical. Nobody was laughing out there, nobody was applauding, nobody was reacting because they didn't know how to react unless they were cued. This was a funny show, he was a funny man, and they couldn't respond to an unexpected warning on their own.

During the years that surgery had robbed him of his body, something had stolen their brains. Computers did their thinking, the media dictated their life-styles. Making love, driving cars or shaking their fists in protest-demonstrations were all a matter of mimicry. Machines made the products, machines pitched the products, machines bought the products and used them. Life wasn't real any longer—it was like this show, with its phoney guests, phoney ad-libs, and phoney host.

The only reality Harry could find now was his own despair. What good would warnings do? Viewers weren't going to hear what he said—it would be edited from the tape.

But there was still a way. Word-of-mouth. That was the answer—if he got through to the studio audience here, made them believe, they'd go out and spread the truth. And he had to convince them now, because this was his last chance.

Harry faced the lights, fighting the blinding glare, forcing himself to make eye-contact with the figures seated silently in the shadows below. His vision blurred, then cleared, and he stared down at the empty expanse of the studio.

There was no audience.

No audience—just Harry and the crawl. A blinking light from the TelePrompTer told him it had resumed functioning again, cueing him in on his next line.

Automatically, Harry began to read the words aloud. What the hell, it was a new season, the show must go on, and a gag is a gag.

And if there was no audience, it didn't matter. He'd always have the laugh-track.

Heir Apparent

Truth is a weapon which cuts both ways, and its blade is often bent in the telling.

Let not my words mislead you, for I am neither a swordsman nor any other kind of man. My name is Maug, and my station is that of first chamberwoman to the Lady Tephana.

It is for her that I must tell the truth, lest others twist the tale.

Hear me now, for this was the way of it . . .

It is whispered that we of the North have long had dealings with powers of the Dark and that we bear the taint of their blood. This I shall not deny. To live in a land where once demons held domain is difficult at best, for their power is still strong and we have learned their ways in order to survive. We who wish to dwell in peace under their sufferance must bargain for it. And if, at times, that bargain entails the mingling of bloodlines, so be it.

That my own mother entered into such an alliance has been hinted, but of this I cannot surely say, since she died at my birthing, without revealing my father's name. I was taken into the House of Paltendale as an orphan babe and in its service I grew to womanhood, learning the arts of chamberwoman to earn my keep.

I know also—and freely admit—that from childhood on I possessed certain powers greater than those of ordinary folk around me, and came easily to the study of spells and the distillation of potions employing the lore of the Dark. While other maidens of my years yearned for love, my interest lay only in learning, and I knew naught of womanly wiles and ways. And when at last love came into my life it was not the love of maid for man but the maternal affection of a mother for her child.

The child was she who became Lady Tephana, and I was not her true mother. She, like myself, was born into the House of Paltendale without living parents, both her noble sire and lady mother perishing of a plague which swept the land shortly after her birth. Some called it a curse brought down upon them for trafficking with dwellers from the Dark. Again I know nothing of this save rumor. And all I knew at the time was that a tiny infant lay helpless and unprotected, mewling for a mother's milk and starved for the succor of a tender touch and caring caresses.

Milk was secured through the services of a wet nurse, but it was I, assigned to duties in the nursery, who gave her loving care. And as the years went by it was I who became not only nurse but teacher, I who protected her with charms to ward off harm, I who was privileged to be her preceptress and guide her emergence into womanhood.

And woman she became—small in stature but well endowed with beauty of face and form. Her hair was lustrous black, her eyes deep gray, her gestures graceful, her voice a caress.

Small wonder then that she was sought as a bride by her cousin, the young heir to the House of Fortal. And when she wed she chose me to serve as her first chamberwoman.

Those were joyous times, and in memory I still hear the echo of her laughter. When the union was blessed with a son, Hylmer, it seemed her happiness was complete. But happiness is hard to come by and harder to hold; it slipped from her grasp all too swiftly with the sudden death of her lord in a hunting accident.

Her grief was great, and I grieved for her. Lady Tephana's beauty was shrouded in the grey garb of widowhood and her position as Mistress of Fortal imperiled by her dead lord's brothers who sought to take power.

It was then that I came to her one dark and dreary day, in the tower chambers which had long since ceased to be warmed by sunlight or her smile.

“Be of good cheer, my lady,” I said. “For I bring glad tidings.”

“Indeed?” Gray eyes met mine with no luster in their glance. “What might those tidings be that they hold reason to dispel my sorrow?”

“Your time of mourning is over, and your widowhood as well. For even as I speak, a suitor is on his way.”

The gray eyes widened. “A suitor? But I do not wish to marry again.”

“It is not a question of wish,” I said, “but rather one of need. Others plot your downfall here, for you have unfriends within this Keep.”

“It is of no great consequence, now that my lord is gone. Whatever comes, the future holds no fears for me.”

I shook my head. “And Hylmer, your son—does his welfare mean nothing to you as well? Those who scheme to bring you down will also place his life in peril, for only then can they take power.”

Lady Tephana nodded quickly. “You are right, of course. It is Hylmer’s safety I must consider. And if I marry again he will be under the protection of my new spouse.” She rose and faced me, her eyes at last alert. “But tell me—who is it that would seek my hand in marriage?”

“Ulric, Lord of Ulm.” As I spoke I glanced out of the tower window, peering down at a band of horsemen moving toward the castle on the road below, their banners bright against the sun. “And if I mistake not, he comes to claim you even now.”

I was not mistaken; it was indeed Ulric who approached the Keep. Nor had I misread his purpose, for it was I, with the aid of certain spells which need not be described, who stirred his thoughts to summon him. Bluntly put, I had ensorceled Lord Ulric with a vision of Lady Tephana and her beauty, hoping to induce his coming.

Of this I spoke not, thinking it wiser that my Lady believe his presence here was prompted only by his own desire. And it pleased me greatly that their meeting bore fruit; he appeared much taken with her charms and lost no time in urging his suit. As for Lady Tephana, she seemed not unmindful of his brave appearance and ardent entreaty. Knowing the safety of her son was at stake, she dispensed with the coquetry of courtship and readily consented to become Ulric's bride.

The ceremony was celebrated quietly, amidst general rejoicing, and sooner than I'd dared believe possible my lady journeyed south to her new lord's land. Hylmer was left behind for a time in the care of trusted chamberwomen, until she felt assured of the stability of her new estate as Lord Ulric's wife.

But I rode with her, and it was I who stayed at her side after our arrival at Ulm. And it was I who soon sensed the coming of a cloud which cast its shadow over the marriage. For while Ulric looked upon her lovingly in the presence of others, I noted that in their private moments his smiles gave way to frowns.

This troubled me, and at last I could keep silent no longer. Seeking out Lady Tephana in her chambers I made bold to question her.

"Forgive my forwardness," I said. "But I speak only out of devotion to your well-being. What is it between you and Lord Ulric which mars this marriage?"

Lady Tephana shrugged. "There is nothing between us." She smiled thinly. "Perhaps it is that which disturbs him."

I stared at her, realizing the full import of her words.

"Do you mean that after a month of wedlock there has been no consummation of the union?"

She nodded quickly and would have turned away, but I deterred her. "How can that be?" I said. "Lord Ulric is indeed somewhat older and less handsome than your late husband, but still he is of noble birth and a fine figure of a man. Is there some secret deformity in his person, some hidden flaw which inspires your repugnance? Surely it is not his indifference that prompts your rejection; even I, who know little of the ways of love, can see how greatly he yearns to follow wedding with bedding."

“Truly said.” Lady Tephana faced me now, and I read anger in her eyes. “Ulric does indeed bum with desire to possess me, but his longing has little to do with love, or even lust. To him I am not a person but merely a receptacle to be filled with seed. He does not truly look upon me as wife or woman; he married only to beget an heir.”

I nodded. “But this is natural. All men wish for offspring, and a lord needs sons to carry on the line.”

“It is more than need which impels him,” Lady Tephana said. “Since coming here I have learned much. Soon after Ulric’s birth his father’s doings brought down a curse upon the House of Ulm, and no further children were born alive thereafter. Mindful of this, Ulric himself married when quite young, hoping to rid the curse and secure an heir. His wife was sickly, but he had little concern for her. He promptly got her with child and when the poor lady died in the birthing he mourned not at this; it was only the loss of the infant which sorrowed him.

“His second wife, the Lady Elva, was wedded in unseemly haste thereafter. It is said she captivated him with the beauty of her fair hair, the slim perfection of her body with its exquisite, pear-shaped breasts. It is also said that he felt true affection for her, but this did not deter him from his purpose. He took her roughly and repeatedly until she too conceived, not once but several times, and always the offspring came before their time so that none survived. Perhaps he loved her truly, but this did not prevent him from dismissing her. He craved a child, and that is why he came to wed me—only because he must father an heir for Ulmsdale.

“As he thinks of naught but his own position, so must I think of mine. And this I swear—I shall not become an instrument of his arrogance, a brood-mare to serve his purpose. Proud he may be, but so am I. Mine is the pride of womanhood, and he shall not humble it.”

“Even at the cost of your son’s life?” I said softly.

“I will protect Hylmer,” she declared.

“With what—a woman’s wiles?” I frowned. “How long do you think you can fend Ulric off with talk of headaches or being in your monthly courses?

Sooner or later he will insist upon claiming his rights to your person, and if you resist he will surely banish you. Then Hylmer, like yourself, forfeits all protection. You two will wander the Waste to your deaths."

Lady Tephana, she who walked high in her grace, now stood with sagging shoulders, and the white purity of her complexion grayed to ashen pallor.

"But what am I to do?" she cried.

"The answer is simple," I said. "You must conceive."

"Never!" A spark of anger flared from the ashes, reddening her cheeks and flaming from her eyes. "Come what may, Ulric shall not use me thus."

"Consider his position," I counseled. "Ulric acts not out of malice but only to protect Ulm."

"His motives do not matter," Lady Tephana declared. "If I give him a son, the boy becomes his rightful heir, and Hylmer would still have no assurance of safety in the future." Her eyes flashed fire. "I tell you I will not bear Ulric's child."

"I speak only of conception," I murmured. "But the child need not be Ulric's."

Lady Tephana stared at me in puzzlement. "You would have me cuckold him with another man?"

I smiled. "Suppose it was not a man?"

My lady stared, taking my meaning. Then, "You would have me consort with evil?" she whispered.

I shook my head. "Evil is an empty word. The cosmos itself exists only as the interplay of Light and Darkness, which are neither good nor evil—merely opposite aspects of the same power. Power which men seek to control by means we call magic."

"You have knowledge of such magic, then?" Lady Tephana said.

"I do. And I would employ it so that you bear a babe which is not truly of Ulric's blood."

"But what purpose would that serve?"

"Yours," I told her. "If the offspring is not Ulric's it will become your ally, not his. Thus it will grow to protect you and your child. Is that not what you desire?"

Lady Tephana nodded. "More than life itself." She hesitated, grey eyes intent on mine. "But are you certain you can do this?"

"Trust me," I said.

And she did.

So it was that she went to Lord Ulric and cozened him, saying that she would no longer withhold her favors, for now her true desire was as his—to give him a manchild. But when he sought to take her she implored that he wait only a few days longer. First she must make pilgrimage to the shrine of Gunnora, Our Lady of Fruitfulness, and pray to her for the life and good health of Ulric's issue.

Convinced and content, he agreed to her going, wishing her well on the mission.

Before departure I took other steps to guard our safety. When Ulric's former wife. Lady Elva, took refuge in Norsdale Abbey she left behind her own first chamberwoman. This was one Ylas, an ill-favored creature with a harelip, who was skilled in needlework. I was disturbed by her continued presence here and wondered if she had been instructed to stay and spy upon Lady Tephana and her doings. To distract her from such purpose I now sought her out with a smiling face and asked her to weave a scarf for my lady, using fine fabric which I gave her together with drawings of a pattern for her needle to follow. Thus employed I felt she would be unmindful of our own comings and goings.

And go we did next day, accompanied by two guards, though it was not Gunnora's shrine we sought. The guards knew naught of this, for in their provisions was an ample supply of drink containing a potion I concocted to insure sound sleep and direct their dreams. To them those dreams would seem reality, so that next morning upon awakening they would swear they had spent the night in sentry outside the portals of Gunnora's shrine.

But once their slumber was assured. Lady Tephana and I made our way farther into the bleak and barren land where stood another edifice, erected by darker powers for a darker purpose.

It was there, in the crumbling ruins of what had not been raised by human hands, that we came under the cloak of night. And it was there, in a chamber steeped with shadows, that Lady Tephana removed her cloak at my instruction and laid herself upon a slab of stone, baring her body to reveal the richness of its charms.

The slab was cold and the night chill, but it was with fear of the strange shadows that she shuddered and shivered until my words calmed her into repose. Eyes closed, she slumbered, unaware of what transpired in the midnight hours.

As she lay in loveliness I drew forth a short wand fashioned from the spine of an unborn infant and bathed in its blood to confer the power of charmed command.

Power too took added strength from the sound of the words I muttered in a tongue forgotten by men but well remembered by those who dwell in the Darkness.

The force surged forth to stir the shadows, imbuing them with a life of their own. Swirling into shifting shapes, the shadows took fearsome form as they drew closer to the slab, gathering to gaze on the bared body of my lady. Hands that were more like claws or talons swooped forth, seeking to touch, to grasp, to possess. But with wand and words I kept them back whilst I sought the semblance of one summoned by name—the Darklord Galkur.

And as my lady slept he came, emerging from the striving shapes to tower over the slab with more than a shadow’s substance. There was such hunger in his glowing gaze; such emanations of dark desire as to set me atremble so that the wand almost slipped from between my fingers. Hastily I tightened my grip, chanting aloud the ancient ritual which alone could hold the adept’s powers of Darklord Galkur in thrall.

Even so, he crept closer to my sleeping lady, closer than any of his shadowy company, tensing above her body as though to hurl himself upon it.

"You want her?" I whispered. "Then listen. Listen, Lord Galkur, and heed me well."

Now, murmuring in the midnight, I proposed my pact—my lady's flesh in return for Galkur's favor. And when I at last concluded, the huge head nodded in eager assent.

"Then it is agreed," I said. The shape made as if to advance upon its prey but with my wand I waved it back. "Leave us now so that I can prepare the way. She shall be yours at moontide of tomorrow's eve."

Shadows lack voices but I fancied my words echoed by Galkur's deeper tones. And then his shape slithered back to merge and mingle with the other phantasmal forms as they swirled away into the darkness, vanishing to leave me alone with Lady Tephana asleep on the stone stained by other sacrifices. Now she too would be sacrificed to seal this pact with Darkness, but mercifully she knew not of the bargain I had struck.

As for me, I slept not, but waited the coming of dawn in silence. When Lady Tephana awoke and sought to question me I told her merely that my efforts had met with success and all would be well. Seeking the guards before the portals of Gunnora's shrine, I bid them bestir themselves. As I had foreseen they were none the wiser for our absence during the night, and now together we made our way back to the Keep.

There, as Lady Tephana rested in her tower chamber, I sped to the kitchen below, for in accordance with my plan I needs must prepare a potion. With me I brought certain herbs and simples gathered from the weed-strung Waste. And while cook and serving-maids stood apart, curious as to my intent yet afraid to question me, I filled a brew pot on the hearth and began the rituals required.

To folk who know not magic it seems strange that potency resides in the leaves and petals of common growths. The secret, of course, lies not in the plants themselves but in their proper mingling. It is much the case as with words. Used singly they lack strength. But when grouped together in certain sentences they can cajole, command, condemn, curse, inspire love or loathing, happiness or hatred. And plants possess similar powers when combined for intended usage.

To compound the efficacy of my concoction I hummed an age-old tune, for musical notes—again when properly assembled—convey a still other power of their own.

All this is the essence of magic's meaning—the informed use of the commonplace to create a linkage with Forces that surround us—and bend those Forces to our bidding.

In the midst of my task I spied the woman Ylas creeping about the kitchen and stealthily observing my every movement. From the look of her she did not relish the odors arising from the bubbling pot before me. And there was an aura about her, as if she were not alone but accompanied by an intangible presence. An image came unbidden to me; that of an eagle-headed gryphon, which is the guardian symbol of the House of Ulm. But what this had to do with the actual and visible Ylas I could not divine; dismissing the vagrant fancy I watched the woman leave after making pretense of eating bread and cheese.

Puzzled, I sent my thoughts after her, informed with a purpose she must fulfil. My sending proved successful, for when I finished my workings and took a portion of my potion to Lady Tephana's tower, Ylas appeared bearing the scarf I had bid her weave. This she presented to the lady, who placed it about her shoulders and praised her work.

But there was about this a matter for unease. Before Ylas arrived I had poured my potion into a golden goblet, and now she recognized its scent. Peering down, she passed her fingers over the goblet's rim. then drew back quickly, and in the twilight of the tower window I saw her misshapen mouth go agape in fear as she turned to depart from the chamber.

"What possesses her?" Lady Tephana exclaimed.

"No matter," I replied. "At best she can but suspect rather than know. As for possession, that in itself is a matter we must now consider. For the night is nigh."

Then, and only then, did I inform the lady of what lay ahead and of the part she was to play in it.

Briefly put, the plan was this. With the coming of darkness Lady Tephana would seek out Lord Ulric and invite him to sup in her tower chambers. Here, with a sumptuous meal prepared, she must greet him with warm and wifely words of welcome while arrayed in a rich robe woven but thinly to cover her charms yet not conceal them. Together they would dine by the light of scented candles, the fragrance of which would mingle with the perfume my lady had applied to her person. And as they enjoyed their repast she would employ the methods of a magic common to womankind—shy gestures, sidelong glances, stifled sighs; such sorceries as need not words to give them meaning. The wine Lord Ulric took with his meal must aid in kindling desire, but nothing could inflame his senses like my lady's unspoken promise of passion to come.

Inevitably he would seek to draw her to the bed, but before the moment of sweet surrender she must invite him to drink first from the golden goblet.

Once the potion passed his lips our aim was accomplished. For even as he drew the garment from her shapely shoulders a strange sleep would steal over him—but a sleep in which he fancied himself still awake. Thus, though he held heaven in his arms and sought the portals of paradise, he would do so only in dream.

Then, as the potion took full effect, Ulric's mortal body would be usurped by the essence of one not completely mortal, as Darklord Galkur took both his place and his pleasure.

Lady Tephana listened and her great gray eyes were haunted with misgiving. "But this is a dreadful thing we do," she whispered.

"A needful thing," I told her. "If there is issue from this union, both it and your son Hylmer will enjoy the protection of Darklord Galkur."

My lady shuddered. "It is said this Galkur is a creature neither animal nor human. How can I freely give myself to such a monster?"

"There is a way," I told her. "When Lord Ulric drinks from the goblet you must signify your desire to drink in turn—not from the goblet, but from his lips, while his mouth still holds the liquid of the potion. This will please him, I know, for there can be no more precious a prelude to the act of love.

"You need but take a sip of the brew to bring the blessing of sleep. Within moments your senses will slumber, though you will appear to be awake. You shall not be aware of Galkur's coming and caresses, nor will he discern that you thus deny him your participation in his pleasuring."

Lady Tephana pondered upon my proposal for a long moment before breaking silence. "There is no other way?"

"None. This is the only course."

She sighed, then nodded. "So be it, then."

Night descended and Lord Ulric ascended to the tower. All was in readiness as arranged, and all went in accordance with my plan.

To assure myself of this I found a station in the room adjoining the bedchamber. Kneeling there in the darkness I put my eye to the keyhole of the chamber door. It was not curiosity which prompted me, but after all my calculation and worrisome workings—and above all, for the sake of my lady—I must be certain of the results obtained.

So it was that I witnessed the meeting of Lord Ulric and his bride, their meal together, her amorous enticement, and its effect upon him. I saw too his draining of the golden goblet and how Lady Tephana drank a portion drawn by a kiss with opened mouth—a kiss that ended only as the lovers sank down upon the bed together.

Together—yet not for long. As the two entwined there seemed a great stirring in the bedchamber, and the candlelight wavered, flames fluttering in a whirl of wind. Then shadows came, though I did not sense their source, filling the room with a swirl of seething sable which spiraled down upon the bed and merged into a single shape.

The shape descended upon Lord Ulric, seeming to absorb his body, so that now Lady Tephana lay beneath a shadow. This shadow was unlike any other, for it had eyes—great eyes, holding a lambent light as they feasted upon my lady's bared beauty, eyes that gloated as fingers of darkness fondled and fastened themselves upon her person. But as the black bulk descended I saw, or seemed to see, a curious change in its contours. For a moment it melted, and in its place appeared the profiled semblance of a great beaked and horned birdlike head borne by a body with widespread wings. But it was Galkur's loins below which thrust forward, and from them darted that which had the hideous likeness of a writhing serpent. At the sight of its writhing and the realization of its intent I cried out in terror, then swooned away before the door.

How long I lay in merciful unawareness I cannot say, but when at last I roused and steeled myself to again peer through the keyhole I saw that Galkur's shadow had vanished, together with all other fearful forms. Now only Lord Ulric and Lady Tephana lay side by side in slumber, their bodies bathed in the warming glow of calm candlelight.

Of what transpired on that fateful evening I spoke not, nor did my lady venture to discuss. But it was apparent that Lord Ulric was unaware of anything amiss and now he looked fondly on his bride—the more so as he perceived the growing evidence of her condition. For it was increasingly obvious she was with child and this pleased him greatly. So fulsome was his favor that Lady Tephana made bold to bring Hylmer to the Keep. Ulric welcomed him warmly and I know he took his place with favor, though I saw him but seldom in the months to come.

As for me, I remained haunted with a vexing uncertainty as to what I had actually witnessed before my fainting spell. Each time I encountered the needlewoman Ylas I wondered if by some mischance she too had wrought a magic of her own.

It was a matter of grave concern, and when Lady Tephana entered the final weeks of her carrying I determined upon a course that would ensnare Ylas, however unwittingly, as a party to the outcome of my plans.

Providing my lady with what was needful, I enlisted her to summon Ylas to the bedchamber where she lay awaiting the approaching hour of birthing. Here, in accordance with my instruction, she gave Ylas two bolts of cloth—one red, the other white—together with a parchment I prepared bearing a design to be woven into a birth-cloth for the newborn infant.

The design held symbols not usually employed, but I hoped Ylas would feel sufficiently flattered by being entrusted with her task and follow orders to weave the pattern as instructed.

But when I sought her out to take possession of her finished handiwork I perceived instantly that she had betrayed my wishes, for the birthing-cloth bore other symbols—the twin traceries of Gunnora's amulet of protection and the gryphon guardian of the House of Ulm.

Of my displeasure I gave no sign, merely gathering the cloth and wrapping it in the folds of another. Thus shielded, the symbols would possess no power, and Ylas's tampering was thwarted.

Still I could not be assured she might not resort to other means of interfering if left to her own devices; it might be that she was capable of weaving spells as well as cloth.

So three days later, as Lady Tephana's time came upon her, I bade Ylas join us on our journeying. For Lady Tephana had gone to Ulric and asked that she give birth in the shrine of Gunnora. Here, with the favor of the great patroness of womankind, she would bear him a living heir at last to break the curse which beset the House of Ulm. Despite her secret betrayal she was quite sincere in her hope to bear a living child, and felt the need of Gunnora's birth-blessing.

With Lord Ulric's consent we started forth, my lady in a horse litter led by manservants, whilst I bestrode another mare. Ylas and two castle maids followed on foot.

Sullen signs of an approaching storm suffused the sky, and when at last we came unto the hillside we made no attempt to follow the path upward, for the climb was too steep for the horses to mount safely. We turned to go around the hill and reach the shrine from its opposite side, making our way along a road which had been laid by the Old Ones through their land.

Then the storm descended, and in its full fury we could go no farther but needs must seek shelter within the half-leveled structure which long ago the Old Ones had raised as a stopping-place. Placing Lady Tephana's litter in the inner chamber with the women, the men and steeds were left to make do in the outer one as best they could.

Now, as howling wind and hissing rain tore night to tatters, my lady trembled to find herself in this place of darkness instead of Gunnora's shrine. But there was no help for it, and as lightning flashed and thunder boomed she writhed in the pangs of birthing, babbling regret of the pact she had made with other powers. I too felt unease, but it was too late to alter what had been done, and there was naught to do but await the coming of the child.

Thunder heralded its birth, and when the maids drew forth the babe it squirmed and squealed loudly, for it was indeed alive.

As I ministered to my lady, Ylas took the infant and placed it upon the birthing-cloth. Then lightning flickered forth from cracks in the ruined walls and in its glare I turned and beheld the child. Beheld its manly human form which terminated in hooves instead of feet—beheld also the human face whenceforth peered two glowing yellow eyes.

And as I stared stricken, a sound as of the beating of great wings rose above the tumult of the storm, as did the echo of a mighty voice raised triumphant over all.

"Son sealed to me!"

The echo faded but my fright remained. For it was then I knew that we had failed. Despite Galkur's brand upon its body and despite the cry of what I sensed to be the Gryphon Lord, this was truly Lord Ulric's son.

I moved to place the child beside Lady Tephana, but Ylas shrieked that this was a demon’s get, and when my lady saw what she had birthed she screamed and averted her gaze in horror.

Nor would she ever look upon it or hold it in her arms, even when we returned to Ulmsdale and Lord Ulric accepted his heir without question or reproach. He gave the infant into the care of a trusted forester who took him to raise in a place far distant from the Keep.

And I, who had risked and sacrificed so much for my mistress to safeguard her future, found myself without favor in her eyes. Banished from her presence, I now know naught but desolation and despair.

Sometimes I ponder upon that of which I spoke—the nature of a cosmos in which good and evil are illusions, merely the interplay between Light and Darkness which we seek to control by magic so that we ourselves may gain power.

And this I ask myself: what if our power is also an illusion? What if the forces of Light and Darkness are themselves but pawns in some vaster game which we cannot ever comprehend, or hope to master?

The answer to these questions I do not know.

I know only that I am afraid . . .

Afterword

I was introduced to Andre Norton and her business associate Ingrid Zierhut at a convention. The ladies then retired to their room, where Ms. Norton promptly fell asleep and Ms.

Zierhut read the ads in the program booklet—thus giving you some idea of the kind of impression I made on them. Still, something did result from our meeting, because when Ms. Norton awoke she announced, “I just had an idea, “and Ms. Zierhut responded, “So do I.” Whereupon both said, in unison, “Why not ask Mr. Bloch to write a story for Tales of the Witch World?”

It was a crazy idea, so of course I agreed. As we all know, somebody—either Shakespeare or Isaac Asimov—wrote, "There are two sides to every story," and "Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery." Actually these quotations come from Diogenes Laertius and Charles Caleb Colton respectively, and both are misquotations. Laertius' term was "question" instead of "story" and Colton didn't qualify his wording with "form of" Nevertheless, I was guided by the incorrect quotes—writing the other side of And of Norton's story from the opposite viewpoint of another character, but deliberately imitating the Norton style which, like the lady herself, I greatly admire. "Making a mistake is not always an error," as somebody once said. I think it was me. Having read my story, it's up to you to decide if what I did was right or wrong. At any rate, consider "Heir Apparent ' as a tribute to the talented tale-teller who inspired it.

Horror Scope

When I came into the bedroom I found her sitting at the vanity, before the mirror. I don’t know why she bothered, because she didn’t have any head.

Shires and his jolly crew were all over the place, snapping pictures, taking tape-measurements, gathering carpet-lint, spreading dusting-powder over furniture and woodwork, drawing diagrams, making notes. All this, of course, is standard operating procedure in a criminal investigation and these people like to think of themselves as experts, using modern techniques. But whenever I see them on the scene of a homicide I can’t help but be reminded of the way vultures always gather and descend on a carcass brought down by the king of beasts.

In our society, of course, the king of beasts is outlawed as a predator, and all this activity—like my own presence here—is directed towards finding the lion who killed the lamb.

Not a bad comparison, really, and in this case it was particularly apt, for the headless victim was a lamb—a Mrs. Jennifer Lamb, to be exact.

Shires greeted me with his usual scowl of welcome. “Glad you’re here,” he said. “Don’t touch anything.”

I nodded, but the warning was unnecessary. There was nothing here I really wanted to touch. Certainly not the body lolling grotesquely in the chair before the vanity, nor the stained and spattered negligee in which it was clad. I had no desire to run my fingers over the stump on which a head once rested—truth to tell, my stomach churned at the sight.

Shires turned, calling in the direction of the bathroom doorway. “You guys finished yet?”

Two of the vultures emerged from the opening and the one in the lead opened his beak. “Yeah, we’re done.”

“Good.” Shires nodded at me. “Come on. I’ll show you where it happened.”

There was a long, long trail awinding across the bedroom floor to the bathroom doorway—a trail of blood. Shires paced beside it and as I joined him an idiotic refrain popped into my head. Follow the yellow-brick road—

But this road was red, and it didn’t lead to the Emerald City.

The bathroom was small, its white-tiled walls covered with flecks of congealed crimson at their base. I’m not a professional vulture myself, at least I don’t like to think I am, but it required no expertise to reconstruct what had taken place here.

A wide-open window offered mute testimony as to how the killer gained entrance to the first-floor apartment. There was nothing to show where the victim had been at the time. She could have been in the bathroom with her back turned, or else walked into it after the murderer entered.

My offhand guess inclined towards the second explanation. If Mrs. Lamb was present during the actual entry she would have heard sounds and had time to see the intruder and do the sensible thing—run like hell out of the room. I favored another scenario: she came in later, after the interloper took up a position behind the open door.

In either case I doubted that she ever saw her murderer, unless perhaps she caught a single fleeting glimpse in the bathroom mirror as the presence loomed up behind her and the weapon came down.

Since there were no signs of a struggle, nothing knocked over or broken on the washstand, no marks of clawing hands or fingers on the white-tiled walls, it was fair to assume she’d been attacked from the rear; swiftly, savagely—and from the killer’s point of view—successfully.

I said as much to Shires, and he agreed. Possibly two weapons had been used: a knife that severed the jugular and/or carotid artery, followed by a saw or hatchet that actually removed her head once the body had slumped to the floor. That determination would have to be made by the pathologist, since no weapon or weapons were found on the scene, and so far none had been located by the crew searching the alleyway beyond the window. But from the angle of entry and impact evident on the neck, the head had been severed from back to front, after which the decapitated corpse had been dragged across the bedroom floor and deposited in the chair before the mirror in all its gory glory.

"What do you think?" I asked Shires. "Could she have been molested before she died?"

"Molested?" For the first time he favored me with a smile. It wasn't exactly a pleasant one, and frankly I preferred his scowl. "You mean raped?" He shook his head. "No signs of it—either before or after death."

I hadn't thought about the latter possibility and didn't want to. I concealed my reaction by hurrying on.

"Forensics can give us the answer on that," I said. "And probably identify the missing weapon or weapons by examining the wounds in the victim's head."

"Not likely." Shires gestured through the doorway towards the figure sprawled in the chair before the vanity. "All they're going to get is a headache. We can't find the head."

Forensic experts weren't the only ones stuck with a headache. I had my own.

In the days that followed, the reports came into the office and were duly dumped on my desk. Pathologists' findings, inquest transcripts, investigative data—all pieces of a jigsaw puzzle that didn't fit together.

Apparently my hasty conclusions about the actual murder method were tentatively confirmed, though there was no additional evidence, no eyewitness testimony, no dramatic clues issuing from lab tests. Fibres of carpet different from those in the bedroom had turned up, fibres deposited by the killer's shoes, but clues to their origin were lacking. No fingerprints were found anywhere in the apartment, or on the window-sash and sill. The lion that struck down Mrs. Lamb was a crafty beast.

But I'm not a Great White Hunter, any more than I'm a vulture. My role is strictly unofficial; as a retired professor of criminology I'm called in to assess evidence and review theory on special occasions.

Some homicide bureaus work with psychics, though they try not to publicize the fact. A few prefer someone like myself working behind the scenes. It doesn't always produce results, but at least it's better than following usual police procedure—which is to wait for a phone-call from an informant that solves the case.

This time there was no call. And lacking a crystal ball, I had problems.

Department head Romberg barged into my little makeshift office on the second day after the crime to demand a progress report.

"I can give you a report, yes," I told him. "But not very much by way of progress."

He lit a cigarette, the quick flick of his lighter betraying his impatience. "Okay, so you haven't found any new leads. Just what did you come up with?"

I shrugged. "Pretty much the same thing that you found, I imagine. I made a few notes here." Rummaging through the litter on my desk-top I located the typescript from which I read.

"Jennifer Lamb was fifty-eight years old. Widowed three years ago, no children, no immediate family. Husband Eric, eight years her senior, died of a heart attack; she lived on his pension plus social security payments. Far as we know she had no close friends, male or female, no live-in, no indication of casual sexual involvements—"

Romberg interrupted me with a gesture from the hand holding his cigarette. "You're right, we got all that. Neighbors say she was a loner, tended to keep pretty much to herself. Went shopping two or three times a week, attended First Baptist Church, over on Elm Street, every Sunday. Didn't drink, smoke or do drugs. Didn't seem to have any hobbies—there weren’t even any books in the apartment, just a TV and a transistor radio. Drove a blue 1985 Toyota, had her hair done every two weeks, kept a checking-account at First National. Trouble is, all this means nothing.”

I shook my head. “Sometimes nothing means something.”

“Like what, Professor?”

“The very emptiness of her life is a clue. No family, close friends or romantic attachments—their lack indicates there was no personal motive for her murder. And since her purse, jewelry-box and dresser-drawers hadn’t been touched, we can rule out robbery. Which leaves us with the assumption that whoever killed her could be sociopathic.”

“So what else is new? We figured all along we’re dealing with a crazy.”

“Sociopaths are not legally insane,” I reminded him. “And crawling through an open window and selecting a victim at random is not in itself a sure indication of psychosis.”

“But what about the way she was killed? Cutting off her head and propping the body up in a chair—only a loony would do a thing like that.”

“Definitions of mental disturbances aren’t important,” I said. “The big question is whether the murder was committed on impulse or as the result of a deep-rooted compulsion.”

“What difference does that make?”

“All the difference in the world. Because if the murder was compulsive, we must expect the possibility of further killings.”

Romberg grimaced. “That’s all we need—another serial murderer!” He shook his head. “I’m not buying that. You got no facts to go on, so don’t tell me—”

I didn’t have to.

At that moment a uniformed officer hustled into the office unannounced and uninvited. “Just got word on the squawk,” he said. “Supermarket over on Pine and Seventh. Clerk went out to throw some cartons in the trash-bin. Found a body-bag dumped there, and it wasn’t empty.”

Romberg grimaced again. “Man or a woman?”

“A man. Or most of him, that is.”

“Most of him?”

“That’s right. His left hand’s missing.”

The man’s name was Rufus Tate. Black, aged thirty-four, married, two children. Steel-worker, presently unemployed, last seen leaving a neighborhood bar half a mile from where his body was discovered—but there’s no need to go into further details.

Homicide covered that pretty thoroughly in the days which followed and came up with—

“Zilch!” Romberg muttered, pacing the floor in front of my desk. “We asked the right questions but all we get are wrong answers. Tate was a family man, good solid reputation. Sure, he hit the bottle after losing his job, but he wasn’t an alcoholic. No police record, no known enemies, not the kind of a guy who went around picking fights. Just walked out of that bar and disappeared. You got the coroner’s report. Some kind of sharp weapon, a knife most likely, punctured the femoral artery. And—”

“Cut off his left hand at the wrist.” I leaned forward in my chair. “Doesn’t that suggest something to you?”

“Look, there’s no connection. Believe me, we touched base on the possibility of something in common between Mrs. Lamb and Tate, but I swear there couldn’t be a link.”

“Yes there is. The missing link. Missing head and missing hand.”

“But the MO is different this time.”

“Never mind the MO. Remember that series of murders down in Los Angeles? Methods differed, but there was only one killer. I’m afraid we’re stuck with that fact. And if there are any more—”

Romberg stopped pacing and gave me a hard look. “Okay,” he said. “You might as well know. There was another homicide last night. A Mrs. Haskell, over on Robinson Avenue. Somebody bludgeoned her to death in her own garage, hit her with a tire-iron as near as we can figure, when she came home after a Bingo game.”

“That’s all you know?”

“Almost all.” He stared at me. “But one thing else is certain. It wasn’t a tire-iron that chopped off her right leg.”

I have supped full of horrors. That’s how Shakespeare put it, in Macbeth, and I understand exactly what he meant. To put it bluntly, in the weeks that followed I got a belly-full.

To spare you indigestion, I’ll avoid details.

The body of Homer Cary, a record shop clerk, aged thirty, was found in the ravine beside a freeway ramp with a puncture—probably made by an ice-pick—in his neck. Most of him was found, that is, but not his left arm.

Two nights later a retired legal secretary, Miss Irma Sokoloff, died in bed in her suburban home. She’d made the same mistake which cost Mrs. Lamb her life—leaving a window open or unlocked. But the killer made no mistake; he or she left no fingerprints, no clues, and no right hand of the victim.

In the following week three men died—James, Innes and Wade. One was discovered stuffed into the trunk of his own car in the parking-lot behind the building where he worked as an industrial draftsman. He was a big man but his body fitted quite neatly into the trunk, for his own trunk—the pelvic area—had been removed. The actual cause of death was strangulation.

Stab-wounds killed another in the alleyway adjoining his own back yard. Very possibly the same weapon sliced off his left leg just below the kneecap.

The third man died in the dressing-room cubicle of a bath-house, with a towel stuffed down his throat—and without a right arm.

Of course none of this happened in a vacuum. A vacuum is soundless, and now there was noise. Noise from the media, trumpeting lurid details and screaming for a quick solution to the crimes. Noise from politicians demanding “action.” Noise from a hysterical public rushing forth to buy hand-guns, purchase guard-dogs, and installing security measures. Some of them even began to lock their doors and windows.

There was a mounting echo of response from the police and sheriff's department—announcements of special investigation task-forces being mounted, assurances that a massive manhunt was under way, a daily mix of threats and reassurances. But it was all—to quote Shakespeare again—sound and fury, signifying nothing.

Romberg admitted as much to me in private. He visited me regularly, bringing transcripts and descriptions obtained from friends, family-members, co-workers and chance acquaintances of the victims, everything he could lay his hands on. But it wasn't enough, and I told him so.

"What more is there?" he countered. "I've read your notes—all they do is confirm what our own investigations tell us. These people had no enemies, and there's nothing to tie them together in their past histories."

"Then we'll have to go back further," I said. "Get me high-school annuals, medical records, birth-certificates—"

Romberg blew cigarette-smoke in my face. "Waste of time. Most serial killers specialize in one class of society—usually prostitutes or winos. But from the looks of it what we've got here is someone who just kills at random. Cuts them up at random, too. You listen to those shrinks who come up with personality-profiles on the talk-shows? According to them, the killer is a ghoul who eats human flesh."

"Do you believe that?"

"I don't know what to believe anymore. But I'd sure as hell feel better if we could turn up those missing body-parts. And I still can't get a handle on why the MOs are different."

I nodded. "In multiple murders where there is no similarity of method, we must look instead for a similarity of motive."

"Meaning you think this nut is a cannibal?"

"Only one way to find out. Get me that data I asked you for."

He got me the data, but it took time. And during that time three more people died. Names, dates and circumstances aren't important; what mattered to me is that one lost his left arm, one his right arm, one her left leg above the kneecap. I got the records on them too, and while the public outcry rose to new heights I huddled over a miscellany of high-school yearbooks, doctors' and dentists' reports dating back to early childhood, birth records, and parental histories where obtainable. There was no discernible pattern. Were we dealing with a cannibal after all?

Or was it a ghoul?

The next victim was already dead of natural causes when a horrified mortician entered his slumber-parlor on the morning of the funeral to find the coffin open and his professional arrangements profaned. The entire thorax of the deceased was missing.

"It's a ghoul all right!" Romberg muttered. "Can't you come up with anything? The D.A. just got a call from the governor's office—he's crying for blood!"

And blood is what he got. While I reviewed the material on the deceased there was a further crime. This one, however, did not occur in the city or its suburbs. The male victim had been struck down with a blunt instrument while walking his dog at night in Jackson, a town seventy-five miles away. But portions of his abdomen had been slashed away and removed from the scene of the crime.

I write these words with reluctance, though I can understand the reason. Whenever life leaves a body we confront a mystery. What was once a person, perhaps even a loved one, has suddenly been transformed into a thing—a corpse, something strange and hideous which, if it began to move and live again, would inspire nothing but fear and loathing.

This corpse didn't move, but Romberg did. When he slapped the documentation on this victim down on my desk he was shaking with uncontrollable rage.

"Here's your damned data, Professor," he muttered. "But I've had it. I'm sick and tired of digging up all this lousy paperwork for you, fighting with county clerks and making Xerox copies. Shires and a hundred men are out ringing doorbells and tracking leads from every crank call or letter that comes in. They're sweating their butts off while you sit on yours. You haven't even bothered to see the bodies, go to the scene of the crimes, attend the inquests. What makes you think you can find an answer just from reading kindergarten reports?"

"Never mind that," I told him, pawing through the sheaf of papers he'd put before me. "Did you bring the victim's birth-certificate?"

"It's in there somewhere. What difference does it make when he was born?"

"All the difference in the world," I said. "To an astrologer."

"Holy—" Words failed him for a moment and he took another deep drag on his cigarette. "Don't tell me you're into astrology now?"

"Perhaps the killer is."

"What are you driving at?"

"I've gone over everything you brought me again and again, looking for a connection, tracing the lives of the victims right back to birth. And that's the only point where I've been able to find anything in common."

"Sure," he said. "All of them were born." He jammed his cigarette into the ashtray. "But that doesn't tell us why all of them were murdered."

"Perhaps it does." I reached for and found a page of notations. "Just as a matter of routine I jotted down the birth-dates of the victims. Here's the list."

Romberg squinted at it quickly, then shook his head. "So what?"

"Nothing, on the face of it. But just on a hunch I made a second list. This time I put down the astrological sign under which each victim was born. See for yourself."

Reluctantly he inspected the second sheet of paper I handed him, losing the squint as his eyes widened. "You're right. Eleven victims, eleven different signs. But it could be coincidence."

"What if it's not? What if we're dealing with someone with a fixation on astrology, a serial killer out to murder a victim born under each sign of the zodiac?”

“Why? It doesn’t make sense.”

“We’re not dealing with a normal mind here. But there does seem to be a possible pattern.”

“Aren’t there twelve signs in the zodiac?”

“Right.” I rummaged through the Xeroxes he’d brought me. “And we have twelve killings now. If the last victim was born late in December or before the twenty-second of January—”

I located the birth-certificate as I spoke and scanned it eagerly.

“Well?” Romberg murmured.

My own voice faltered as I read aloud. “Date of birth—April first, 1945.”

“April Fool’s Day,” he said. “So much for astrology!”

“Some of these certificates go pretty far back,” I said. “There could be a mistake—”

“The only mistake was bringing you into this case in the first place,” Romberg muttered. “You and your crazy theories.” He turned and headed for the door.

“But—”

“I’ve had it with you. From now on you can go to hell.”

The slam of the door closing behind him was a final punctuation-mark. I sat there with shattered nerves, staring down at the results of my shattered hypothesis.

Romberg was right; it had been coincidence. Two Aries and no Aquarian. And in spite of my suggestion, I knew there weren’t any errors in the birth-certificates; it was too much to hope for. As Romberg said, it didn’t make sense—just because there were twelve victims wasn’t enough to link the crimes to astrology. For all I knew, the maniac responsible for their deaths may have thought he was murdering the Twelve Apostles, or the twelve—

It hit me then.

It hit me, and I acted. No sense trying to get further cooperation from Romberg; he was finished. But I wasn’t.

This time I had to do it all myself, all the legwork, all the ferreting. For the next three days I didn't even see the inside of my office. But on the fourth I had what I wanted, and this time I took it to Shires.

He wasn't exactly easy to get to, and he certainly wasn't delighted to see me.

"Look," he said. "I'm up to my neck here. Like I told you on the phone, you've got five minutes, no more, and unless you've got something this time—"

"I think I have," I told him. "It's the name of the murderer."

His look reminded me of Romberg's, and so did his tone of voice. "And just who might that be?"

My notebook was already out and open.

"His name is Joseph Vestro. Joseph Alacorn Vestro, aged thirty-one; height, five-eight; weight, one-sixty. Black, curly hair, brown eyes, small mustache. Upper left incisor missing. Appendectomy scar, lower abdomen. No other distinguishing body-marks or defects."

"Where did you get all this?"

"Matter of record." I continued to read. "A little over five years ago Joseph Vestro was convicted of armed robbery with intent to do great bodily harm. It could have been a murder charge, but the coroner finally decided the victim had died of a heart attack rather than as a direct result of Vestro battering him with a length of iron pipe.

"As it was, Vestro served five years in state prison. He could have gotten out earlier, but he refused parole. They released him in July, and nothing has been seen or heard of him since then. Presumably he's living on the proceeds from past crimes; he has a long list of involvement in previous strong-arm robberies and suspected assaults, but no convictions."

Shires shook his head. "What's so different about all this? There must be a thousand other guys doing time who have the same kind of record." Sarcasm shaped his smile and lent a sharp edge to his voice. "How did you pick out this one—did you use a crystal ball, or was it astrology?"

"He's a Scorpio, and vindictive," I said. "But no, I wasn't influenced by his horoscope. It's his psychological profile."

Again I consulted my notations. "Preliminary tests established he was sane enough to stand trial, but his personality-pattern indicated violence and aggression. After he started serving his term the prison psychiatrist conducted his own interviews. According to his findings Vestro exhibited both sociopathic and borderline psychopathic traits—paranoid fixations, delusions of persecution, a grandiose self-image, with fantasies of revenge, directed against the prosecutor and the judge presiding at his trial."

"Who sat on the case?"

"Judge Amos B. Kelly," I told him. "But that doesn't matter now. Kelly died of natural causes shortly after the trial."

"What about the prosecutor?"

"Charles Beckford, an assistant D.A.—and he passed away last year."

Shires frowned. "So the threats didn't mean anything."

"That's what the prison authorities must have thought. They didn't realize Vestro would go after the others."

"What others?"

I glanced up from my notebook. "The number twelve has more than astrological significance. It's also the number of persons who make up a jury."

"Are you serious?"

"That's the common denominator I was looking for. When it occurred to me I checked it out. And sure enough, each of the victims had done jury duty. That in itself could be coincidence, but there was nothing coincidental about the fact that all of them served at the same trial—the trial of Joseph Vestro. It was then that I looked up his record—"

"Now wait a minute, Professor! Jurors are picked from local citizens. And the last victim came from out of town—"

"But according to the court file he was a resident here five years ago."

"I still don't see—"

"Then open your eyes. Vestro refused parole for an obvious reason. He meant to carry out his intentions free of supervision. His release came in July, but the first killing didn't occur until October. That's because he needed time to track down the addresses of his victims, learn something about their habits and life-styles, make his plans accordingly. Then, when he was ready, he acted. It all makes sense now."

"Sense isn't proof," Shires murmured.

"And criminology isn't a science," I said. "It's an art."

"Like astrology?"

"Or psychiatry, for that matter. But if I were you—"

"I know what to do," Shires told me.

And he did. He put out an APB on Joseph Vestro.

Unfortunately his description wasn't of much use. There are too many men of approximately the same height and build, too many small mustaches adorning the upper lips of would-be Burt Reynolds look-alikes.

But the real problem wasn't appearance; it was disappearance. Nobody could come up with a last known address for Vestro since his release from prison over four months ago.

"Where's he holed up?" Shires muttered. "He's got to have someplace to live."

Once again art took precedence over science. "You law enforcement people know a great deal about guns, knives, poisons and blunt instruments," I said. "But you seem to pay no attention to the greatest weapon of modern times."

"What's that?"

"The van."

Shires got that disgusted look again, but I ignored it as I spoke.

"It's the van that transports stolen goods, carries drug-caches, shelters criminals who want to avoid detection. But that's not all. Take a look at the sensational cases of the last dozen years or so, the ones involving multiple rapes, tortures and mass murders. Think about how many of these atrocities were committed by psychos driving vans. Vans were used to locate victims, vans picked them up off the street, vans concealed the attacks that killed them, vans carried their bodies to hiding-places.

"Not everyone who owns a van is a vandal. But the percentage of crimes connected with their use tells its own story. People die in vans. And people live in them, too. Loners, like Joseph Vestro. I suggest—"

"Gotcha," Shires said.

But he didn't get Vestro.

The people he contacted—auto dealers and owners of used-car lots—had no record of a van sale, new or second-hand, to anyone answering to the name or description of the wanted man.

"Because he stole the vehicle," I said.

"Could be." Shires' look of disgust seemed permanent now. "Do you know how many stolen vans have been reported here in the last four months?"

"A dozen?"

"Sixty-three." He nodded. "About half have been located and recovered. That leaves over thirty still missing. We've got descriptions, but no leads on where to find them, nothing to tie any particular van to Vestro." He sighed. "Believe me, we gave it our best shot. But there's nowhere to go from here."

"Then don't go anywhere," I said. "Stay put and wait."

"What do you mean, wait? This is an ongoing investigation, I've got a job to do."

"True. But in spite of what you may think, police work isn't a science either. It too is an art. And part of that art consists of waiting."

"For what—inspiration?"

"Information." I leaned forward over the desk. "Give your people everything you can on the vans still unaccounted for and tell them to be patient. And if we're lucky—"

"We'd better be," Shires said.

And we were.

Two nights later, just as I was leaving the office, Shires came racing in.

“We got him!”

“Vestro?”

He nodded, grabbing my arm. “Come on, I want you to see this. Romberg’s waiting for us downstairs in the car.”

Shires hustled me out front and into the back seat of a departmental limo, wedged between Romberg and himself. As we took off, his voice rose over the siren’s wail.

“Two squad men in a black-and-white spotted a guy answering to Vestro’s description coming out of a fast-food place over on South Sixteenth, just as he was climbing into a van in the parking lot. They had a make on it too—a brown ’80, reported missing early in July.

“When they hailed him he panicked—pulled a pistol and opened fire. First shot went through the windshield, damned near hit the driver. His partner got a bead on Vestro before he could shoot again. Blew off the top of his head.”

“Any chance he’s still alive?” I said.

“Not with his brains scattered all over the pavement. You’ll see—”

“I don’t want to see,” I told him. “That’s why I stick to my office. I have a thing about violence.”

“You were in at the beginning,” Shires said. “I figure we owe you a chance to be in on the end.”

“Don’t do me any favors,” I murmured. “Tell the driver to let me out at the corner. I’ll read about it in the papers.”

“Too late,” Shires said. “We’re here.”

We weren’t the only ones. Half a dozen police cars were already on the scene, along with a paramedic ambulance. Crowds had been roped-off but nothing stilled their excited outburst. In the lights flashing over the parking-lot I noted two live-remote TV camera crews swarming around their vans.

Vans. I shrugged, then surrendered to Shires and Romberg as they pressed me forwards towards the other van and what lay before it.

Joseph Vestro was dead, no doubt about it. Enough of his brains had spilled out to fill a teacup. But nobody had a teacup and I closed my eyes quickly to avoid a second look.

It was all I could do to control my stomach, let alone my voice. “Did you have to show me this?” I said.

“There’s something else you ought to see,” Shires answered. “Over here.”

He led me to the rear of the brown van. The back was closed but Shires opened it—not all the way, just enough for me to get a quick look at what was inside; enough to realize Joseph Vestro hadn’t been traveling alone.

There was a figure sitting on the jump-seat, facing out and staring at me. Staring out of dead, bulging eyes set in a dead woman’s rotting head, sewed with catgut to the decaying flesh of a nude male torso. Sutured to the shoulders on either side were the putrescent portions of amputated arms; dangling from them, the almost unrecognizable remnants of unmatched hands. Below the naked waist was a joined jigsaw of pelvis and lower limbs, stitched together to complete a human body—a body composed of the fragments of twelve separate corpses.

I’d put the pieces together, all right, but so had Vestro.

Still, it wasn’t the sight of the fearsome form or even its hideous stench that most appalled me. The worst was the final fleeting glimpse of the cardboard placard wired to the butchered chest—a placard crudely lettered in red crayon to spell out the name of Judge Amos B. Kelly.

The door closed swiftly and mercifully, just as I turned away and threw up on the pavement.

And that’s how criminal cases often end in real life: not with rejoicing but with regurgitation.

Or almost end.

I still had to listen to Shires’ praise as he led me back to the waiting limo. “You were right all along,” he said. “About the loony, about the motive being more important than the method, about the jury and the van and revenge—”

“Like hell he was,” Romberg muttered. “We’d have got the guy anyway, sooner or later. You ask me, this art of criminology is just like astrology—nothing but a bunch of lucky guesses.”

I didn’t pay any attention to him, because I knew Romberg couldn’t help being stubborn.

That’s what you’ve got to expect when you’re dealing with a Taurus.

Warning: Death May Be Injurious to Your Health

When I am dead and buried
It will not matter much
I'll lay there in my coffin
And worms will gnaw my gutch

My face will melt and vanish
To leave a grinning skull
Though what it has to grin at
I'm sure I cannot tull.

I'll have no mailing address
But postmen soon will learn
To bring me anything that's marked:

The Grab Bag

“I have in this bag,” said the little withered man, “a ghost.”

No one spoke. They were waiting for the point of the joke. But the little withered man looked almost ludicrously solemn as he continued, “I do not want this ghost. I wish to sell it. Do I hear ten dollars?”

Somebody handed over a bill. “Thank you,” said the little withered man, and he went away.

Who he was or how he got in, nobody knew. The week-end party was awash in alcohol and when the host floated his idea of holding an impromptu auction it seemed hilarious. All sorts of fantastic things had been offered for sale—from a used toothbrush to a hen discovered in a neighbor’s poultry-coop. Nobody was surprised when Orlin Kyle bought the ghost, for he was the life of the party; a slender chap with cherubic features, much given to gags and practical jokes.

So he bought the ghost, or whatever it might be that the bag really contained. The little withered man had left so hastily and unobtrusively there’d been no opportunity to question him, and it was only later they began to wonder about him and where he’d come from. But nobody wondered much, for the liquor was good, and Kyle was at his facetious best with the bag.

It was a plain burlap sack, bulging but curiously light for all its size. The bulges kept shifting shape, and gave way instantly when squeezed or pressed or prodded through the burlap covering them, so there was no clue as to the bag’s actual contents. Its mouth was tightly knotted with thick rope. Kyle slung the sack over one shoulder and wandered around the house, delivering monologues to everybody willing to listen to him. Thanks to intoxication, many thought his infantile attempts at humor amusing—an opinion in which he thoroughly concurred.

Stumbling into the kitchen he found his host, Johnny Vail, blinking at Mrs. Vail over a table clutter of bottles and glasses.

"Here's Orrie," said Mrs. Vail, a tiny, depressed-looking brunette with sad eyes, now slightly glazed.

"And friend," Kyle added. "Can I interest you in a ghost?"

"Have a drink," Vail said.

"That I will. In fact I'll have two."

"Don't be piggy," said Mrs. Vail, reaching for a bottle and a glass.

"I'm not," Kyle told her, sliding a second glass towards the Scotch bottle as she lifted it to pour. "One's for me and one's for the ghost. Spirits for spirits, you know."

"What's all this about ghosts?" Johnny Vail asked.

"That's right—you two didn't wait for the end of the auction, did you?" Kyle explained what had happened, elaborating as he went along. As his story expanded, Vail and his wife began to inspect the bag with maudlin interest.

"And so," Kyle concluded, "I am now the owner of a real live ghost."

"Or a dead cat." Johnny Vail's snigger was both skeptical and unpleasant.

Kyle ignored him, picking up the first glass from the table and downing it at a gulp. As he reached for the second one and raised it to his lips, Mrs. Vail motioned quickly.

"Stop—I thought that was for your ghost."

"Sorry, my mistake. Have to finish it myself. This ghost never drinks on an empty stomach."

Mrs. Vail giggled as she poured herself a generous three fingers, but her eyes strayed to the sack with a nervous quickness. "Orrie, what is in that bag?"

"Let's see." Johnny Vail bent down and lifted the sack gingerly. "Not very heavy, is it?"

“Ghosts don’t weigh very much,” Kyle said.

Vail ran his right hand along the bulge at the burlap’s base. “But there’s something inside. Something feels—mushy.”

“Like amorous, you mean?” Fran Vail giggled again. “Give it here, Johnny.”

Vail tossed the bag to her.

She dropped her glass and it shattered on the floor as she caught the sack.

Nobody paid any attention to the mishap.

Fran Vail palpated the side of the sack with a probing forefinger. “You’re right, Johnny. I can feel something in here.” Her mouth lopsided into a smile and she began to stroke the bulge beneath the cloth. “Nice ghost,” she crooned. “Nice—”

Kyle shook his head. “Not at all nice,” he whispered. “It’s shut up in the bag for a reason. Maybe it has claws. Or teeth.”

Johnny Vail snorted. “Then why doesn’t it eat its way out of the sack?”

“Doesn’t like the taste of burlap,” Kyle said, pouring another drink. Glancing up, he gestured. “Wait, Fran—don’t stir it up!”

“Why not?” She was fumbling with the rope that bound the mouth. “Stop clowning, Orrie. Le’s see what you’ve really got inside—”

Suddenly Fran Vail broke off with a little shuddering cry and thrust the unopened sack from her. The bag landed soundlessly on the floor and lay there, bulging mysteriously.

“No,” she said. “I—I—” Her voice trailed off, but she forced a grin. “Orrie, there is something alive in there.”

“Sure,” Kyle told her. “Dead-alive. Ghost.”

Mrs. Vail turned and went to the door. There was a wobble in her walk and a hint of fright in her eyes as she paused in the doorway to glance back at the bag. “Drunker than I thought,” she murmured. “Much.”

She went into the hall, fingers straying absently about her lips.

Johnny Vail scowled at Kyle. “What the hell’s the big idea?” he said. “You scared her. You really scared her.”

“Not me.” Kyle pointed to the bag. “It.”

Vail's fingers fisted. "Look, Orrie, I've had just about enough—"

"Well, have anoth'r and calm down." Kyle picked up the sack and headed for the doorway.

Johnny Vail's voice followed him. "Hey, where you think you're going?"

"After Fran. Got to apologize to her, right?"

"Right." Kyle's host relaxed, waving him on, and he gripped the neck of the sack tightly as he moved along the hall.

He found Mrs. Vail in the parlor, sitting on a couch with two guests. All three had their backs to the hall doorway, but Kyle recognized Fran Vail's companions from an earlier meeting. Pete and Eileen Clement, a young married couple, didn't seem as if they belonged with this crowd. The young man, Kyle remembered, had been one of those polite, look-down-your-nose types. His wife had possibilities, though—a fluffy little thing with big round eyes—

Kyle crept up behind the sofa where they sat and abruptly thrust the bag before Mrs. Vail's startled face. The result surpassed his expectations. She actually looked as though she were going to faint. Jumping up with a cry she pushed the bag aside and moved shakily away. Kyle forestalled her.

Chuckling, he maneuvered the woman into a corner, swinging the sack back and forth for the benefit of the Clements. He noted Pete Clement's eyes narrowing, but Eileen Clement's were widening. Getting her attention was what he wanted. As for Mrs. Vail, he had her attention already, whether he wanted it or not, the stupid cow.

"Don't, Orrie," she said in a strained voice. "Please—"

"Boo! Ghost wants to see you."

"Orrie—I can't—"

"Boo! You wanna see the ghost?"

"No—stop it—please, Orrie—"

"Cut that out," said Pete Clement, getting up from the couch. "It isn't funny!" He was a slim youngster, and Kyle was encouraged to ignore him until Clement gripped his shoulder and pulled him around.

Kyle dropped the bag and hit Clement in the mouth. The boy staggered back, knocking into Johnny Vail as he entered.

Mrs. Vail seized the opportunity to escape. Kyle started after her, and when Johnny Vail blocked his path, Kyle made the mistake of trying to hit him too.

The result was that Orlin Kyle went over backwards, taking a floor lamp with him, and hit his head hard enough to knock him unconscious.

He woke up to find a blonde girl sitting beside him on the floor. She was holding glasses and a bottle of brandy.

Grunting, he raised himself on one elbow, noting that the dim room was otherwise deserted. Staring at the girl, he rubbed his aching skull.

"Fool," said the blonde. "Here, have a drink. You need it."

The girl was Sandra Owen, Kyle's fiancee. She gave him a glass, poured him a shot, and tilted the bottle to her own lips. They drank together.

"How long've I been out?" he asked.

"Don't know. Someone just told me—"

"Where were you all this time?"

"Around." She forestalled further questioning with a thrust of the bottle. "Have another. Good for the liver."

"Didn't hit me in the liver."

"You should know better than to mess around with Johnny," she said. "He's a creep."

"Wouldn't he go for you?"

Sandra shook her head and pointed to the sack on the floor beside them. "Is that the grab bag I've been hearing so much about?"

"Yeah." Kyle was experimenting with his jaw.

"Where'd you get it."

"Auction." He frowned suddenly. "Damn it, Sandra, where'd you disappear to when it started? I want to know—"

She shook her head. "Answer me first. Who sold you this bag?"

"I don't know. Some old guy, just wandered in. Nobody ever saw him before."

“Fran Vail says you told everyone he was a wizard.”

“Well, she believes it. Claims she’s psychic. That’s why she’s so afraid of what’s in the sack.”

“Bombed out of her skull, that’s what she is,” Kyle said. “There’s nothing in the sack.”

“Have you looked?”

Kyle shook his head. His fingertips were getting numb, so he took another drink.

“Let me see,” Sandra said.

“Not yet.”

“Why? It doesn’t mean anything now. Your gag’s a flop.”

Or was it? Kyle scowled. He hadn’t gone to all this trouble just to get a punch in the jaw. And his gags weren’t supposed to end up with the laugh on him. There had to be a way to turn the tables. Maybe his fingertips were numb but there was nothing wrong with his brain.

“Look, Sandra,” he said. “I have an idea.”

Lowering his voice, he told her what had come to him and she listened without comment.

“You’ll do it?” Kyle asked.

Sandra nodded. “I’ve got nothing against her, but Johnny is—” She broke off, avoiding his gaze.

Kyle, knowing her, felt suspicion rise in him, but shrugged it away. There was nothing he could do about Sandra’s philandering. This girl with the face of a lascivious Mona Lisa was the only thing on earth he loved, and probably the only thing she loved too.

They sat on the floor until they finished the rest of the bottle. By then it was very late and the house was quiet; the guests had settled down for the night in the upstairs bedrooms.

Kyle and Sandra stumbled up the stairs, then separated to tap discreetly on various doors, whisper to occupants of the rooms behind them. If the taps were sometimes a bit awkward and the whispers a bit slurred, neither of them noticed. They were feeling no pain.

Sandra managed to pull herself together as she lurched down to the end of the hall and knocked on Vail's door.

After a while he opened it, rubbing his eyes.

"What is it?" he murmured.

"Orrie. I think he's sick."

"Oh, Orrie." Vail shook his head. "He's just tight."

"No. He's really sick, Johnny. You'll see."

Vail donned a robe and a frown as he followed her down the darkened hallway. The door to her room was ajar and Sandra motioned him in. Then she swiftly pulled the panel shut and locked him in. She moved to a door further along the corridor without waiting to hear Vail's reaction. It was loud and profane, as he realized the trick played upon him.

As Sandra neared the door further down, it opened and Kyle stepped out, the sack dangling from his hand.

"All set?"

"Yeah. Did you lock the Clements in?"

He nodded. "Sure. Now let's get the others out."

It wasn't difficult; not with Johnny Vail pounding on the door at one end of the hall and someone else—probably Pete Clement—hammering away at the other. In a very short time everyone had gathered waiting before the Vails' bedroom, grinning in various stages of intoxication and anticipation. Muffled pounding echoed along the hall behind them.

"Hurry up," Sandra whispered.

Kyle nodded, and opened the door gently. His free hand found the wall switch. Soft light bathed the room.

Mrs. Vail, bundled under blankets in the twin bed on the far side, had apparently slept through the commotion. Now, startled by the light, she blinked and rolled over on her back.

"The perfect hostess," Sandra said. Behind her, guests were murmuring as they started to crowd into the room. As they watched, Kyle came forward, tiptoeing up to the bedside.

Suddenly he produced the sack from behind his back.

Fran Vail gave a little shriek, but it was drowned in the general laughter.

“We have here,” Kyle said, warming to the response of his audience, “a magnificent specimen of ghost. It tells me it wants to see you. Do you want to see it?”

“Orrie,” Mrs. Vail whispered. “Stop this, please. Where’s Johnny?”

Distant shouting betrayed his whereabouts without any need for Kyle to answer. Instead he swung the bag before her. “Sorry to intrude on your privacy.” He gave the word its British pronunciation, which for some reason people tend to find very amusing, particularly if they’re hearing it while drunk. “But we talked things over, all of us, and decided the time has come.”

“Time? What time?”

“The witching hour. Time to release the ghost.”

Kyle’s smile and fake accent broadened. “As our hostess, you must do the honors.” Suddenly raising the bulging bag, he pushed it forward almost into her face. “Let it out, dear lady,” he chuckled. “Let it out.”

Fran Vail wasn’t chuckling. She began to scream. For a moment her arms flailed in an attempt to brush the sack aside. Then, all at once, she fell back against the pillows and went quite limp. As her eyes rolled upward somebody said, “Cut it out, Orrie. Look what you’ve done to her.” Others were crowding up to the bed now, remorseful, muttering and chattering as they tried to restore Fran Vail to consciousness. Kyle was pushed aside. He looked around for the sack. Sandra had retrieved it and now she was sitting on the floor in the corner, fumbling with the knotted ropes.

“Hey,” he said. “Don’t do that.”

She stared up at him as though it was difficult for her eyes to find a focus. “Oh, knock it off. You had your fun,” she murmured. “Besides, you promised I could if I helped you.” Kyle took a step forward and she gestured, eyes slitting. “Get away—don’t try t’ stop me, hear? Always hogging the limelight—you'n your damn' ghost—" Her fingers scrabbled at the knots. "My turn now—"

Kyle glanced at the group around Mrs. Vail, then hurriedly straightened his shoulders, raised his voice, and called out, "Ladies and gentlemen! Your attention, please!"

Heads turned. Mrs. Vail's eyelids fluttered.

"I present to you the marvel of the age," Kyle said. "Since our hostess is —indisposed—Sandra will now let out the ghost. Invis'ble, impalpable, purch'sed at great expense from a wizard who dared not keep it—I give you the ghost!"

He turned with a wave of his arm, disclosing Sandra as she squatted over the sack. It seemed quite a task, undoing the tangle of knots, and she leaned forward in grim concentration. Quite abruptly the ropes gave way, and as the sack gaped open she lost her balance momentarily, falling forward with a little giggle as her head was enveloped by the burlap folds.

The others echoed ripples of amusement and Kyle laughed too. It was funny, Sandra crouching on her knees with her head tangled in the opening.

But when she swayed and fell sideways it wasn't funny. "Passed out," someone muttered. Kyle bent and pulled the sack free from Sandra's head and shoulders. As he did so he glanced within and saw that it was indeed quite empty. He stood for a moment, looking down into the incredible black emptiness of the grab bag.

Through an alcoholic haze came the cries. His gaze penetrated that same haze, shifting to Sandra. What he saw was a gnawed and tattered crimson horror through which a single glazed eye stared up blindly. Something had eaten Sandra's face.

The Bedposts of Life

Some horrors never end.

He hated what he was doing, but he couldn't help it.

None of them could help it, because their need was too great. The great need for great sex.

Well, they wouldn't find it here. Most of them knew this in advance but still they came, night after night, cruising the street in slow-moving silence more appropriate to a funeral procession than a journey of joy. It was, perhaps, fitting that they should do so, for virtually all those who gathered here mourned the loss of love.

Some had never even known it: the very young, the shy, the awkward and unattractive victims of low self-esteem. But their need was as compelling, perhaps more so than that of the others. When you're hungry the body doesn't demand delicacies; it settles for junk-food. Young appetites value quantity over quality, and the quantity was here. Great sex? At this stage in their lives any sex at all was great, just so there was enough of it available.

When you're old, availability becomes a problem once again. Dirty old men get hungry too. Just because you lose your teeth doesn't mean you lose your appetite. If gourmet fare is harder to come by, there's plenty of take-outs for midnight snacks. The street is a convenience-store.

He strolled along, scanning faces crouched over steering-wheels. Along with the generation-gap's extremes were men in their prime, drivers who were themselves driven by impulse impossible to control.

For amusement he made a little game of relating cars to their occupants. The lonesome Audi, stranger in town. Slinky-styled old Bugatti on the prowl for young meat. That dented white Ford wagon conjured up the image of a harried, housebroken middle-aging husband whose spouse selected the vehicle as a convenience for hauling kids. He'd borrowed it to come here in temporary escape from the bonds of unholy matrimony.

Bonds. Bondage. That van with the drawn window-curtains—did they conceal contents, cords and cuffs and chains so dearly beloved in sado-masochistic union? One could never be sure, it was all guesswork, really. That old Chevy truck spewing exhaust might have a driver wearing pantyhose under his jeans. This Mercedes might be owned by a substantial stockbroker, or some swinging substance-abuser. And driving a Porsche doesn't guarantee your potency. Wherefore art thou, Alfa-Romeo?

He shrugged the thought aside. It was time to stop searching the street and turn his attention to the sidewalk.

That's where the women waited: the hookers, the hustlers, the broads and the bimbos.

The women were like cars, in a way. Big or small, wide-bodied or compact, flashy models with fresh paint-jobs, old pickups beyond repair. None were brand-new, but when you're looking for a used car you've got to expect some mileage on it. In a case like this you weren't even buying, just picking a rental. And design wasn't as important as locating a comfortable, trouble-free ride.

Never mind the colors, either. He noted a little yellow one, probably a Japanese import, but there was a wide selection in white, black or brown. No sticker-prices, all that was a matter of bargaining, so he might as well be guided by the mood of the moment and indulge his whim.

Just what was his whim in women this evening?

How about that brassy blonde in the miniskirt riding up almost to her thighs? He watched as she strutted along the edge of the walk near the curb, eyeing the drivers and giving them an eyeful. Not his type, he decided. Not tonight, Josephine.

Hadn't heard anyone say that in years. Not tonight, Josephine. Now there was an oldie for you. A golden oldie, like the blonde, whose ravaged countenance was clearly and cruelly revealed as she came closer.

He avoided her glance, fixing his attention on the dark-haired girl who stood under a doorway, half in shadow, like a Rembrandt portrait. But there the resemblance ended. When she moved forward into the street he saw what shadow had partially concealed; the body of a woman, the face of a child, the eyes of a whore.

He hurried past her, then shrugged as he continued at a slower pace, reminding himself again that variations in age, build or complexion were unimportant. One size fits all. What difference did it make which woman he chose?

The answer stood on the corner, under the stoplight.

The light was orange. The smooth bare skin of her arms and shoulders was orange too.

The light was red. Her helmet of hair was red too.

The light was green. Under their long lashes, the eyes that stared at him were green.

Colorful. Changeable. And all illusion. Still, it added an element of diversion which might make things just a trifle easier. He didn't like what he was going to do, but that couldn't be helped. And after all, she was only a whore.

So the time had come to make his move. To walk slow and easy, talk slow and easy. Big smile now, that's the trick.

"Good evening," he said.

When the trick said hello she knew he was the one. She didn't like what she was going to do, but a girl has to eat. And after all, he was only a John.

Not a bad-looking one, either, she decided. Tall, dark and handsome, like they used to say in those late-night reruns of old movies. Regular movies, that is, not like the kind you got in motels. God, how many of those lousy porno flicks had she sat through? And why did so many Johns need them to turn on with? No wonder they had problems making it with the wife or girlfriend. But hey, don't knock it, if they didn't have problems she'd be out of business. And right now she needed business, needed it bad because of the way things had been going lately. But to Hell with lately, this is now. No yesterday, no tomorrow.

She flashed on all this while she was talking to the John, fast-talking, sweet-talking, double-talking, the same line she always handed out upfront to stall for time.

Thing is, you needed time to size up a trick before the deal went down. Maybe in the old days it was easier to go by appearances, like the kind of clothes a John wore. But now everybody tried to look like a slob, so you had to check out details; kind of shoes he had on, did he wear a drugstore watch or a good one, was there dirt under his nails?

Sometimes you could get a fix on the kind of car they drove, but a lot of creeps switched to some old junker when they had to purge the urge. Old cars and old clothes helped them poormouth you over the price, so it was up to you to spot phonies. Because the price was same as always—whatever the traffic would bear. Only this John didn't come with the traffic, not unless he was one of the real smartasses who parked down a side street and walked the rest of the way. Or maybe he'd come out of some motel around here, except he didn't look like the type who'd be staying in these roach-ranches. No tie, but wool dress slacks and a dark jacket; shirt underneath longsleeved, because the cuffs showed. Leather shoes, too, oxfords instead of those plastic slip-ons.

Everything added up—added up to maybe twenty, thirty dollars more than regular, plus a kickback from the motel if he didn't have a flop of his own. She didn't have a main man to look out for her now, so she'd damn well better look out for herself. Don’t go off the turf with a trick, don’t cab to his pad. Keep cool, fool.

No problem. Turned out all he wanted was great sex, nothing kinky, no side-order of fries. The price she set didn’t seem to bother him and yes, he’d pay upfront, soon as they registered. He left it to her to pick out a place, which is why the two of them ended up in that neat suite at the C’mon Inn.

The open closet space had four of those goddam hangers that don’t come off the rack, the curtains smelled of stale smoke, and the bed-lamp was broken, but no problem.

And no problem with the money. All in twenties, she noticed, it came out of a fancy billfold with a zipper. Initials stamped on in gold lettering but she couldn’t make them out because the bulb in the corner floor-lamp was too dim. And when he turned it off the only light came from outside the window where the neon sign flickered on and off. Off was black, on was blue, black and blue, jerk better not try beating on her, no S&M, just straight, right?

But he didn’t get out of line, just waited as she peeled her things off and stood beside the bed, first a black blur, then a bright blue body with burnished blue hair, blazing blue eyes.

He glanced up at her as he shed his clothes. “Blue angel,” he said.

“What?”

“The Blue Angel.” He pulled her down beside him. “Old movie. Saw it in Germany when it first came out. Before your time.”

She ran her eyes and hands over his lean, muscular frame. “Don’t con me. You aren’t all that old.”

“And you’re not that much of an angel. Appearances can be deceptive.” He chuckled as if what he’d just said was funny, but it wasn’t.

A frown creased her forehead and she creased it out quickly. But she might have known what to expect; these neat dressers were always the ones, talk your ear off if you let them. Okay, so she got paid to let them, only she didn’t have to like it. If it’s talk they wanted, why not spend their dough on phone-calls. Talk is for singles-bars. Way we do business here, buddy, is get it up, get it over with, and get out. That's how she liked it.

Only she didn't like it. And she hated him, hated all of them, talk or no talk. If it wasn't for one of them she wouldn't be here, but too late to worry about that now, all she could do was hate the whole stinking dirty lot—

"What are you thinking about?" he said.

"Nothing."

He smiled. "Man's question. Woman's answer."

Now he bent forward, searching her face, and his smile faded. Outside the window the neon eye blinked at them, its light sweeping over the moon of flesh suspended above her, searching minute craters and crevasses. Maybe he was older than she'd figured.

That part didn't bother her, but she was starting to feel a little edgy about the way he looked when he wasn't smiling. Those eyes of his were something else—every time the neon switched on he was staring at her, staring into her, deep, as if he could read her mind.

"Don't worry," she told him. "I'm okay."

"No you're not." His smile came back, but it was different now, like his voice; it belonged in the dark, not the flashing blue light. "You wish you weren't here, don't you?"

He was reading her mind! She couldn't find a smile for him now, and it was hard to even manage a voice. "I'm okay, I tell you."

"Don't he to me," he said. "And I won't he to you." He was staring, staring right through her. "If it's any consolation, I don't want to be here either. But at the moment, there's little choice." His voice deepened, and so did the blue flame in his eyes. "Like everyone else, my dear, there are times when our need takes us prisoner. We are all tied to the bedposts of life."

She felt his hatred then, just as he must feel hers, and it was in hatred now that they moved through the mimicry of love. It seemed to her that the light flashed on and off at a faster tempo in unison with their own.

There was no smile looming above her now and no frown, just the feral savagery of flaring nostrils and bared teeth as he rasped in rut. She closed her eyes to shut out the sight but she couldn’t shield herself from sensation, and when he merged pain with pleasure her eyes went wide for a moment, then clamped shut as her head fell back into darkness unbroken by fitful neon glare.

How long she lay there she didn’t know, but when at last her eyes opened again and awareness came, he was gone.

No trace of pleasure remained, but with the coming of awareness, pain returned. Involuntarily her fingers rose to graze across her throat and came away stained with a trickle of bluish ooze in the momentary flicker of light.

Blood. That’s what it was. The old John had bitten her in the neck. And now she remembered when it had happened, when she felt the pain and opened her eyes and the blue light winked on and she stared up over his shoulder at the dressing-table on the far side of the room to see herself as she lay there on the bed. Lay there alone, because he cast no reflection in the mirror.

She’d blacked out from shock then, but at the recollection she started to laugh and couldn’t stop; it felt as though she’d never stop until she was dead. Only now she would never die, any more than he could. And both of them would share their pain forever.

He, of course, was a vampire.

And she had AIDS.

The Creative Urge

The typing started.

"What are we doing here?" she murmured.

"Shouldn't we have thought about that before?" he asked.

"When do you mean?"

"Like back on page twenty-seven."

"You must be kidding! We had other things to do there," she said.

"Look, we don't have to do anything we don't want to."

"Oh really? We've no say-so in the matter!"

"One of those." He sighed. "Then you believe there's some kind of Author writing this whole thing?"

She nodded. "Of course. Somebody had to create us, didn't He?"

"How do you know it's a He? Or even a She, for that matter? If there is such a thing as an Author, what makes you so certain we're created in the same image?"

"Because the Author understands us. He knows our thoughts, our feelings—"

"But they're our thoughts, our feelings. And if the Author does write about us, that doesn't mean He or She cares what happens. Or even knows what's going to happen."

She frowned. "You're saying there's no plot, He just makes it up as He goes along?"

"Why not? When you come right down to it, what are we? Just a combination of keyboard letters imprinted on paper."

"But there's a pattern to what we do! And if there's a pattern, there must be a purpose behind it."

"Not necessarily. For all we know, we're merely the result of random selection, individual alphabet-groupings which have no reason for being except the whim of the Author."

"Whim?" Her frown deepened. "What about moral responsibility for our welfare?"

"His responsibility ends with the act of creation."

"It's destruction I'm afraid of."

His eyes narrowed. "Then watch what you're saying. Remember, Authors are jealous, suspicious, insecure. They need constant encouragement from editors, flattering blurbs and reviews, praise from readers."

"They?" Her voice faltered. "You actually believe there can be more than one?"

"Thousands of them, each with a devoted following." He spoke slowly. "But of course belief in an Author, even worship, doesn't prove anything. For all we know, maybe there is no Author at all. Typed or computerized, we're still just the products of a mechanical process, and perhaps it's the machine itself that created us."

"Someone must operate the machine."

"Suppose it operates automatically?"

"Then where does the power come from?"

"Electrical energy." He shrugged. "Does it matter?"

"It does to me." She hesitated. "And there is an Author. I know, because I've heard Him."

"Heard?"

"I'm sure of it. Sometimes when I'm lying here on the page, waiting for what's going to happen next, I become aware of a voice that seems to come from high above, past the light. I don't understand the message but I'm positive I’ve heard it speak my name. I get a feeling the Author might be talking to Himself, debating what’s right for me to do.”

“Why should He be concerned about you? What’s right for Him is all that counts.”

“I’m talking about Good and Evil.”

“And in capital letters, too!” He chuckled derisively. “Don’t you understand? The only thing the Author cares about is what makes the story work. Work for Him, not His characters. Which means we can be rewarded without reason, punished without reason—at least no reason we might comprehend. Because there is no such thing as Good, no such thing as Evil.”

“I can’t go along with that. The Author is Good!”

“How do you know? Just because you think you heard a voice speaking your name?”

“I did hear Him.”

“But you’ve never seen Him.”

“Nobody has. He lives on another plane, and we poor two-dimensional beings can’t hope to—”

He scowled. “Why did you stop?”

“I don’t know. I get a feeling that the Author doesn’t want us to talk about such things.”

“You mean, wondering if He’s Good or Evil?” He shook his head. “If the Author is Good then He’d have no reason to hide Himself from us. But if He were Evil—”

She glanced up. “Now you stopped in the middle of a sentence.”

“Not of my own accord. Maybe He thought there was too much dialogue.” He lowered his voice to a whisper. “No, you’re right. He doesn’t want us to talk about Him.”

“Then let’s stop.” She forced a smile. “What use is there in arguing about whether the Author is Good or Evil?”

He shrugged. “None. Even if you’re right, we’d still have to see Him in order to know.”

"But we can't see Him."

"There you go with that old two-dimensional theory again! Everybody accepts it without question, so nobody tries to get around it. I have a feeling that if we really wanted to, perhaps we could see the Author. We know He's up there, and you believe you've even heard His voice. I say that if we have the courage to lift our eyes from the page, perhaps we could find His face. If there is an Author."

"I say there is, and He is Good."

"Then let's find out once and for all. No more taking things on faith. We'll see for ourselves. Look up, if you dare."

She blinked. "The light is so bright. Like staring into the sun—"

"Look past it. Above, into the distance." He was staring upwards too.

"See! There is something. Way, way beyond."

"Clouds?"

"Not clouds. Hands. Hands with curling fingers. Moving up and down, up and down. And above them, even higher—a face. Hard to make it out, but there's something familiar—"

"Yes, I see it too." She nodded, then gasped. "Now I recognize Him! He's—"

Just in time.

Just in time the typing stopped. The pages, shredded into a thousand pieces, were crumpled into a globular mass and tossed away.

Then, seating himself once again, the Devil began to create yet another world.

The Legacy

Robert Bloch (1917—) has also been a prolific contributor to TV horror anthologies from Alfred Hitchcock Presents in the Sixties by way of Thriller, Journey to the Unknown, Night Gallery, Darkroom, Tales from the Darkside and the most recent, Monsters, which premiered on Cable TV in 1988. His name, though, is inextricably linked with that of Hitchcock, for it was after buying the rights to Bob's novel, Psycho (1959), and producing the classic shock film which ensured them both a place in cinema history, that Hitch offered the Chicago-born writer a chance to work on his television series. The invitation opened the doors of Hollywood to Bloch, who had actually begun his writing career some years earlier in the late Thirties by emulating the bizarre stories of H.P. Lovecraft–with whom he had corresponded–in the pages of the pulp magazine Weird Tales. This film break lead to a constant stream of TV and work and there has been many a television episode in the last quarter of a century which has been enlivened by his black humour and devilish imagination.

Monsters*–a concept not unlike that devised by Nigel Kneale with* Beasts*–was co-produced by Richard P. Rubinstein and Mitchel Gatlin, and aimed to offer viewers a new and different creature each week. 'Our defininon of creature is pretty broad,' Rubinstein explained when the series began, 'and the stories will range from arch comedy to the Gothic. They'll be scary, too, like those in* Tales from the Darkside.' Among the writers featured in the series of half-hour episodes have been Stephen King, Manly Wade Wellman, William Nolan and, of course, Robert Bloch. Amongst Bob's contributions that have already been screened are 'Everybody Needs a Little Love', 'A

Case of the Stubborns', 'Mannikins of Horror' and 'The Legacy'. This last story, which Mitchel Gatlin directed with Eddie Bracken and Matthew Engell, has a special place in Bob's affections because his life-long interest in horror stemmed from a visit as a child to the cinema where he saw the 1925 Lon Chaney version of The Phantom of the Opera. He was, he recalls, terrified and fascinated by the face that glowered at him from the screen. The story of 'The Legacy', upon which the episode in Monsters was based, contains more than a little of that same terror and fascination to which he owes a lifetime of creativity in films and on television. It also, I believe, offers a gripping finale to this collection. So, Goodnight . . . sleep well!

NOBODY thought Dale was crazy until the trouble started.

True, he'd been a film buff ever since he was a kid, the way other youngsters sometimes get hung-up on baseball, football, or even chess. If they follow their hobby into adult life such interests can become an obsession, yet no one thinks it's a sign of insanity.

In Dale's case his studies led him into teaching a course on film history at the university, which seemed sensible enough. Certainly he appeared to be normal; he wasn't one of those wimpy professors seen in comedy films aimed at the junk-food generation.

Actually Dale was rather attractive. Debbie Curzon thought so. She was a newscaster on local radio where she met and interviewed many of the stud celebrities in sports or films; Dale must have had some charisma for her to choose him as a lover.

The two of them might have ended up together on a permanent basis if Dale hadn't leased the Chaney house.

That's what the realtor called it–'the Chaney house'–although Dale couldn't verify the claim and the ancient escrow was clouded. The place was really just a small cottage halfway up Nichols Canyon in the Hollywood hills. Huddled amidst a tangle of trees and underbrush on a dirt side-road which turned to quicksand during the rainy season, the weatherbeaten frame dwelling offered no exterior charm or interior comfort. Debbie's reluctance to share it was understandable, but once he found it Dale couldn't wait to move in.

'All right, do as you please,' Debbie told him. 'If that dump is more important to you than sharing a brand-new condo with me -'

'It's not just a dump,' Dale protested. 'This is the Chaney house. Can't you understand?'

'Frankly, no. What makes you want to hole up in a place like this just because some dumb actor may or may not have hung out here sixty years ago?'

'Lon Chaney wasn't dumb,' Dale said. 'He happens to be one of the finest performers in silent films, perhaps the greatest of them all.'

'Who cares?' Debbie's voice honed to a cutting-edge. 'I just hope your wonderful Mr Chaney knows how to cook and is good in bed, because from now on you'll be living with him, not me.'

It was open warfare, but Dale found no weapon to pierce the armour of feminine logic. In the end Debbie told him to bug off, and he had no choice but to obey the entomological injunction.

A week later Dale moved into the Chaney house and by then everybody thought he'd flipped out. Turning down a renewal of his teaching contract now at the end of the fall semester meant losing his chance at tenure, and that certainly was a crazy decision, because he gave no reason for leaving.

But Dale knew exactly what he was going to do. He would vindicate himself in the eyes of Debbie and the academic world by writing a Hollywood history of his own—a definitive work which would answer the questions which lurked behind the legends. Who killed William Desmond Taylor, and why? Did Thomas Ince meet his death because of illness or was it murder? What really kept Garbo from returning to the screen? Had there been cover-ups in the case of Thelma Todd or Marilyn Monroe? So much had been surmised, so little verified. And for a starter, he meant to solve the Chaney mystery.

Of all the stars of silent films, Lon Chaney was by far the most mysterious. There were books on his films but no full-length biographies except for a reporter's inaccurate magazine series following Chaney's untimely death from cancer in 1930. Chaney's first wife died without breaking silence and his second left no memoir. His son Creighton, who later changed his name to Lon Chaney, Jr., was estranged from his father for many years and avoided painful memories. To this day Chaney's private life remains an enigma. 'Between pictures,' he told reporters, 'there is no Lon Chaney.'

The coincidence of moving into one of the actor's former residences challenged Dale. Come what may, he meant to learn Lon Chaney's secret.

But first there were more practical questions to deal with. Once furniture arrived and utilities were installed, he had to renovate his surroundings. The cottage had been unoccupied for many years—no wonder the realtor offered him such a bargain rental–and it was time for a thorough housecleaning.

So Dale called an agency and secured the services of a Hispanic lady named Juanita. She was short, plump, but surprisingly strong; perched on a rickety ladder she scrubbed away at the ceiling and side-walls, then descended to attack the floors with mop and brush. And on the second day she made her discovery.

Finishing up her work, she cleared out old boxes and empty cartons from the bedroom closet. The last carton, wedged in back under a jumble of debris, was not entirely empty.

'Look what I find,' Juanita said, holding up her trophy for Dale's inspection.

He took the tin box from her, hefting it with both hands. Then he lifted the lid and his eyes widened.

'What is it?' Juanita asked.

The box was empty but its interior was divided into a number of small compartments lined with smudged cloth. And the underside of the lid was covered by a mirror.

'Some kind of a kit,' Dale said.

It was hard to keep his voice from quavering, hard to conceal rising excitement as he paid and dismissed Juanita. When she left, Dale picked up the box again and now his hands were trembling. His hands, holding Lon Chaney's makeup kit.

Dale had seen publicity stills of Chaney displaying a different and much larger kit with side-trays, so this obviously wasn't the only one. What made it unique was that this box was here, in Chaney's secret hideaway.

Or was it?

Dale forced himself to face facts. In spite of the realtor's claim, he couldn't be certain that Lon Chaney ever lived here. For all he knew, the kit might have belonged to any one of a thousand actors residing in these hills when Hollywood was young.

What Dale needed was proof. And staring at the bottom of the box, he found it.

Wedged against the base was a coil of paper, a small square scrap which must have peeled off after being pasted below the mirror. Dale picked it up, smoothed it out, then read aloud the lettering typed across its surface.

'Property of Leonidas Chaney.'

Leonidas!

This was proof and no mistake. While the general public knew the actor as Lon and most filmographies listed his first name as Alonzo, Dale was one of the few aware that the star's birth-certificate identified him as Leonidas.

Chaney, born on April Fool's Day, had fooled his public. And considering his passion for privacy it seemed odd he'd put his real name here. But perhaps he'd fixed on his deception later in his career. Dale's inspection told him that this battered box was old, perhaps dating back to pre-Hollywood days when Chaney was a struggling actor in travelling shows. Could this actually be his very first makeup kit?

One thing seemed certain–Chaney had lived here. But when?

Dale pondered the question as he sat in gathering darkness alone, with the makeup kit on the table before him.

From what little he knew, Chaney's homes were modest by Hollywood standards, even after he attained stardom, but he would never have settled his family here. Which left only one other plausible answer.

Suppose this place was really a hideaway, a place his family didn't know about, a place he came to secretly and alone? According to publicity he did have a cabin up in the mountains where he went fishing between films. Could it be that he actually spent some of that time here, perhaps even without his wife's knowledge?

And if so, why? Dale quickly dismissed the notion of a secret lovelife; Chaney was never a womanizer, and even had he been, this was hardly the setting for a romantic rendezvous. Nor was he a closet alcoholic or drug-addict. In any case there'd be no reason for him to keep a makeup kit hidden here.

Dale leaned forward, peering at the box through the twilight shadows which fell across its murky mirror.

But the mirror wasn't murky now. As he stared, something in the mirror stared back.

For a moment Dale thought it was his own face, distorted by a flash of fading sunlight amidst the coming of the dark. Even so, he realized that what he saw was not a reflection. There was another face, a face in the mirror, a ghastly white face with painted features that glowed and grinned.

With a shock he realized what it was–the face of a clown. And before Dale's widened eyes the face was melting, changing, so that now a second clown loomed leering out at him–cheeks spotted with paint and tufts of hair suddenly sprouting above a bony brow.

Dale turned, seeking a glimpse of someone else, some intruder who must have stolen silently into the bedroom to stare over his shoulder.

But save for himself the room was empty. And when his eyes sought the mirror again the face—or faces—had vanished. All he saw now was his own face reflected in the glass, its features fading in the dark.

Dale rose, stumbling across the room to switch on the overhead light. In its welcome glare he saw the makeup box and the perfectly ordinary mirror mounted within.

The clown-images were gone. They had existed only in his imagination–or was it his memory? For there had been two clowns in Chaney's life.

Hastily Dale sought his bookshelves, fumbling and finding the volume containing Lon Chaney's filmography. He riffled through it until a page fell open upon a photograph of the actor in the title role of He Who Gets Slapped. And now it was Dale who felt the slap of recognition. The picture showed the face of the first clown he'd seen in the mirror.

Turning pages, he located the still photo of another clown with daubed cheeks and patches of hair clumped on the bone-white skull. Chaney again, in Laugh, Clown, Laugh.

But there was no mirth in the painted face, and none in Dale's as he banged the book shut and left the room. Left the room, left the cottage, left the canyon to drive down to the shelter and sanity of lighted streets below.

He parked on Fairfax and entered a restaurant, taking comfort in its crowded quarters and the presence of a friendly waitress who urged him to try tonight's special. But when his order came he had no appetite for it.

Tonight had already been too special for him, and he couldn't forget his confrontation at the cottage. Had he really glimpsed those faces in the mirror, or had the images been evoked from memories of the films seen in retrospective showings long ago? A mirror is just a sheet of silvered glass, and what it reflected must have come from his mind's eye.

Dale forced himself to eat and gradually the tension ebbed. By the time he finished and drove back up the canyon his composure returned.

Inside the cottage the lights still blazed upon commonplace surroundings, safeguarding against shadows and dispelling doubts. If Chaney had lived here at all, that time was long-gone and the actor himself was long-dead. There were no ghosts, and the box on the bedroom table was merely an old makeup kit, not a miniature haunted house.

For a moment Dale had an impulse to lift the lid and examine the mirror for added reassurance, then dismissed it. There was no point in dignifying his apprehensions; what he needed was a good night’s sleep and a clear head for to-morrow.

Truth to tell, he felt drained after the emotional stress of the day, and once he undressed and sought his bed Dale quickly fell into dreamless slumber.

Just when the change occurred he did not know, but there was a change, and the dream came.

In the dream he found himself awakened, sitting up in bed and staring through darkness at the black blur of the box on the table. And now the impulse he’d rejected upon entering the bedroom returned with an urgency he could not deny.

Sometimes dreams seem oddly like films—movies of the mind in which one’s own movements are silently commanded by an unseen director–a series of jump-cuts and sudden shifts in which one is both actor and audience.

Thus it was that Dale both felt and saw himself rise from the bed, captured in a full shot as he moved across the room. Now a cut to another angle, showing him poised above the makeup kit. Then came a close shot of his hand moving down to raise the lid.

Moonlight from the window sent a silvery shaft to strike the surface of the makeup mirror, flooding it with a blinding brightness that seethed and stirred.

Faces formed in the glass—contoured countenances which seemed frighteningly familiar, even in the depths of dream. Faces changed, and yet there was a lurking linkage between them, for all were oriental.

Some Dale had seen before only in photographs–the evil Chinaman from the lost film Bits of Life, the benevolent laundryman in Shadows. Then, in rapid shifts, the vengeful mandarin of Mr Wu, the bespectacled elderly image of Wu’s father, and a final, frightening glimpse of the chinless, sunken cheeked, shrivelled face of the aged grandfather. They formed and faded, smiling their secret smiles.

Now others appeared–the two pirates, Pew and Merry, from Treasure Island, a bearded Fagin out of Oliver Twist, followed by figures looming full-length in the mirror's depths. Here were the fake cripples of The Miracle Man, The Blackbird, Flesh and Blood. Then the real cripple of The Shock and the legless Blizzard in The Penalty. Now came a derby-hatted gangster, a French-Canadian trapper, a tough sergeant of Marines, a scarred animal-trapper, an elderly railroad engineer, and Echo, the ventriloquist of The Unholy Three.

In his dream Dale stood frozen before the glass as faces flashed forth in faster flickerings–the faces of madmen. Here was a crazed waxmuseum attendant, a bearded victim of senile delusions, a deranged Russian peasant, the insane scientists of A Blind Bargain and The Monster. They were laughing at him, grinning in glee as Dale closed his eyes, hands clawing out to close the lid of the makeup kit.

Then he staggered back to the bed. There were no images here, only the darkness, and Dale fell into it, fleeing the faces and seeking surcease in sleep.

It was morning when Dale's eyes blinked open, welcoming the sanity of sunlight. He stirred, conscious now that last night had been a dream, knowing he'd seen nothing in the mirror; indeed, he had never even left his bed.

As he rose he glanced over at the box resting on the table, remembering how he'd closed it in reality before retiring, then closed it again in his nightmare.

But now the lid was up.

For a moment Dale recoiled, fighting the irrational explanation until sunlight and common sense prevailed.

The makeup kit was old, its hinges worn or even sprung. Sometime during the night the catch must have loosened and the lid popped up.

It was a logical answer, but even so he had to force himself toward the table, steel himself to gaze down into the mirror set inside the lid and gaze on what was reflected there.

Sunshine formed a halo around the image in its glassy surface–the image of his own face.

And as his features formed a smile of rueful relief, Dale turned away. The mirror in the makeup kit held no terrors for him now, any more than the one he faced as he shaved. He dressed and sought the makeshift kitchen, taking comfort in the familiar ritual of preparing his breakfast, then eating eggs and toast with a copy of the morning Times propped up before his coffee-cup. Even the news offered an odd comfort of its own–the familiar headlines and stories of wars, terrorist bombings, political corruption, street crime, drug-busts, accidents, epidemics, natural and unnatural disasters that filled the newspaper pages. However grim, these were realities; realities which he and everyone else in the world faced with fortitude born of long familiarity. They had nothing to do with the unhealthy fantasies which took form when Lon Chaney stalked the screen—fantasies which existed now only in Dale's imagination.

Glancing at his watch, he folded the paper and rose quickly. There was a busy day ahead, and time was already running short.

Leaving the cottage, he drove down to Hollywood Boulevard, turned right, then made a left on Fairfax. He reached Wilshire and headed west, weaving through noonday traffic until he found a parking-space before the imposing structure of the Motion Picture Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Here, upstairs in the Margaret Herrick Library, he turned his attention to the files he requested. Lon Chaney wasn't the only movie monster he meant to deal with in his projected history; there was research to be done on other stars of the horror film. And unlike the case with Chaney, there was ample material on men like Karloff, Lorre and Lugosi.

But even as he scribbled notes Dale found something lacking in the interviews and biographical data of these celebrated actors who seemingly made no mystery of their careers.

The one missing element common to all was that of explanation. Why had a gentle gentleman like Boris ended up playing monsters? What led Peter Lorre, the rabbi's grandson, to the portrayal of psychopaths? How did

Bela Lugosi, who played parts ranging from Romeo to Jesus Christ in early European appearances, transform himself into the dreaded Count Dracula?

William Henry Pratt, Laszlo Loewenstein, Bela Blasko–all three men had changed their names, but what had changed their natures?

Dale found no answer in the files, but the last item he read before leaving the Academy offered a hint. It was an interview with an actress who toured with Lugosi in Dracula.

She told of how the genial cigar-smoking Hungarian prepared for his famous role, sitting before his dressing-room mirror and donning the costume and makeup of the vampire. But that was only a preliminary to performing. The next and most crucial step came as he rose, wrapped in the black cape, face contorted and eyes blazing. As he confronted himself in the mirror his deep voice invoked an incantation. 'I am Dracula,' he intoned. 'I am Dracula. I am Dracula.' Over and over again he repeated the words, and by the time he strode out upon the stage the words became reality. Lugosi was Dracula.

'He psyched himself up,' the actress explained. And as the years passed, a part of him became the part he played; when he died he was buried in Dracula's cape, with Dracula's ring on his finger.

Dale jotted down his notes, then hurried out into the afternoon sunshine. Now it was time to drive into Beverly Hills for a medical appointment.

It had been made a month ago, just an annual checkup, as a matter of routine. But now, as he arrived and took a seat in the crowded waiting-room, Dale felt uptight. He felt no worry about possible physical illness, but what about psychological stress? Last night's dreams might be a symptom of mental disturbance. What if Dr Pendleton told him he was cracking up?

By the time the receptionist called his name and a nurse led him to the examining-room he knew his pulse was pounding and his blood-pressure had risen. So it came as a pleasant surprise when the doctor made no comment on his readings other than remarking he thought Dale was underweight and seemed overtired. Reports on blood-tests and urine-specimen would be available in a few days, but nothing indicated cause for concern.

‘Slow down a little,’ Dr Pendleton said. ‘Pace yourself. And it won’t hurt if you put on a few pounds.’

Armed with that advice Dale left. Relieved, he headed for a seafood restaurant on Brighton Way and there he ordered and actually enjoyed his meal. The doctor was probably right, Dale decided; he had been working too hard, and the tension flaring up after his break with Debbie took an added toll. He resolved to follow orders, rest and relax. Then, perhaps, it might be possible to come to terms with himself, and with Debbie too. He really missed her, missed the hours they spent together, and the breach must be mended. All in good time.

As Dale left the restaurant he sensed a change in the air; the chill breeze hinted at rain and a muted murmur of distant thunder confirmed its coming.

The first drops spattered the windshield as he turned onto the canyon side-road, and by the time he parked in the driveway a flicker of lightning heralded the downpour that followed. Dale hurried into the cottage beneath the wind-tossed trees. Once inside he flipped the light-switches as he moved from room to room. It was only upon reaching the bedroom that he halted when its overhead light came on.

Standing in the doorway he stared at the open makeup box on the table, forehead furrowed in doubt.

Hadn’t he closed the lid before he left? Dale shrugged in uncertainty. Perhaps the loose catch was the culprit once again; he’d better examine it and put his mind to rest.

Rain drummed the rooftop in a faster tempo and lightning flashed outside the window as he crossed to the table. Then, as he reached it, a clap of thunder shook the walls and the lights went off, overhead and throughout the cottage.

Power-outages were not uncommon hereabouts during a storm and Dale wasn’t alarmed; perhaps the lights would come back on in a moment. He waited, but the darkness persisted and prevailed. Maybe he’d better look for his flashlight.

Then its illumination was unnecessary as the lightning-bolt struck somewhere close outside the window, filling the bedroom with a greenish glare. As it did so Dale peered down at the mirror inside the lid of the makeup kit and froze.

The reflection peering up at him was not his own.

It was the face of Singapore Joe–the role Chaney played in The Road to Mandalay–the half-blind man whose left eye was covered with a ghastly white cast.

But the image seemed strangely blurred; Dale blinked to clear his vision as lightning faded and the room plunged into darkness again.

Dale’s shudder wasn’t prompted by the roar of thunder. It was what he’d seen that traumatized him. The Road to Mandalay was one of the lost films; he knew of no print in existence. But Singapore Joe existed, in the mirror, existed in an indelible image leering up at him through the dark.

And the dark must be dispelled. Dale turned and blundered his way into the hall. Reaching the kitchen he stooped and opened the cabinet beneath the sink. Lightning outside the kitchen window came to his aid and in its moment of livid life he found and grasped the flashlight. It was not just an ordinary cylinder-type but one which terminated in a square base, projecting a strong beam of almost lantern-like intensity.

Dale switched it on, and the ray guided him back to the bedroom. As he walked his relief faded with the realization that his vision had faded too.

He was seeing only with his right eye now. The left was blind. Blind—like the eye of Singapore Joe.

You’re having a nightmare, he told himself. But he wasn’t asleep, and if there was a nightmare it had to be in the mirror of the makeup kit. Unless, of course, he was hallucinating.

There was only one way to find out, and Dale knew what he must do. Rain swept across the rooftop above, doors creaked and groaned against the onslaught of the wind, lightning glimmered, thunder growled. Only the light he gripped in his hand was reassurance; a magic lantern to protect him on his way. Magic lantern–that's what they called the movies in the old days. Was there such a thing as magic?

Forcing himself toward the bedroom table, he gazed down at the glass reflected in the lantern-light.

Half-blind he stared, but what he saw with his right eye was just a mirror after all. A shining surface reflecting his own familiar face.

And now his left eye cleared and he could see again. Dale took a deep breath, then expelled it hastily—for now the mirror blurred and a piercing pain shot through his lower limbs, causing him to crouch. Something pressed heavily against his spine, bowing his back.

He was changing, and the image in the mirror was changing too. He saw the tousled hair, the gargoyle grimace, the twisted limbs, the body bent beneath the hideous hump. No need to ask the identity of this image–he was gazing at Quasimodo, the Hunchback of Notre Dame.

It was Chaney he saw in the glass but he himself felt the weight of the hump, the constriction of the harness binding it to his body, the pain inflicted by the mass of makeup covering his face, the jagged teeth wired into his mouth, the mortician's wax masking his right eye.

Realization brought relief. It was makeup, and only makeup after all. Gradually the image diffused and Dale's feeling of physical restraint faded until once again he stood erect.

Thunder rolled as the image dispelled. Dale sighed with relief; now was the time to slam down the lid of the kit once and for all.

He started to reach for it, but his hands were gone.

His hands–and his arms.

Illusion, of course, like the illusion of Chaney's face and form coming into focus beneath the mirror's shiny surface. Dale's eyes met those of the visage peering out at him from under the broad brim of a Spanish sombrero. Chaney was armless, and now Dale felt the agony of numbed circulation, the constriction of his own arms bound against his body by a tight, concealing corset. That, he remembered, had been Chaney's device when portraying the armless knife-thrower in The Unknown.

With the recollection his panic ebbed, and once more features and form receded into the mirror's depths. The numbness was gone from his arms now; he could lift his hands and close the lid.

Then he fell.

His legs gave way and he slumped to the floor, sprawling helplessly, the box on the table beyond his reach. All he could do was elevate his gaze, see the shaven-headed creature crawling across the glass, dead legs dragging behind him. It was Phroso, the paralysed cripple in West of Zanzibar.

No makeup had been involved in the simulation of the man who had lost the use of his lower limbs; it had been Chaney's artistry which made the role seem reality.

Knowing that, Dale strove to rise, but there was no feeling in his legs–he couldn't command them. The face in the mirror glowered at him in the lamplight, bursting into brightness as lightning flashed outside the window. The eyes were mocking him, mocking his plight, and now Dale realized that the mirror's monsters sensed his purpose and were summoned to prevent it. Their appearance in the mirror gave them life, his awareness gave them strength to survive, and that strength was growing. Closing the kit would condemn them to darkness and it was this they fought against. They knew he couldn't close the lid, not if he were blind, armless, or paralysed.

Frantically Dale balanced himself on the palm of his left hand, extending his right arm upward, inching to the table-top. Then his fingers gripped the lid of the makeup kit, wrenching it down. With a rasp of rusty hinges the box slammed shut.

The mirror disappeared from view, but Dale's paralysis persisted. Try as he would, he couldn't raise himself. All he could do was wriggle, wriggle across the floor like a snake with a broken back, and lever his arms against the side of the bed. Pulling his body upward, he lifted himself, gasping with effort, then collapsed upon the cool sheets which dampened with the sweat of fear pouring from his fevered forehead.

Fever. That was the answer; it had to be. The doctor was wrong in his diagnosis. Dale was coming down with something, something that twisted mind and body. Labelling it psychosomatic brought no relief.

Dale rolled over to face the telephone resting on the night-stand beside the bed. If he could reach it he could call the paramedics. But as his hand moved forward he felt a sudden tingling in his legs, then kicked out with both feet. The paralysis, real or imaginary, was gone.

No reason to summon paramedics now, but he still needed help. In the dim light cast by the flash-lantern standing on the table across the room he dialled Dr Pendleton's number. The ringing on the line gave way to the mechanical message of an answering-service.

'Dr Pendleton is not in. Please leave your name and number and he will get back to you—'

Dale cradled the receiver, frowning in frustration. Sure, the doctor would get back to him, perhaps in an hour, maybe two or three. And then what?

How could he explain all this? If he minimized his condition he'd get that take-two-aspirins-and-call-me-in-the-morning routine. And if he came on too strong the doctor would probably order up an ambulance on his own. Pendleton was a practitioner of modern medicine; he wouldn't come out in the storm to make a house-call merely to humour a hysterical patient with his presence.

But Dale had to have someone's presence here, someone to talk to, someone like—

'Debbie?'

He'd dialled her number automatically, and now the very sound of her voice brought relief.

'Dale! I was hoping you'd call.'

Then she did care. Thank God for that! He listened intently as the warmth of her response gave way to concern.

'What's wrong? Are you sick or something?'

‘Something,’ Dale said. ‘That is, I’m not sure. No, I can’t explain it on the phone. If you could just come over—’

‘Tonight? In all this rain?’

‘Debbie, please. I know it’s asking a lot, but I need you. I need you now —’

‘And I need you.’ Debbie sighed. ‘All right. Give me half an hour.’

The phone went dead, but as he replaced the receiver Dale came alive again. She was coming and he’d told the truth; he did need her, needed her desperately.

Listening, he realized the rain was slowing. It was a good sign. Perhaps by the time she arrived the storm would be over and they could talk without the punctuation of thunder. He’d tell her what had happened, make her understand.

But just what had happened–and why?

Dale rolled over on his back, staring at the shadows on the ceiling, facing up to the shadows surrounding the question in his own mind.

And the answer came.

He’d found it today at the Academy, found it when he read the actress’s description of Bela Lugosi preparing for his portrayal.

‘He psyched himself up.’ That was her explanation of how Lugosi became Dracula, and that was what Lon Chaney must have done.

No wonder he’d established a secret hideaway! Here, in this very room, he did more than experiment with physical disguise. Dale pictured him sitting alone on a night like this, creating contrivances to deform his body, refashioning his face, staring into the mirror at the creature reflected there. And then, the final transformation.

‘Make up your mind.’ A figure of speech, but Chaney had given it a literal application, one beyond the mere application of makeup from his kit. Seated here in the shadowed silence, this man of mystery–this son of deaf-mute parents whom he communicated with through the power of pantomime–confronted the reflections of monsters in the mirror and whispered the words. ‘I am the Frog. I am Blizzard. I am Dr Ziska, Sergei, Alonzo the Armless, the Blackbird, Mr Wu.’ Each time a different incarnation, each time a new persona, each time a litany repeated hour after hour from midnight to dawn, willing himself into the role until the role became reality.

And psyching himself up, he’d psyched-up the mirror too. The intensity of total concentration had been captured in the glass forever, just as it was later captured on the blank surface of nitrate film used for silent pictures. The filmed images decayed in time but the makeup kit mirror preserved Chaney’s psychic power forever—a long-latent power revived by Dale’s own glimpses into the glass, a power that grew greater with each succeeding gaze.

Dale remembered the first apparitions–how fleetingly they appeared and how little effect they had beyond the initial shock of recognition. It was his repeated viewing which gave strength to the shifting shapes until they transformed his body into a semblance of what he saw.

But he wouldn’t repeat the mistake. From now on the makeup kit would remain closed and he’d never look into that mirror again.

The rain had ended now and so had his fear. Thunder and lightning gave way to a calm matching his own. Knowing the truth was enough; he wouldn’t repeat all this to Debbie or try to convince her. Instead he’d just tell how much he needed her, and that was true too.

But first he must dispose of the kit.

Dale shifted himself over to the side of the bed, sitting up and swinging his feet to the floor. The power-outage hadn’t ended; he’d shut the kit away in the closet, then take the flash-lantern with him and guide Debbie up the path when she arrived.

All was quiet as he crossed the room to the table where the lanternlight shone on the closed box beside it. That’s what the kit was, really; just a battered old box. Lon Chaney’s box–Pandora’s box, which opened for evils to emerge. But not to worry; the lid was down and it would stay down forever.

His hand went to the flash-lantern.

At least that was his intention, until he felt the chill of cold metal at his fingertips and found them fixed upon the lid of the makeup kit.

He tried to pull away but his hand remained fixed, fixed by a force commanding his movement and his mind, a power he could not control.

It was the power that raised the lid of the box, a power that seethed and surged, and in the uptilted mirror he saw its source.

Two eyes blazed from a face surmounted by a beaver hat and framed by matted hair; a face that grinned to display the cruel, serrated teeth. But it was from the cruel eyes that the power poured–the burning eyes of the vampire in London After Midnight. Dale knew the film, though he'd never seen a print; knew its original title was The Hypnotist. And it was a hypnotist who glared up at him, a hypnotist's power which had compelled him to open the box and stand transfixed now by the vision in the glass.

Then suddenly the face was fading and for a moment Dale felt a glimmer of hope. But as the face disappeared into the mirror's distorted depths, another face took form.

It was a face Dale knew only too well, one which had lain buried in his brain since childhood when he'd first seen it fill the screen from behind a ripped-away mask. The face of madness, the face of Death incarnate, the face of Chaney's supreme horror; the face of Erik in The Phantom of the Opera,

No wonder he'd blotted out all memory of the terror which tormented his nightmares as a child, the terror he'd hidden away in adulthood but which still survived in his unconscious. It was suppressed fear that lay behind his inexplicable interest in Lon Chaney, a fright disguised as fascination which guided him to this ultimate, inevitable confrontation with the gaping fangs, the flaring nostrils, the bulging eyes of a living skull.

The Phantom stared and Dale felt the flooding force of the death's-head's overwhelming power, to which he responded with a power of his own, born of utter dread.

For an instant, for an eternity, his gaze locked with that of the monster and he realized a final fear. The face was looming larger, moving forward– attempting to emerge from the mirror!

And then, with savage strength, Dale gripped the box in both hands, raising it high; panting, he dashed it down upon the floor. The makeup kit landed with a crash as the Phantom's image shattered into shards of splintered glass glinting up in the lantern-light.

Chaney's power was broken at last, and with it the power of the Phantom. Dale gasped, shuddering in relief as he felt full control return.

As the knocking sounded its summons he picked up the flashlantern and carried it with him down the hall to the front door. Debbie was here now, his hope, his angel of salvation. And he went to her proudly and unafraid because he was free of Chaney, free of the mirror's magic, free of the Phantom forever. This was the beginning of a new life, a life of love and beauty.

Dale opened the door and saw her standing there, smiling up at him. It was only when he lifted the lantern and Debbie saw his face that she began to scream.

It Takes One To Know One

Kevin Ames took the elevator to the thirty-fifth floor, thinking about earthquakes all the way. When he arrived his involuntary sigh of relief echoed along the carpeted corridor as Ames made his way to the double doors at the far end. Here he halted to read the gold-lettered legend identifying the offices of Tischler, Tischler, Phelps, Obendorrf & Associates.

This time his sigh was voluntary. It was easy for him to understand why attorneys band together; obviously there's safety in numbers. But why did they list so many names? Wouldn't it be simpler to assume a group identity, like Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves?

Kevin Ames shrugged, then squared his shoulders, forced a smile and opened the right-hand half of the door guarding a reception area beyond.

Its decorous decor did little to put him at ease as he entered, and the matching receptionist behind a glass partition added no comfort to the occasion. Her prim lips parted in a smile of greeting usually reserved to welcome child-molesters at Disneyland.

"Good afternoon," he said. Apparently it wasn't, not for her anyway, because her smile went blank.

There was no change of expression in her unlifted face as he gave his name and received the whom-did-you-wish-to-see? routine in return. But when he answered that question her reaction was unmistakably evident.

"Mr. Tischler senior?" Her voice italicized her incredulity.

Ames nodded. "I have an appointment. For four-thirty."

“One moment, please.” There was a flicker of disbelief in her eyes—the kind of look you’d give someone who brings a doggie-bag to the Last Supper.

Concealing his impatience, he stood waiting as she turned to address the intercom. “Grace? Did he come in this afternoon? No, they didn’t say anything to me. Do you have something down about a four-thirty appointment? There’s a Mr.—”

“Ames. Kevin Ames.” His answer filled her pause, but he wasn’t really listening. He’d started taking inventory of her desk.

Not much to see, really. No papers, no pads; it all goes on tape or into computers nowadays. But there was still the bud vase with the single rose, always a single rose in a pricey office like this, and a single receptionist who wouldn’t be caught dead at a singles bar. At a certain age she still might or might not manage a face-tuck just to keep up appearances, but in any case or any age you could bet that her bra would always be a white one.

His speculation ceased abruptly as she switched off the intercom and addressed him. “Mr. Tischler will see you now, Mr. Ames.”

Did he imagine it or was there a new note of respect in her voice, a warmer current flowing under the ice? If so, the thaw was generated by Tischler’s name, not his.

Somewhere inside his skull, soundless queries emerged from cerebral silence. Kevin? Kevin who? Never heard of him. What does he do?

Practices anonymity, he responded, his answer as unvoiced as the question. That’s the nice thing about talking to yourself, you never have to worry about being heard. And you always get the last word. Come to think about it, writing was also a way of getting the last word. Perhaps that was one of the reasons he’d been attracted to such a career. Or, more accurately, a profession. People who remain anonymous after a lifetime of effort can hardly claim their futile efforts towards recognition actually constitute a career.

“Good God! Has it really been that long?”

This voice he actually heard, and it wasn't coming from inside his head but from here, inside the private office. The paneled, polished claustrophobic quarters of Danton Tischler, Sr., attorney-at-law to the great, the near-great and the ingrates of Greater Los Angeles.

The voice didn't sound in the least as he remembered it. A once-hearty baritone was now a cracked, almost falsetto whisper—probably through falsetto teeth, Ames reflected—which one might expect from an elderly man. But then, this was an elderly man speaking; the young Danny Tischler he'd once known wasn't an occupant of Century City, because Century City didn't even exist in those days. The young Danny lived in memory as the sole resident of a bungalow-courtyard law office somewhere out along the wilds of Ventura Boulevard, where Edgar Rice Burroughs still ruled Tarzana.

Just how long ago had that been? Ames didn't need to ask, for the old man was already providing the answer.

"Forty years," he murmured.

Impossible. But there it was, in black and white, on the upper left-hand corner tab of the file folder which Tischler tapped as he spoke. His fingers, Ames noted, were like breadsticks.

"That's right," Ames said. "Time flies when you're having fun."

Tischler glanced down at his breadstick fingers. "You call old age fun?"

Ames shrugged. "Perhaps it's all a matter of viewpoint. If you look at it another way, life is an ongoing obituary."

The elderly attorney managed a dry chuckle. "You should have been a philosopher instead of a writer."

"No percentage in it," Ames told him. "And I'm not just talking about money. Have you ever heard a pretty little girl say, 'When I grow up, I want to marry a philosopher' ?"

"So you went in for writing instead?"

"One of the reasons, I suppose. When you're young you think that way."

"Then how come you never married?"

"Because I grew up and stopped thinking that way."

“Any regrets?”

“I’m grateful just for having survived,” Ames said. “Regrets are for the others who didn’t make it.”

“You stayed friends over the years?”

Ames frowned. “I wish I could say that. Remember, we used to meet for lunch at that Chinese place in Sherman Oaks every week and talk shop? But then we started moving around, job to job. Before you know it you’ve lost touch. When I think of how close we were when all of us started out doing horror for the magazines—”

“Right.” Tischler’s glance strayed again to the folder before him. “That name you fellows picked—The Skull Club. Maybe you thought it was a gag back then, but it’s sure appropriate today.” He looked up abruptly. “Know something? I never expected you’d be the one.”

“I’m a little surprised myself,” Ames told him. “Maybe ‘shocked’ is a better word. At least that’s how I felt last week when I read about Jesse.”

“Hadn’t seen him lately?”

“No reason to. And you?”

“The same.” Tischler nodded. “I did send him an invite when we had the party to open the new offices here, but he didn’t show up. For that matter, neither did you.”

“Sorry, I was out of town.”

The breadstick fingers flicked in a gesture of dismissal. “No sweat. There was such a mob scene here that night I probably wouldn’t have spotted you. Everybody who wasn’t out of town came running for the free Dom Perignon.” Tischler paused. “Which reminds me. Better get down to business.” He opened the folder and squinted at its contents. “Guess there’s no point reading this again. Nobody’s touched it in all those years.” He reached down to pull out an oblong manila envelope, raised its flap, and extracted a small sheaf of papers. “Besides, I have these.”

“What are they?”

“Copies of the death certificates. Care for a look?”

Ames shook his head quickly. “Not necessary. I know they’re dead.”

“Never hurts to be sure.” Tischler slid the sheaf back into the envelope.

“Once a lawyer, always a lawyer,” Ames said. “Do you want me to take a medical examination to prove I’m still alive?”

“A notary’s statement will do.” This time the attorney actually smiled. Rising, he crossed the room and pulled out the bottom drawer of an oaken filing cabinet. Ames watched him as he stooped, scrabbled, and straightened up again, gripping the straw-covered bottle.

“Here’s your wine,” Tischler said.

He returned to his seat behind the desk, depositing the rounded broad-based bottle in Ames’ outstretched hands as he moved past.

Ames blinked. “I thought you kept this in your safe.”

“I did, at first, but you’re talking forty years ago.” Tischler’s chuckle was still dehydrated. “Every time the firm expanded we moved, but we kept running out of room. By the time we came here last fall, even a walk-in vault wouldn’t hold all the sensitive material. When I ran across the wine I just stuck it in here where there was room, and I knew it’d be safe. Not that anybody would want to steal a bottle of cheap Chianti.”

Ames glanced at what he was holding. “Cost us ninety-eight cents plus tax. All we could afford back then.” His glance rose. “Brings up a point. What do I owe you?”

“No charge.” Tischler nodded. “My pleasure.”

“But you’re entitled to something for storage and keeping your eye on it,” Ames said. “If you hadn’t volunteered, the five of us would have been stuck with safety-deposit box rental for forty years—”

“—and I would have missed the chance to tell my learned colleagues about the tontine.” Again Tischler was smiling as he broke in. “Gave me something different to talk about. There aren’t many lawyers around today who even know Lorenzo Tontine’s name.” He added a few wrinkles to his forehead. “Come to think about it, I don’t believe I did until you told me. Getting a bottle of wine for the last survivor of the bunch was your idea, wasn’t it?”

"I guess so. Though it was Everly who brought up a tontine to begin with. At first he was thinking along the regular line—everybody putting some money into a special account, letting the interest accumulate." Ames shrugged. "In the end, we had to settle for a fifth of Dago Red. That's what they used to call it in the old days."

"It's the sentiment that counts." Tischler nodded. "Do you plan to drink it?"

"Of course. As you say, it's the sentiment that counts."

Kevin Ames thought about sentiment as he drove home through the darkened downpour on drenched streets. It didn't rain very often in what TV weather forecasters refer to as the Southland, but who cared? Rain or shine, he had the wine. And should it prove sour, the taste would still be sweet.

Revenge is sweet.

Now there's a sentiment for you. Sentiment enough to compensate for sediment, if forty years had produced any in this bottle, this priceless bottle, more precious than the finest champagne.

Out of the corner of his left eye he caught the flicker of neon from a restaurant window, and his stomach responded with a warning growl. Perhaps he ought to stop for dinner.

He slowed down just long enough to note that in spite of rain the small parking area to one side was full, and there were no openings at the curbside nearby. All right, the lot was full and he was empty, but there'd be plenty of time to eat later. Waiting a few hours for a meal was nothing, not to a man who'd waited forty years for a drink. First things first.

Or was it last things last?

Ames was the last, Last of the Mohicans, last of his tribe—all those ignoble redskins who'd once whooped around the campfire fed by pages they'd produced for the pulps at a penny a word. When it went out they went on, following fresh trails to fresh fires sparked by the scattered sheets of paperback novels or the multicolored revisions of television scripts. The flames were fitful, but enough to keep the young braves warm.

In time more seasoned warriors could fuel their fires with hot properties, but even the blaze of glory hadn't warded off the chill forever. They were cold now, all of them, and only he knew warmth.

Warm car to heated garage, heated garage to comfortable kitchen, comfortable kitchen to dark den. Or was it a rec room?

Names kept changing. At the time Ames managed to put a down-payment on the place it was just a cheap tract-house in the boonies. Now it was a desirable residential property on a choice view lot.

Too bad he couldn't boast of equal improvement in forty years! Entering the room Ames switched on the light and its reflection bounced off the picture-window, transforming the surface into a mirror. For a moment he caught a glimpse of his reflection, and winced at the gargoyle in the glass. He drew the drapes hastily, trying to avoid looking at the backs of his hand as he did so. He hated the sight of blue veins, corded and crisscrossing like the routes on a freeway map. Next would come the liver spots.

Or would they? Nothing wrong with his liver; he'd never been much of a drinker. Until now, that is.

Now was a matter of putting the bottle down on the counter, shucking his jacket, opening the cupboard to search out a wine-glass from the bottom shelf.

Wonder of wonders, he actually found one, and after circling its inner surface his forefinger came away dustfree. He located the corkscrew next, a fancy-looking gadget at the back of the top shelf, still nestled in a gift-box and still unused. Corkscrews were metal mysteries to him.

Actually, employing it wasn't as much of a challenge as he'd anticipated. Once he fitted the twisted tip into the top of the cork and clamped the hood over the bottle's neck, he tightened the levers at both sides, pulling the cork out as they retracted. Simple as brain-surgery.

The wine poured easily, no specks of sediment surfacing as it rose to fill the glass. There was nothing you could call a bouquet—what the hell do you expect for ninety-eight cents?—but he thought he did detect a slight musky smell. Or was it merely the usual musty smell emanating from those moldering paperbacks and ancient pulp magazines lining the bookshelves row upon row?

If he’d had any sense he’d have dumped the lot years ago. They had no value to dealers or collectors, and no value to readers, either. But these tattered, battered specimens with their garish covers wrinkled like the faces of old whores held value to him. They represented the sum total of his lifework. No matter how they smelled, this was all he had to show for forty-odd years of effort.

On the lower shelves were the hardbacks—not his, but those of contemporaries and colleagues. If he was starting out again he wouldn’t waste his time and talent on penny-a-word short stories and cheap paperback originals. Hardcovers were solid and substantial, made to last; the pages and their contents didn’t smell. No doubt about it, this was the route he’d go.

But you can’t turn back the odometer. And maybe it wouldn’t matter even if he could. Let’s face it, he had aimed for respectable publishing markets when starting out, just like his friends were doing. The difference was that they made it and he didn’t.

There’d been no way of knowing where any of them would end up, no sure road-map to success. Forty years ago, high school kids didn’t study genetics; they read the Declaration of Independence and graduated believing that all men are created equal. So if a half-dozen of those kids from roughly-similar backgrounds decided on a writing career, why shouldn’t their chances of success be just about equal too?

Luck was a factor, of course, but at first luck seemed to be everybody’s good buddy. Luck brought them together—Everly, Jesse and himself in class, the other two through mutual acquaintances. Hanging out together but working separately, they made their first sales to the same few remaining pulp magazines, their first breakthroughs into the expanding paperback markets.

Come to think of it, there’d been a sixth candidate for the Nobel Prize in Literature back then whose name he had trouble recalling today. Frank Osric, that was it. For a beginner, Frank was a pretty good candidate for a full-time career. But he'd also been a sexual athlete, world-class, who married a bimbo whose father owned a factory. So with a baby on the way, he ended up punching a time-clock instead of a typewriter.

The Skull Club members were the five who stuck together. Funny how they'd all written pretty much the same sort of stuff back then; a little science fiction, and a lot of fantasy before it split up into dark, light, or shocking pink with polka-dot stripes.

It was only later that they branched out individually into the mystery markets, spy-thrillers, police procedure product. It was after television moved from New York to Hollywood that they really broke up, as their lives split up into deals, deadlines, and rewrites over the weekends.

Kevin cupped his glass, wondering as he did so why nobody ever spoke of glassing their cups. English is a strange language, and writers are strange people.

Or maybe he was the strange one, the way he'd tried to keep in touch with his friends during the early years of their rise to fame and fortune. And he had tried, dammit. Phoned for lunch-dates and got excuses. Then, as their success soared, he got secretaries. And finally, thanks to the miracle of modem technology, he got answering machines.

After the others scattered, leaving the Valley for more trendy territory, contact with them dwindled to Christmas cards. Eventually even the cards stopped Hallmarking the passage of years, and that's when he got the message.

It was about time because the message had been awaiting his attention for ages, delivered by a diversity of sources. It had come from New York agents who couldn't sell his books to the right publishers, it came from agents out here who couldn't peddle his spec-written scripts to television or films. And while his work continued to appear in the lesser genre zines or paperbacks, the message came from critics loud and clear, in the form of silence.

Kevin ignored it for a long time, telling himself to hang in there, do the job, have patience. So he hung, and he jobbed, and eventually the patience ran out.

Reading was what scared it away; reading articles, essays and books about the work of his colleagues. He was shocked to see the first references, perhaps a dozen years ago; shocked not so much by their content as by the realization that so much time had passed since the days they'd all started out together. His mirror had already begun to tell him the same story, and he was tempted to try shutting his eyes while shaving. But he couldn't close his eyes to the facts. Pimply punks, who didn't even exist when the Skull Club was alive and flourishing, had been born, grown up, and become critics. Critics who knew genre fiction and its writers, who even mentioned the Skull Club in passing when discussing the work of the others.

The others. That's who the critics wrote about, the others. Jesse and Everly, Rondbeck and Fargo. Everybody except Kevin Ames.

Turning away from the bookshelves, he grimaced in rueful recollection. To be fair about it, his name actually had been mentioned, several times in several places, but only in passing, one of a long list of lesser or at least less-known talents. And one creep had managed to misspell it. Kevan Aims. So much for critical perception.

But none of the others suffered such careless treatment. No critic had a problem identifying Roy Fargo.

Kevin paused to confront the wall beyond the shelves. That's where the pictures were, the photographs from newspapers and magazines he'd clipped and pinned to a corkboard during the past decade, just for old times' sake.

Or so he'd told himself at the start. Now, of course, he knew the truth. It had never been for old times' sake, not even at the beginning.

Roy was the beginning, the first to go up, and that in itself had been hard to take. Not that Roy Fargo was much more of a success than Kevin himself. True, he lived in Beverly Hills, but his apartment was on the very tip of the south-of-Wilshire area, and this was before the real-estate boom.

Roy never made it into the megabuck neighborhood: all he wanted was a chance to move from paperback to hardcover markets. By then the major publishers were concentrating on clones of Stephen King, but small specialty houses sprang up to feed the nostalgia craze for Golden Oldies from the Golden Age. They sold mainly through mail-order, putting out signed and limited editions, including genuine leather bindings for the true collector and/or greedy speculator.

At first, established writers shied away from small advances and small printings, so specialty publishers took what they could get. One of the first they got was Roy Fargo, who soon became a familiar name amongst the literary leather-freaks. His timing was right, because pop art was becoming popular with those who took credit for turning obscurity into celebrity.

That's when critics started paying him serious attention, cannibalizing each other's articles and reviews, pumping up a new audience for an old name.

And that's when some genre-oriented zine published the photo of Fargo which, haloed by a fringe of other newsclippings, occupied the left-hand side of Kevin's corkboard display. Below it was the story headline—ROY FARGO, MASTER OF MYSTERY, WINS WIZARD AWARD.

Kevin squinted at the picture in the dim light. A good photo, yes, but not a good likeness. Maybe because the Fargo he'd been familiar with was a younger man.

The passage of those subsequent decades had fattened the face, thinned the hairline, wrought wrinkles and wattles. Only the set of the fish-mouth remained unchanged; Roy Fargo was the kind of man who only smiled at funerals.

Even so, that headline should have made him laugh out loud, because he'd never written a real mystery in his life. To Kevin the only mystery was why editors accepted such dated whodunit fare, such hardboiled potboilers with their dumb-dick antihero and his gat, rod, heater, equalizer or piece aimed to put a notch in somebody's crotch.

Kevin thought of what he himself had written over the same period of time, genuine mysteries with authentic backgrounds, not just updated slang and the same old phallic fallacisms.

What right did Fargo have to steal Kevin's blood-and-thunder? If there was any justice, that should have been his prize. Both Fargo and himself had been nominated for the Best Paperback Novel award that year; it had been Kevin's first and only time. When he heard about it he'd felt a surge of encouraging excitement. The Wizard Award was prestigious; it meant something to editors who paid winners more attention, and higher advances. Ten years ago it would have given Kevin Ames a chance to snuggle under hardcovers with a major publisher.

If there were any justice.

But there was no justice, and Fargo was the one who accepted his trophy at the annual banquet, Fargo who signed a three-book hardcover contract, Fargo who was photographed.

Kevin stared at the photo and the photo stared back. That's the way they'd stared at each other ten years ago, just two months after Roy accepted his prize.

The phone rang and Kevin started at the sound, then realized there was no ring, merely an echo. An echo sounding down the corridors of time; an echo of the phone's sudden and surprising ring on that evening a decade ago. Actually the surprise had not been in the ringing but in the voice which responded when Kevin answered the call.

"Kevin, old buddy—how are you? This is Roy."

"Fargo?"

"As in North Dakota."

"Well I'll be damned!"

"Your prediction, not mine." A sort of chuckle sounded over the wire, a muffled sound which might issue from a fish-mouth. Or the mouth of someone who'd been drinking like a fish, as they used to say long years ago.

Only they didn't say it about Fargo, since he drank very little in the old days. Couldn't afford to, for one thing. But times and fortunes change, because he'd obviously had a few and he was calling from the bar at some steak-house off Melrose that Kevin never heard of before.

"What're you doing down there?" he asked.

"Tell you about it when I see you," Fargo said.

"See me?"

"That's right. They've got great steaks here. I'm inviting you to dinner."

"Now—you mean tonight?" Kevin hesitated. "But—look, I have plans for the evening—"

"Change them."

He did, and they met.

When Kevin arrived at the crowded side-street restaurant his host was already seated in a booth just off the noisy upfront bar. Recognizing Fargo came as a shock, for his photo had scarcely hinted at the ravaged reality, the flab of flesh, the face with its mottled veins broken like pledges to Alcoholics Anonymous. But the greatest change was in the fish-mouth, now set in a permanent smirk of smug satisfaction.

Coming here on impulse had been a mistake, but Kevin realized it too late for retreat; he could only sit down and lighten up.

Tonight, a decade later, he couldn't pretend to recall any of their preliminary greetings or small-talk. Drinks before and during dinner helped ease his tension, and Roy had already achieved an alcohol level which would intoxicate any vampire who drank his blood.

But the steaks were every bit as good as promised, and it was over dessert that their conversation really began. Instead of coffee, Fargo opted for a double Turkey-and-rocks. Kevin, conscious of his own limited ability to handle liquor, settled for a small cognac. Now he felt a trifle more relaxed, but it was still hard to equate this bloated and aging stranger with the Roy he'd once known, or thought he'd known, so well. I wish I hadn't come, he told himself.

"I'm glad you came," Fargo told him. "Been wanting to get hold of you for a long time."

"I should have called you," Kevin said. "When I heard the news—"

"About the prize?" Fargo shrugged. "No problem. Charlie Rondbeck was at the awards banquet so we talked there, but I haven't heard word one from old Jesse or Everly either. And I didn't expect to hear from you, considering."

"Considering what?"

"Considering you're the guy who should have gotten the award in the first place." Fargo raised his glass with a flourish that ruffled the Turkey's feathers. "Cheers!"

Kevin downed his drink, feeling its warmth mingle with the glow kindled by Roy's words. It was difficult to resent a man who admitted the truth. Fargo wasn't just flattering him; he must be feeling guilty about what happened, or else why would he bother inviting him to to dinner?

"Thinking about you when I was at the bar earlier," Fargo said. "How we lost touch all this time, and then the award business coming up. So I called."

Kevin found himself smiling. "You still haven't told me what you're doing down here."

"Oh, that." Fargo set his glass down, rattling the rocks. "Got myself a Volvo last week. Runs like a dream."

"Good for you," Kevin said.

"Not so good." Fargo captured his glass again in a pudgy grip. "Yesterday some bastard put a dent in the left rear fender while I parked at the market. This afternoon I took it over to the dealer's body-shop around the corner from here. Figured straightening out the fender would be a ten-minute job, which just goes to show you how long it's been since I owned a new car. Turns out that now they replace the whole damn thing on these models. Costs you an arm and a leg because it's not covered by the warranty, but what can you do? So I told them go ahead, and wandered over here."

Kevin’s inner glow had faded during Fargo’s wordy account, replaced now by a rising resentment.

“So that’s why you got hold of me,” he said. “You need a lift home, right? Been cheaper for you just to call a cab.”

Fargo shook his head. “You got it all wrong, old buddy. Shop stays open ’til nine, so the car’ll be ready by now. I was just killing time.”

“And wanted me to kill it with you,” Kevin broke in.

“Knock it off.” Fargo groped for his glass, eyed its emptiness, and signaled to the passing waiter. “Want a refill?”

“No. I’d better be going.” Not only had Kevin’s glow faded; what he felt now was an icy numbness, and he made no effort to keep the chill from his voice. “Seeing as you don’t need me—”

“But I do need you! That’s why I called.” Fargo leaned forward as the waiter returned to switch the empty glass with a full one. “Told you I got to thinking. That’s how I came up with the idea.”

“Get to the point.”

“Remember I said you should have won that award?” Fargo reduced his double to a single as he spoke. “Just knowing it was enough to put me on a guilt-trip, but I’m getting off at the next station.”

“Talk sense.”

“I’m talking dollars and sense, for both of us. I’m talking collaboration.”

Kevin opened his mouth but Fargo gestured with his glass, intercepting interruption. “Heard about my new deal, right? Three-book contract, no options. Upfront advance is—they don’t want me to say, but take my word it’s a good chunk of cash. And this idea of mine will fix things so you’ll get your share.”

“You want to write those books with you?” Kevin said.

Fargo lowered his gaze and his voice. “I want you to write those books for me.”

“You’re drunk.”

“Damn’ right I am. I’ve been working at it ever since I signed that contract.”

Unprepared for such an admission, Kevin scarcely knew how to respond. “Does your agent know about this?” he faltered.

“Yeah.” Fargo nodded. “He says he’s seen it before. Guy’s used to being kicked around all his life, then something like this happens and he goes into shock, can’t cope. Every time I think about doing these books for that kind of money, I freeze. You don’t jump from the Little League into the majors, not at my age.”

“Writer’s block,” Kevin said. “Get some help to dry out, find yourself a good shrink—”

Roy gestured with his glass again. “A shrink can’t write those books for me. You can.”

“But there are plenty of full-time ghost writers around. Ask your agent.”

“No way! I don’t want this to get out. Got to have somebody I can trust to keep their mouth shut. Somebody who’ll work in my style, only better. That’s you.”

Sharp flattery or blunt truth? Kevin realized it didn’t matter. Another question did, and he asked it.

“Okay, perhaps I could do the job. But why should I?”

“For old times’ sake. Because we’re friends. Because you need the money.”

“I’m doing all right.”

Fargo shook his head. “Cost of living’s rising, but your sales aren’t going up with it.”

The little ball of anger that had formed in the pit of Kevin’s stomach was starting to roll. He tried to halt it as he spoke. “Who told you that?”

“Never mind, I checked it out. You’re hurting, old buddy.” Fargo set his empty glass down. “But not to worry, help is on the way.” The fish-mouth fissured in a grin. “Money talks, and all you got to do is listen. My proposition is we make a work-for-hire deal, no royalties, just a flat fee, half up front, half on delivery. And seeing as it’s you, I’m willing to go ten thousand per book.”

Kevin couldn’t control the roll of rage so he concentrated on controlling his voice. “You’ve got to be getting a lot more for those books, just in advances alone. Plus the royalties to come, paperback and foreign rights, maybe even film or TV sales somewhere down the line.”

Roy Fargo was having his own vocal problems. “Who knows?” He wagged a fat finger. “All you gotta know is there’s thir’y grand in it for you, guar’nteed. Way you grind stuff out, shouldn’t take more’n two months apiece. How long’s it been since anybody paid you thirty thou for six months’ work?”

“Never got that much,” Kevin said. “But if I ever do, it won’t be for something that has your name on it.”

“Think you’re too good to ghost for me?” Fargo’s forefinger jabbed air. “Well, let me tell you somethin’, old buddy. I don’t think you’re good enough! On’y reason I called is I felt sorry for you, wanna give you a break. So what thanks do I get—”

“That’s enough,” Kevin said. He was amazed that he could speak so calmly while feeling the ball rolling deep inside him. “Get out of my face.”

“I’m gone.” Roy Fargo slid out of the booth and rose askew but upright as he spoke. “I got no time to waste on you, old buddy. You’re jus’ a hack, always will be. Jus’ a hack—”

Kevin watched him weave down the aisle; not until after his host departed did he realize Fargo had left without paying the tab.

Adding insult to injury came to a total of seventy-eight bucks for drinks, dinner, tax and tip. A sizable bite, ten years ago.

But at the time Kevin scarcely felt it. What he felt was the ball in his gut, grinding as it grew, way you grind stuff out, just a hack, always will be.

Somehow he paid and made his way to the exit, the ball rolling, the rage swelling, the rain falling.

Kevin blinked. There hadn’t been any sign of rain when he arrived. But then there hadn’t been any sign of Fargo’s pretended pity or that insulting suggestion to sell out, betray his talent for thirty pieces of silver. All right, so it was thirty thousand pieces. Probably came to about ten percent of what Fargo was getting as an advance alone. He'd still end up with most of the money, and all of the glory.

Hell with it. Hell with him. Hell with this goddam rain, coming down in buckets, turning the damn' potholes into swimming pools. Dark as pitch, too; no light except the one way down at the corner. Where was his car parked? Oh yeah, down here. Next question—where're the keys? Got 'em. Final question—how'd you get so loaded?

And loaded he was. Load in his gut. Stop rolling. Put key in ignition and start rolling. Now.

Windshield wipers working. Back and forth, to and fro. Don't look at them, dummy—look past them. Keep your eye on the road. Potholes. Water. Splashing.

There, that's better. Car revving up, stomach settling down. Forget Fargo. Forget the bastard playing him for a sucker, laughing up his sleeve all the way to the bank.

It didn't matter, didn't matter a damn. Into each life some rain must fall and that's what mattered now, rain on the windshield, headlight beams blurring across puddles in the street, flashing over the figure that staggered out from the crosswalk and slipped on the wet pavement.

Fargo fell, in what seemed like slow-motion.

Everything happened in slow-motion, except the sudden resurgence of rage. It was still there after all, but it wasn't still, it was rolling, the car was rolling, hands whirling the wheel, foot flooring the gas-pedal.

A crunch, a bump, a shriek of brakes. And then he was around the corner, gunning the motor, don't look now, they may be gaining on you.

But they didn't gain.

Kevin could grin because they'd never gained on him, not in ten years. If they had, of course, he'd have explained it was an accident.

At the time, in his drunken and panic-induced flight, he'd really believed this, or wanted to. Not until long afterward did he admit it was murder.

In a way it was actually premeditated murder, because he'd killed Fargo many times before, in his dreams. Of course nobody knew about the dreams, let alone the reality.

Nobody knew he and Fargo were meeting. And when they did, neither had been recognized in the crowded restaurant. They weren't seen arriving or leaving together. And there were no witnesses on the rainy street when a drunken pedestrian was struck down in the dark by some hit-and-run driver.

Kevin had committed what mystery-writers strive to achieve—the perfect crime.

How about a Wizard Award for that? Or at the very least, perhaps a Sorcerer's Apprentice?

He lifted his glass to the fat face framed on the wall before him, then drank deeply. Cheap wine, and bitter; not at all comparable to the cognac he'd enjoyed during that last meeting with Fargo a decade ago. And yet bitter was better, infinitely better, because it quenched his thirst. Years and years of thirst for just this moment, the moment of triumph.

Kevin gripped the lumpy neck of the straw-wrapped bottle and refilled his glass before moving on past Fargo's wall-eyed stare. Carrying the Chianti with him for convenience's sake, for old times' sake, he scanned the corkboard for a faded Polaroid print of Arthur Rondbeck in out-of-focus closeup.

This face was thin and drawn, just as he remembered it, the face of a diabetic asthmatic cancer-riddled and heart-damaged hypochondriac.

Even as a young man Rondbeck had never enjoyed good health when he could revel in illness. Here was someone who purchased pills for extra energy but lacked the strength to swallow them: a man who was too tired to lie down. And yet, Kevin noted, he was probably the most prolific member of the Skull Club group. The only problem being it seemed hard to tell if his work was the product of a word-processor or an enema.

Where had he found time to turn out a book of critical essays on his fellow writers, and why would a publisher accept him as an authority? But a publisher did accept him, and his manuscript too.

Kevin squinted up at the Polaroid, trying to bring Rondbeck's bleached-out features into focus. What had that sallow face looked like seven years ago?

For the life of him he couldn't recall; apparently he lacked a photographic memory. But he did remember the letter Rondbeck sent him with a copy of the chapter on Kevin's work, a labor of love entitled Blood Brothers. And seven years later he still remembered that enclosure, every vicious word of it. Words like derivative, stock characterization, predictability, over-obvious plots. The labor of love was actually a labor of hate.

But Rondbeck hadn't sent the chapter to ask for an opinion; what he wanted was verification of biographical data dealing with Kevin's career which preceded the pages that demolished it.

His letter had arrived on a bad day. Kevin's immediate impulse was to pick up the phone and, for the first time in many years, communicate with his old friend—communicate his anger at this unprovoked and unwarranted attack. But as luck would have it, the phone was disconnected and would remain so until he paid his long-overdue bill. And that wasn't about to happen until Kevin finished the novelization, also overdue, of the sleazo film-script he'd been stuck with.

His second impulse, to write Rondbeck a letter of rebuttal concerning his errors of judgment as well as fact, was equally impractical, because that very morning his typewriter had conked out. Another three days and God knows how many dollars shot to hell, no wonder he had one of those pounding headaches, now on top of everything else this letter arriving to make his day—

There was only one thing to do; drive out to West LA and confront Rondbeck face to face. Tell him that under no circumstances would he allow such an attack to be published. With this kind of garbage spread around, pretty soon Kevin wouldn't even get assignments to novelize bad movies, let alone contracts for books of his own.

Driving west, Kevin's anger mounted as the sun sank, its slanted rays blinding him as he crawled through the homeward-bound traffic.

Blinding. But he could see Rondbeck plainly enough, standing in the abandoned hallway after he opened the front door of the old two-story house just north of Pico.

See but not hear, because of the pounding in his head. Pounding headache. Didn't have to hear, because just the sight of that stupid face and sickly grin told him all he needed to know, more than he needed to know about Rondbeck's motives, about his deliberate attempt to smear his name, his reputation, his whole damned life-work. Kevin told himself not to listen, and he didn't listen, but all the while Rondbeck kept on talking, talking as he led the way up the stairs and into his workroom. Here was the printer fed by the word-processor, here was the word-processor fed by the stupid, grinning character-assassin who couldn't stop talking because he was afraid.

Yes, that was it, Kevin could see it now; the fear behind the grin, the apprehension in the eyes, the alarm. There must have been something in his own face, his own silence, which triggered the alarm to go off and sent Rondbeck into a flurry of excuses, explanations, apologies.

And without needing or heeding the actual words, Kevin knew what Arthur Rondbeck was saying and why. He'd turned off deliberately because he didn't want to get the message, there was only one way to deal with the headache, get rid of it, stop the pounding, and now that his mind was made up there was no point getting confused by apologies.

There'd been enough confusion anyway, and Kevin had to make a deliberate effort to keep calm. Cool, calm and collected. Don't do whatever you did with your face to scare Rondbeck that way, keep your voice down, just tell the man it was all a mistake, your turn to apologize, let bygones be bygones, we'll both forget it ever happened, sorry but I've a pounding headache, got to go now.

Go to the hall. Go to the landing. Let Rondbeck lead the way. And over the pounding, when push comes to shove—

The crash.

The crash as the railing gave way, the sudden gasp, the rush of air, the thud.

Sprawled at the foot of the stairs far below, neck twisted to an impossible angle, lay the figure. The body. The corpse.

That's all it was now, just a cold, contorted thing, its head stamped with a bloody caricature of Arthur Rondbeck's face. The grin was gone. And so was the grinner.

Kevin was gone too, as soon as he'd run his handkerchief over the inner and outer doorknobs and made sure the front door itself was locked behind him.

He looked around for his car and couldn't see it. For a moment he froze, then relaxed, realizing he'd parked around the corner.

It wasn't until he was almost home that he realized something else. There'd been no reason for him to park where he did. No conscious reason, because he'd been hiding it behind the headache. Behind the headache was the rage and behind the rage was the reality. He'd gone to Rondbeck intending to kill him from the very first.

Another premeditated murder? But how could that be? He hadn't planned anything in detail, any more than he'd planned the death of Roy Fargo. Murder involved a risk that should only be taken when fully warranted, when utterly necessary to eliminate a threat or an enemy.

Or a rival?

Kevin saluted Rondbeck's photo-face with a full glass, then remedied its emptiness before moving on.

Seven years ago he'd confronted the rationale of his behavior. Or misbehavior; it didn't matter which. What mattered was that Fargo and Rondbeck were dead. Just as he wanted them to be, just as he wanted all of them to be, because they were the ones who drank the wine of life and left him the dregs, but he'd have the last laugh, the last laugh after they'd drawn their last breaths.

And they would, all of them. Once he'd made that resolve he was willing to wait. And wait he did, without fear of suspicion; two of his four rivals were in their graves and neither had risen to point a bony finger at him.

Rondbeck's death, recorded as accidental, was scarcely incidental, and merited only brief mention in fine print. But both Lloyd Everly and Jesse Cross had been the subjects of occasional interviews. In recalling their early careers, each made a passing reference to the Skull Club. Just a few words of nostalgia, yet one never knew; if a third and a fourth member met accidental death in the near future, somebody checking old news articles for an obit could note the tie-in, perhaps even get curious about the survivors.

So best to wait, Kevin had decided. There was no personal reason to resent those two as he had the others; it was only their success he hated.

Only their success, and his failure. Neither had been deserved, but then everything's a matter of luck, and if you want justice you have to go after it yourself. Even if it means waiting five more years.

That's how long Kevin waited before he paid his visit to Lloyd Everly. Five long years of reading and hearing about Everly's latest novels and movie sales, with no consolation for Kevin except the knowledge that time was on his side. Everly's appearances on television talkshows revealed a steadily-receding hairline and a steadily-advancing network of wrinkles. If Kevin's tentative plans worked out, death from natural causes would be a logical verdict. And he'd no longer have to put up with the sight of that aging have-a-good-day face on the TV screen. It was bad enough seeing the autographed photo on the corkboard with a printed signature if you please, or even if you don't please.

Kevin hadn't requested anything at all; the glossy 8x10 showed up unannounced and uninvited in the day's mail. That's what did it—the photo and the accompanying message.

Compadre:

Long time no, si?

Thought you might like this. Why don't we get together one of these days and compare swimmingpools?

—Lloyd.

Yes, that's what did it, all right. Only a jerk like Everly would come up with a smart-ass way to point out he had a pool and Kevin didn't, never would. But unwittingly he'd pointed out something else: the method for murder.

Discarding his earlier plan, Kevin made his move. This time he prepared in advance. Three days beforehand he cased the dead-end street in the pricey neighborhood abutting Bel Air. A block away from the house was an ideal place to park without being seen by traffic, because there wasn't any. His next move required immobility, sitting in the car for two full days to learn the comings and goings of local residents, their gardeners or other hired help. He noted no nannies or other live-ins; Everly himself was a widower who'd lived alone here since his wife died, so that didn't complicate matters. Some of his neighbors employed maids or cleaningladies, but they all cut out sometime between four and five, when the wives came home from Rodeo Drive. It wasn't until six or later that the husbands drove in from Century City and the Cedars-Sinai Medical Complex.

Obviously the safest interval would be from five to six. He mustn't call about stopping by until just before driving up; that way left less chance of Everly mentioning his impending visit to anyone else. The rest was obvious. Wear washable jeans and jacket, and don't forget the rubber gloves.

Kevin chuckled as he thought back on it now. Old Haji never wore rubber gloves, but that's what he was doing—playing Haji. Just the way Otis Skinner and Ronald Colman played him in those ancient movies, just the way Alfred Drake did in the old musical they'd made out of Kismet.

Funny that he'd remembered their big scene, and now he got the chance to do it himself. Grabbing the villain and silently submerging his head in the pool until he drowned, then pushing the body in. So simple, once Everly let him in and they had a quiet poolside drink together. Whisky straight, that's what Lloyd Everly wanted, but he ended up with water for a chaser. Lots and lots of water.

Remembering it, Kevin almost choked on his drink. The way Everly had choked, but it wasn't all that funny to him. Kismet means fate in Arabic, doesn't it? Well he met his fate all right. And it was all right, no problems except to carry away the second glass so as to leave no evidence of a visitor when the pool-man came by two days later and found his employer drowned.

So Everly had been liquidated. Clever phrase, clever method, clever man; Kevin felt a surge of self-appreciation, or was it just the wine?

But no, he wouldn't be here drinking the wine if he hadn't been the cleverest of the lot. Fargo, Rondbeck, Everly—all so-called mystery writers, but none of them could come up with complex plots and simple solutions. All they'd done in their careers was to go with the flow—the flow of blood, the rising red tide of—

Why the lecture? This was supposed to be a celebration. "God bless," Kevin said, gesturing toward Everly's photo with his empty glass and refilling it from the halfempty bottle. Half-empty? No wonder he had this warm feeling, felt good all over.

That's how he'd felt after Everly was deep-sixed two years ago, because it was almost all over. Only one other survivor to deal with, down and dirty, just slip him the Ace of Spades.

Kevin had waited so long with the others, so patiently, but these past two years had been real torture. Or imaginary torture, because he was always thinking about what he'd do when he finally got his shot at Jesse George.

It wouldn't be an actual shot, of course; nothing that obvious. Or that quick. Timing was everything. Perhaps he could use a variation of the method he'd worked out for Everly before the pool idea came to him. But whatever he decided on, he'd have to cool it before he cooled Jesse. And there were problems.

One of the problems was a young wife Jesse had recently acquired, some little bimbo with naturally-stringy hair and the usual wifely problem of her own—there wasn't any room in her clothes-closet and she didn't have a thing to wear. Kevin picked up these fascinating tidbits from gossip columns in literary journals sold at supermarket checkout counters.

True or false, the setup made for complications, but Kevin knew simplicity was still his best bet. Only it couldn't be a bet, couldn't be a gamble; he needed a sure thing. Which was why waiting became torment as he tried figuring how to mark the cards, load the dice, rig the game.

Up to now Jesse looked like the winner. He'd always been the biggest winner of the whole gang, and during the past two years his success seemed incredible as he made the complete career-leap, from the Skull Club to the Book-of-the-Month Club. The novel following stayed on the chart for nineteen weeks, then sold to films on a deal that included a percentage of the gross.

Halting before the fourth picture, Kevin peered at it with narrowed eyes. Hard to make out because it wasn't even a photograph, just a caricature from some article in a magazine he'd stolen from his dentist's receptionroom. Over the years Kevin hadn't found any photos; old Jesse was either camera-shy or just plain cautious. It might be both, because he didn't do TV or book-signings or any personal appearance shots. His success had come without any Wizard Awards, critical acclaim or paid publicity. In spite of the news items about his career, he shunned the spotlight.

Maybe it was smart to play it that way, living somewhere in the mountains up near Santa Barbara and avoiding the Hollywood scene. Safer too, because Kevin had all this trouble finding a way to kill him.

And when he finally did—or thought he did—old Jesse outfoxed him again. Just like that, no warning, he dropped dead. Keeled over from a heart attack right there in his own home, only a week ago.

"Party-pooper!"

Kevin lifted his glass with a frown of annoyance. He'd really been looking forward to taking care of Jesse himself, closing the books on his Book-of-the-Month, out-grossing that gross-out film.

He hadn’t read the book or seen the movie, but it didn’t matter. What mattered was that others did, thousands of readers, millions of filmgoers. Jesse George got fame and acclaim, and though he never sought celebrity, hundreds of mourners were at his graveside.

If Kevin ever had a funeral, it would be attended by a crowd estimated at nearly twelve people. Which wasn’t fair, seeing as how the others, except for Jesse, wouldn’t even have had funerals if it weren’t for his efforts. Efforts which were, as usual, unappreciated and anonymous. Story of his life.

Kevin squinted at the caricature on the corkboard and the caricature squinted back. Ugly artwork. Now that all four of the other Skull Club members were gone he could take their pictures down, tear them up. Too bad he never got a chance to tear up the real Jesse. It would have been great, seeing him die, feeling the surge of adrenaline, the taste of triumph on the tongue.

That was the secret, wasn’t it? All these years, this lifetime, writing about psychopaths and never knowing why they did what they did or what they actually got out of their efforts. But he knew now.

He knew the greatest moment was when the anger or envy that drove you to the deed disappeared in the doing. All those inhibiting emotions vanished; there was no fear, no shame, no guilt, no empathy for anyone or any thing. To inflict rather than endure—that was the real victory. Which was more than Roy Fargo, Arthur Rondbeck, Lloyd Everly and Jesse George would ever learn. They’d lost, he’d won. Let them keep their fame, he had the game.

Damn betcha, he’d won. That’s why he was here now. And here he’d stay. Maybe get rid of Tischler next, just in case that legal mind of his started working overtime. No law said he had to stop with the lawyer, either. He could go on to anyone he liked. Or disliked. Truth is, each time had been easier, kept getting better and better, and—admit it—now he wanted to go on.

In vino veritas. Damn betcha.

Nodding, Kevin raised his hand again and the wine sloshed in the glass. “Easy does it,” he said, suppressing a belch. Little too much of that vino veritas. But who had a better right? Not this imitation Rogues’ Gallery on the wall, these phonies pretending they understood what they wrote about. All they ever did was write. He was the only one who lived it.

“So this time, here’s to me,” he told himself. And gulped.

The drink really hit him. Sledgehammer wrapped in cottonwool. Better lay off, too much booze.

Kevin tightened his grip on the bottle in its straw wrapper, its straw cradle. Like Jesus. Little Lord Jesus in the cradle on Holy Night, when the Wise Men came.

But he was the wisest, not those fools on the wall. Hot in here. And hard to hang on to the wine. Why did they always wrap Chianti in straw? And why was the straw creased on one side?

Wait a minute. There was something stuck underneath there, wedged down, only the edge of the corner showing. See if you can grab hold and pull it out. Careful, don’t tear it.

Kevin tugged and freed a sheet of blue paper; it was folded over, just thick enough to make a slight bulge under the straw. Did somebody put it there on purpose, to be found?

A letter, that’s what it was. Goddam handwritten letter. Hard to see in this light, hard to make out the words. But the salutation, whatever they call it, was his name.

Dear Kevin:

Just a line to congratulate you. Because it is you, right?

When Fargo died I wondered a little, but accidents happen. And when Rondbeck fell victim to another accident I began to wonder more. Nothing to go on, just a hunch, but if there was anything at all to my crazy idea, the logical suspect was Lloyd Everly.

Then Everly became the third accidental death, and I knew. Knew what you were doing, knew what you were after.

Kevin blinked, trying to clear his vision, clear his thoughts. Jesse was the letter-writer. But what was he trying to do, prove how smart he was? Much good it did—he was dead like the others, and dead is dumb.

Kevin peered down again, peered at squiggly lines on crumpled paper.

I knew Ed be next, so Em getting out of town, going where you won't be likely to find me. But if something goes wrong, chances are you'll be reading this and gloating over winning. I can understand, because the two of us are basically very much alike. And as they say, it takes one to know one.

Again, heartiest congratulations,
Jesse

Yes, it really said that. Heartiest congratulations! Kevin had to laugh, laughed so hard he couldn't stop, laughed until his sides hurt. Sides and stomach and chest. The room started to spin and he slid down the side of the wall, clenching his fists. Through blurring eyes he saw that he'd dropped the letter as he fell, turning the page over to expose what was written on the other side. Through shimmering waves of pain he read the final words.

P.S.:
Sorry you missed old Tischler's party. I went, but he didn't notice me in that mob-scene. It was easy to sneak into his private office without being seen. After all, it only took a few minutes—just long enough to find the bottle, pull the cork, and poison the wine.

1994

The Scent of Vinegar

ROBERT BLOCH was born in Chicago but lived in Los Angeles for many years. His interest in horror first blossomed when he originally saw Lon Chaney, Sr's performance in the 1925 version of The Phantom of the Opera. After discovering the pulp magazine Weird Tales, he began corresponding with author H.P. Lovecraft, who advised him to try his own hand at writing fiction. The rest, as they say, is history.

After his first story was published in 1934, Bloch quickly established himself as a popular and prolific short story writer, and by the 1940s he had begun to develop his own unique style of twisted psychological horror and grim graveyard humour. Although he wrote more than two dozen novels, hundreds of short stories, and numerous scripts for TV and movies, he will always be identified with his 1959 novel Psycho and Alfred Hitchcock's subsequent film version. His wonderfully entertaining autobiography, Once Around the Bloch, was published in 1993.

"Writing my autobiography was fun," he wrote in the October 1994 Omni. "Living it was not always that entertaining. Actually, I was writing in self-defence. As a longtime fantasy writer I was aware of my eminent colleagues in the field, and while I couldn't compare my work to that of an Edgar Allan Poe or an H.P. Lovecraft, I did share one thing with them in common—a vulnerability to the biographers who could come up with their own version of a life-story after its subject was no longer around to dispute what was said. I preferred to tell the truth as I saw it."

Robert Bloch died on 23 September 1994. He had confided to friends that the doctors had told him a few months earlier, "I could play with fireworks, but I shouldn't plan on trick or treating." As the following Bram Stoker Award-winning story proves, in a career that spanned an amazing seven decades, he was still a master of his craft up until the end . . .

EVERY SATURDAY NIGHT Tim and Bernie went bowling at the whorehouse.

"It didn't look like a whorehouse," Bernie said. "At least not any more than the places most of us lived in back then. And the damn thing was perched so high above Beverly Hills you'd have to look down to see King Vidor's spread." The old man glanced at Greg, the cigar in his hand semaphoring apology. "Sorry, I keep forgetting we're talking 1949. You've probably never even heard of the man."

"King Vidor." Greg paused. "He directed The Big Parade. And Bette Davis in Beyond the Forest, the picture where she says 'What a dump!' Right?"

Bernie aimed the cigar at Greg. "How old are you?"

"Twenty-six."

"I'm seventy-six." Bernie's eyes narrowed behind his hornrims. "Where'd you hear about Vidor?"

"Same place I heard about you," Greg said. "I'm a student of Hollywood history."

"And whorehouses." Bernie's dry chuckle rose, then ceased as pursed lips puffed on the cigar.

Greg Kolmer grinned. "They're part of Hollywood history too. The part I couldn't find in books."

Bernie was nodding. "In those days everything was hush-hush, and if you didn't keep your mouth shut, Howard Strickling shut it for you."

"Wasn't he publicity director at MGM?"

"Right again." Bernie's cigar gestured benediction. "He's the guy who said the first duty of a publicity man is to keep the news out of the paper."

Another chuckle. “He knew everything. Including where Tim and I did our bowling.”

“Was it really that big of a deal? I mean, all those stories about living it up out here—”

“—are true,” Bernie said. “You think sex was invented by Madonna or some hot-dog computer hacks over at Cal Tech? Let me tell you, in the old days we had it all. Straights, gays, bi-, tri-: anything you wanted, you could get. You bring the ladder, we furnish the giraffe.”

“Then why were you covering up?”

“Censorship. Simple as that. Everybody knew the rules and cooperated, or else. Tim and I were in management at the same studio; not top-level, but our names were on parking slots. So we weren’t going to risk the ‘or else’ part, if you follow me.”

Greg nodded, concealing his impatience. Because that was the only way to get Bernie to tell him what he really wanted to hear. And Bernie would tell him, sooner or later, because he had nothing else to do, sitting in this rundown old house on the wrong side of Wilshire with no friends to talk to, because you can’t talk to the dead. Which is probably why he’d agreed to talk to Greg, was talking to him now.

“You take the stars,” Bernie was saying. “The smart ones never fooled around with anybody under contract on their own lot. Getting involved with somebody you were liable to see every day was too risky; too much pressure, and you couldn’t just walk away. So they patronized the hook-shops.” Bernie’s face crumpled in an old man’s grin. “What do you suppose the folks in Peoria would say if they knew their favorite loverboy had to pay to play, just like the guy next door?”

“I doubt if many people in Peoria went to brothels in those days,” Greg said.

“Maybe not.” Bernie flicked cigar ash as he spoke. “But we did. Tim and I hung out at Kitty Earnshaw’s. Great old broad, a million laughs.”

Greg leaned forward. At last. Now it’s coming. “The one who had this house up in the hills you were talking about?”

“Right. Kitty was the best. And her girls were user-friendly.”

“Where was this place?”

Bernie spiraled his cigar in a northerly direction and more ash fell carpetward. “Way off Benedict Canyon somewhere, past Angelo. Been more than forty years since I’ve been up there, I don’t remember—”

“Why’d you stop going?”

“Kitty Earnshaw retired, got married or religion or something. The new management was different, everyone Oriental. Not just Japs or Chinese, but girls from places like Burma, Singapore, Java, all over. Woman in charge never showed her face when I was there, but I heard stories. Marquess de Sade, that’s what they called her.”

“Marquis de Sade?”

“Marqu*ess*. A gag, I guess. But the place was getting a little too kinky for me. Like the night I met some drunk down at the bar and he says, ‘You pick a girl yet? Take the one with the glass eye—she gives good socket.’ ”

Bernie shrugged. “Maybe that was a gag too, but I saw enough to make me start wondering. The chains and bondage scene—you know, with the little whips and the handcuffs on the bedposts, all four of them, and the Swiss Army knives. Anyhow, I stopped going there.”

“And your friend Tim?”

“I don’t know. Studio dropped him when television took over out here. What happened to him after that I can’t say.”

“Did you ever try to find out?”

The old man stubbed his cigar in the ashtray. “Look, Mr Kolmer, I’m getting a little tired, so if you don’t mind—”

“I understand, sir.” Greg smiled. “And I want to thank you. You’ve been very helpful.” He rose. “Just one other thing. The location of this place we’ve been talking about. If you could be more specific—”

Bernie frowned. “All I remember, it was east of Benedict. Dirt road, probably been washed out for years now.” He hesitated. “Come to think, the place must have been burned out in that big fire back in the Sixties.”

“I could look it up,” Greg said. “Fire Department records.”

"Don't waste your time. The place wasn't even in Beverly Hills city limits, or L.A. either. Area up there is no-man's-land, which is why the house could operate. Nobody was sure who had jurisdiction."

"I see." Greg turned. "Thanks again."

The old man walked him to the door. "Don't do it," he said.

"Do what?"

"Don't try going up there. Look, it's none of my affair. But for your own good I'm telling you—"

"Telling me or warning me?"

"Call it advice. From somebody who knows."

"Knows what?"

The old man smiled, but his voice was somber. "That house up there is no place to take a bowling ball."

Greg didn't go up there with a bowling ball.

He didn't even take a Thomas map, because the place Bernie Tanner had told him about wasn't on the map. The area was blank, which meant there was no access unless Greg could locate that dirt road, which might or might not still exist.

It took Greg almost two hours of cursing up and down Benedict before he found the path. And it was scarcely more than that, at best a winding trail. The entrance was so overgrown with scrub that it couldn't be seen from the lane leading to it, and the stretch spiraling around the hillside was invisible from below, choked with weed and sage.

At first Greg wasn't sure it was wide enough even for his small car, but he had to chance it; chance the ruts and ridges and clumps of vegetation that punished tires and driver alike as the little hatchback went into a slow low. Without air-conditioning it was like trying to breathe with a plastic bag over your head, and by the time he was halfway up the hillside he wished he hadn't started.

Or almost wished. Only the thought of what might be on the summit kept him going, through the stifle of heat and the buzz of insect swarm.

The car stalled abruptly, and Greg broke into panic-ooze. Then the transmission kicked in again, and he sweated some more as a bump in the road sent the hatchback veering left, pitching Greg against the door. Beneath underbrush bordering a curve he caught a sudden sickening glimpse of the emptiness just beyond the edge, an emptiness ending in a tangle of treetops a thousand feet below.

Greg fought the wheel, and the car lurched back on an even course. The road must have been better in the old days; even so, it was one bitch of a trip to make just to go bowling. But that was Bernie Tanner's business and Bernie Tanner's road.

Greg's own road stretched back a lot farther than the bottom of this hill, all the way back to Tex Taylor, a onetime cowboy star at the Motion Picture Country Home. He had all those stories about the old days in Hollywood, and that's all Greg had wanted at first: just some kind of lead-in he could work up into a piece for one of those checkout-counter rags. He'd been selling that kind of stuff long enough to get used to the idea he'd never win a Pulitzer Prize.

But what the dying western wino told him gave sudden startling hope of another kind of prize—one that might have awaited presentation for nearly half a century up there at what Tex Taylor called the House of Pain. That's what he said its name was, after the Asian woman took over and began to give quality time to S-and-M freaks. Maybe it was all a crock, but it sounded possible, certainly worth a trip up there to find out.

Trouble was that Tex Taylor was borderline senile and couldn't remember exactly where this weirdo whorehouse was located. But he did, finally, come up with the name of somebody he'd seen there in the glory days. And that's how Greg got hold of Bernie Tanner.

Greg wondered if Bernie had any money. Today anything with a Beverly Hills address could probably fetch a mil or so on the current market. Maybe Bernie would pay him a mil or so just for old time's sake, just out of pride.

And there were others like Bernie still around, stars and directors and producers who were bankable way back when; some of them had saved their money or put it into real estate and led comfortable, quiet lives in Bel Air or Holmby Hills. If Bernie would pay a million, how much would all the others be willing to fork over, given the proper motivation?

Greg grinned at the thought. And then, as the car swung around the last curve, his grin widened.

He had reached the summit. And on the summit was the house.

Hey, it wasn't the Taj Mahal or Buckingham Palace or even the men's washroom at the Universal Tour. But the bottom line was it hadn't burned or gone down in an earthquake or been bulldozed by a developer. It was still here, standing in shadowy silhouette against the late afternoon sun.

Greg took a flashlight from the glove compartment and clipped it to his belt. Then he reached into the compartment again and found there was just enough left in the envelope for a little toot, enough to keep him bright-eyed and bushy-tailed while he did whatever he'd have to do up here. He waited for the rush, then got out and lifted the hood to let the steam escape. There'd be no water up here, and probably no gas or electricity; they must have had their own generator.

He stared up at the two-story structure. Frame, of course; nobody could have hauled machinery here for stone or concrete construction. The roof had lost its share of shingles, and paint peeled from boards that had once been white, but the building's bulk was impressive. Half a dozen boarded-up windows were ranked on either side of the front door: tall windows for a tall house. Greg closed his eyes and for a moment day was night and the windows blazed with the light of a thousand candles, the front door opened wide in welcome, the classic cars rolled up the driveway, headlights aglitter, wheels gleaming with chrome. And off behind the distant hills the moon was rising, rising over the House of Pain.

It was the toot, of course, and now moonlight shimmered into sunlight and he was back in the teeth of searing heat, radiator-boil, insect-buzz.

Greg walked over to the double door. Its weathered, sun-blistered surface barred intrusion, and at waist level the divided doors were secured by lock and chain. Both were rusty; too much to expect that he could just walk up and yank his way in.

But it happened. The chain gave, then came free in his fist, covering his palm and fingers with powdery particles of rust from the parted links. He tugged and the door swung outward. Hinges screeched.

Greg was in the house and the house was in him.

Its shadows entered his eyes, its silence invaded his ears, its dust and decay filled his lungs. How long had it been since these windows were first boarded, this door locked? How many years had the house stood empty in the dark? Houses that once were thronged with people, throbbed to their pleasure and their pain—houses like this were hungry for life.

Greg withdrew the flashlight from his belt, flicking it on and fanning the beam for inspection. What a dump!

He was standing in a foyer with a solid wall directly ahead, archways opening at left and right. He moved right, along a carpet thickly strewn with dust long undisturbed, and found himself in a room that he imagined must take up most of this wing. A huge Oriental rug covered the floor; its design was obscured and fraying, but Greg thought he could detect the outline of a dragon. Sofas and chairs were grouped along three sides beneath gilt-framed paintings which, Greg noted, might have served as centerfolds for the Kama Sutra. Angled at the far corner was a piano, a concert grand. Once upon a time somebody had spent a lot of money furnishing this place, but right now it needed maid service.

Greg's flashlight crawled the walls, searching for shelves and bookcases, but there were none. The fourth side of the room was covered by a row of tattered drapes hung before the boarded-up windows. The drapery may also have displayed the dragon pattern, but outlines had faded; its fiery breath was long extinguished.

Greg crossed the foyer and went into the other wing. It turned out to be a bar, and at one time may have resembled Rick's place in Casablanca, but now the set was struck. The room was a tangle of up-ended tables and overturned wooden chairs, flanked by booths on two walls and tattered drapery on the third. Along the fourth wall was the bar, with a big mirror behind it, bordered on both sides by shelves and cupboards that had once displayed bottles and glasses but now held only heaps of shard. The mirror itself was cracked and mottled with mold. Here's looking at you, kid.

At one side of the bar a door led to what must have been the kitchen; on the other side an archway framed the base of a staircase beyond. Skirting the maze of tables and chairs, Greg headed for the archway. Upstairs would be the bedrooms and maybe the private quarters of the Marquess or whatever she called herself. The place looked as if it had been abandoned in a hurry; the padlocked door and boarded-up windows may have been the results of a return visit. But why leave all the furnishings? Greg had no answer, but he hoped to find one. And find what else might also have been abandoned.

The stairs' worn padding muffled his footsteps, but creaking began when he reached the long hallway off the upper landing. It echoed again as he opened and closed the doors lining both sides of the corridor.

All led to bedrooms, each with its own indecorous decor. Here lay a round bed surrounded and surmounted by mirrors, but the sumptuous bedspread was riddled with moth-holes and the mirrors reflected only the light of Greg's flashlight beam. In another room stood a bare marble slab with metal cuffs and an assortment of chains hanging from ends and sides. The marble top was flecked, the metal attachments reddened with rust, not blood. And the whips on the wall rack dangled impotently; the case of knives and needles and surgical shears held pain captive through the empty years.

Empty years, empty rooms. Wall-mural obscenities turned into absurdities by the crisscross of cracks, the random censorship of fading over decades of decay.

But where were those private quarters: an office, someplace to keep the books, the files, the cash, and maybe—just maybe—what he was looking for? He hadn't gone through all this just to chase shadows. What the hell was he doing here anyway, prowling through a deserted whorehouse at sunset? The johns didn't come to these places looking for starkness and desolation; tricks were supposed to be welcomed. But what had he found except rot and ruin, a bar full of broken bottles, a parlor piano that grinned at him with keys like rows of yellowed teeth? Damn it, why didn't somebody tend to a customer? Company, girls!

Greg came to the end of the corridor, reached the last room on the left. There was nothing here now, and maybe never had been. Tex Taylor was lying, the old rummy had no proof, and he was just doing a number like the old ham he was, using Greg as an audience for the big deathbed-revelation scene. Who said people had to tell the truth just because they were dying?

He opened the door on a bedroom just like all the others, dark and deserted: bare walls and bare bureau top, empty chair and empty bed.

At least that's what he thought at first glance. But when he looked again he saw the shadow. A dark shadow, lying on the bed.

And now, in the flashlight's beam, the shadow turned to gold.

There was a golden girl lying on the bed, a golden girl with a jet-black halo of hair framing an almost feline face—slanted eyes closed in slumber above high cheekbones, coral curvature of lips relaxed in repose. The flashlight beam swept across her nudity, its light lending luster to the gold of her flesh.

Only one detail marred perfection. As Greg stared down he saw the spider. The big black spider, emerging from her pubic nest and crawling slowly upward across her naked belly.

Greg stifled his gasp as he realized the girl was dead.

She opened her eyes.

She opened her eyes and smiled up at him, opened her mouth and flicked a thin pink tongue in a sensual circle over the coral lips. Her smile widened, revealing twin razor-rows of teeth.

Now, still smiling, the girl sat up. She raised both arms, hands coming to rest on either side of the throat hidden by the dark tumble of her hair. The long fingers splayed, tightening their grip as if trying to wrench the head free.

Then the girl tugged, lifting her head off her neck.

She was still smiling.

And Greg was still gasping as he turned, stumbled from the room, down the hall and the stairs, through the littered bar below, the cobwebbed foyer. Then the door at last: open fast, don't look back, slam it tight.

The house had been dark, but now it was dark outside as well, and Greg was grateful he'd somehow managed to retain his flashlight. He ran to the car, keyed the ignition, sent the hatchback circling to the spot where the road wound down, down in the dark, around narrow curves, twisting trees. It didn't matter as long as he kept going down, going away from there, that place and that thing he'd seen—

Or thought he'd seen.

Someone doesn't just reach up and lift her head off her neck; nobody can do such a thing, loosening the red, blood-choked strands of the arteries and the darker filaments of veins all twined against the central cord of the esophagus with a flashlight beam shining on its coating of slime. You don't imagine details like that, you have to see them. And he had seen, it had happened, this was real.

But what was it?

Greg didn't know, but Bernie would. That had to be why the old man warned him about going up there, going to where it waited in the dark.

The clock on the dash told Greg it was 9:30. Most elderly people go to bed early, but a few stay up for the news. And tonight Bernie would be one of them, because Greg had news for him.

It took a half-hour to get down, but by the time he pulled up, parked and knocked on the front door his course was clear: this time he was going to get some answers.

The door opened on Bernie Tanner's startled stare. "Mr Kolmer?" There was surprise in his voice, whisky on his breath.

"Didn't think I'd be back?" Greg said. "Thought she'd get me, is that it?"

“I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Don’t hand me that!” Greg’s voice rose.

“Please, not so loud. I got neighbors—”

“You’ll get new ones in Forest Lawn if you try to dump on me again.” Greg tugged at the door. “Open up.”

Bernie obeyed quickly, then closed the door even more quickly after his self-invited guest had entered. Turning, the old man lurched toward his chair. Greg noted the bottle on the table and the half-filled tumbler beside it. The old man picked up his glass and gestured. “Drink?”

“Never mind that.” Greg seated himself on the sofa; its faded fabric reeked of alcohol and stale cigar smoke. “Let’s have it,” he said.

Bernie avoided his gaze. “Look, if something’s wrong it’s not my fault. I told you not to go up there.”

“Sure. But it’s what you didn’t tell me that made trouble.”

The old man shook his head. “I didn’t think you’d go. I didn’t think you or anyone else could find the place, even if it was still standing after—”

“After what?”

Bernie tried to push the question away with his hand. “Look, I told you all I can—”

“Maybe you’ll have more to say after I steer the law up there to take a look around.”

Bernie gulped air, then gulped the contents of his glass. “All right, I’ll level. That place didn’t close down because the madam got married. She got murdered.”

“Keep talking.”

The old man poured himself another drink. “This fella Tim, the one I told you used to go up there with me. I said I didn’t know what became of him after I quit going. Well, I lied.”

“Why?”

“I didn’t want to get involved. It happened so long ago and it wouldn’t do any good. You’d figure I was crazy, the way I figured Tim was when he told me.”

“Told you what?”

“About the hookers up there, the Orientals the new madam brought in. He said they were some kind of vampires. If you dozed off, fell asleep, they’d suck your blood.” The old man paused. “He showed me toothmarks on his neck.”

“He should have gone to the police.”

“Do you think they’d believe him any more than I did? Instead he went to Trenk, Ulrich Trenk—you wouldn’t remember him, he did some horror flicks for the indies back then.”

“Blood of the Beast.” Greg nodded. “Crawlers. I know the titles but I never saw them.”

“Nobody did,” Bernie said. “They got shelved before release. And so did Trenk. His stuff was too strong for those days. Trouble with him, he believed in what he did—not the lousy scripts, but the premises. Ghosts, vampires, werewolves, all that crap. And he believed Tim, because he’d heard some other things about the place up there, about the way bats flew around and—”

“Never mind that. Tell me what happened!”

Bernie reached for his drink. “Word was that Trenk went up there with Tim and three other guys who’d been customers and got suspicious; of what, God only knows. But there was some kind of hassle and the bottom line is the place closed down, everybody left, end of story.”

“I thought you said the madam was murdered.” Bernie frowned. “Tim told me he’d been the one who killed her. He told me because he was dying down at the old Cedars of Lebanon hospital, with what they thought was some rare kind of blood disease. They’d only let me talk to him for five minutes; when I leaned on him for details he said to come back tomorrow.”

“And—?”

“He died that same night.” The old man swallowed his drink. “Maybe it’s just as well I didn’t hear the rest. Nobody else who went up with Tim ever said a word about it. Trenk went back to Europe, but he’d kept his mouth shut, too.”

“What about those bats?”

“All I know is what Tim told me, and what he said didn’t make much sense. Don’t forget, he was dying, probably hallucinating.”

“Probably,” Greg said. He wondered if he should ask another question, but it wasn’t worth the risk. The way Bernie talked, it didn’t sound as if he even suspected, and if that was the case there was no sense giving him a clue.

The old man thought Tim was hallucinating. If Greg told him about the girl in the house, would he say that was a hallucination too?

Could be. After all, Greg did have himself a toot before going in, and it wasn’t as little as he liked to tell himself it was. Maybe that washed-up cowboy actor was on something too—either that or just jiving him. But the cowboy was dead, Bernie’s friend was dead, and Bernie looked as if he’d stayed up way past his bedtime.

Greg stood up. “I’ll be going now,” he said.

Bernie blinked. “Aren’t you going to tell me what happened to you up there?”

“Nothing. It’s just a spooky old house, and I guess I got carried away.” Greg walked to the door, opened it, then glanced back at the old man slumped in his chair. “Just in case you’ve been worrying, let me relieve your mind. I didn’t see any bats.”

So much for his good deed for the day.

Now it was time to do a good deed for himself. It had been a long time since lunch. Driving off, Greg turned onto Olympic and headed for a mini-mall offering a choice of franchised junk food. He chose the place with the best grease-smells and wolfed down more than his diet dictated: two burgers with everything, extra fries, coffee and a shake. He hated pigging out like this, but right now it was all he could afford. If tonight had been different he might be eating at Morton’s.

As it was, perhaps he ought to consider himself lucky just to be alive. There was no sense stewing about the rest.

Driving home he reached his decision before he reached his destination. Whether what he'd seen was real or the product of his imagination, one thing was certain: he didn't want to see it again.

When Greg pulled into his parking space under the apartment it was close to midnight. The close-to-witching hour when the unholy hosts rise from their graves—Leno, Letterman, Arsenio, reading their ad-libs to the cackling crowd, welcoming their guests with all the grace of Dracula greeting Renfield, then draining their blood—

Now where had all that come from? Riding the elevator up to the third floor, he had the answer. Damn Bernie and his vampire talk. And as for what Greg had seen, or thought he'd seen, there was an answer for that too—an answer he'd have to face sooner or later. And after tonight he knew it had better be soon. When the spiders come out of their hiding places and the sleeping beauties start taking off their heads, you'd better stop. Going up there had been enough of a bad trip in itself.

First thing he got into the apartment, he'd flush the rest of his little stash down the tube. If not, he'd be going down the tube himself one of these days. The time to think about it was over; this was do it time.

Only it didn't quite work out that way. When Greg opened the door and reached for the light-switch, a voice from the dark said "Freeze!" and that's what he did.

Footsteps sounded softly behind him and a faint gust of air fanned his neck as someone closed the front door.

Beside him a switch clicked on. Against the background of the cluttered little living room, the light of a lamp in the corner framed the outline of a man wearing jacket and jeans. But Greg's attention focused on the glint of a gun in the intruder's hand.

The gun gestured.

"Hands behind your behind. That's right. Now move to the sofa and sit.

As Greg obeyed he got another glimpse of the gun. Piece like that could blow your head off. God, what's happening? I need a fix.

The intruder edged into a chair on the other side of the coffee table, and now the lamp highlighted eyes and cheekbones and skin tone.

For a moment Greg evoked an image of the golden girl he'd seen—or had he?—earlier this evening. But what he was seeing here was unquestionably real. A middle-aged man with coarse, close-cropped black hair: obviously an Asian or Asian-American, obviously not the friendly type. A man with an attitude, and a gun.

Just a snort, a sniff, anything –

The man's stare was cold. So was his voice. "Put your arms down. Both hands in your lap, palms up."

Greg complied and the man nodded. "My name is Ibraham," he said.

"Abraham?"

"Perhaps it was once, when Muslim rule began. But I'm called Ibraham in Kita Bharu."

"I don't know that country."

"It's a city. The capital of what used to be Kelanton, in Malaya." The man frowned. "I'm not here to give geography lessons."

Greg kept his palms up, his voice steady. "What are you here for?"

"I want you to take me to the house."

"House? I don't know—"

"Please, Mr. Kolmer. Your friend told me you went there earlier this evening."

"When did you see Bernie?"

"About an hour ago. He was kind enough to furnish your address, so when I found you were not home I took the liberty of inviting myself in."

The bathroom window, Greg told himself. Why do I keep forgetting to lock it when I go out?

That wasn't the question which needed answering at the moment. There was another one more important, so he asked it. "What did Bernie tell you?"

"Everything he knew." Ibraham's slight shrug didn't cause his aim to waver. "Enough for me to guess the rest." A nod didn't jar the gun either.

"That story about researching an article—it's not true, is it, Mr Kolmer? You went to that house looking for something you didn't find."

"How do you know?"

"If you found it you wouldn't have gone back to Tanner. Of course he didn't know what you were looking for, or he'd have told me that too." Ibraham lifted his gaze: eyes of onyx in slanted settings. "Tell me what you were after."

"I can't," Greg said. "Swear to God, I don't know."

"But you have some idea?" Ibraham leaned forward. "The truth—now."

Greg stared at the gun and its muzzle stared back. "The cowboy who told me about the place said there was a blackmail operation. This new madam was bugging rooms, getting pictures, filming with hidden cameras, using two-way mirrors and whatever else they had back in those days.

"There was a market then; magazines like Confidential paid plenty for such stuff, particularly if stars were involved. But nothing about the place ever showed up—I know, because I waded through library files. So my hunch was the material—photos, film, audio tape, whatever—never was submitted. Something happened to close the house down before the stuff could be peddled. Which meant—"

"It could still be there," Ibraham said, and nodded.

"How did you hear about all this?" Greg asked.

"From my mother. She was there when it happened."

"At the house?"

"She worked as a maid." For the first time there was a hint of amusement in Ibraham's eyes. "You must understand she was very young. The lady, the one they called the Marquess, adopted her after both my grandparents were killed in the war. When my mother came with her to this country she was only fifteen. Some of the other girls, the ones who did what was expected in such a place, weren't much older. But the Marquess protected my mother from everything, including full knowledge of what she was involved with. Of course she learned in time. But when she did, it was too late." Ibraham's eyes were somber now. "She was lucky. On the night everything happened she wasn't at the house. The Marquess' chauffeur had driven her down to a Westwood laundromat. I don't know how they found out about what took place, but news got to them somehow and they never went back. The chauffeur had a substantial bank account; he'd been the Marquess' lover. On the journey back to Kelanton he became my mother's lover as well. He died in a Johore brothel the day I was born.

"I never knew any of this until just before my mother died, several years ago. What she told me made me suspect the same thing you did, but I couldn't get over here immediately." Ibraham glanced at the gun. "In my country there is still a war going on."

"You're in the army?"

"The military became my career after I graduated from university in Singapore. Now I wish to retire."

Greg shifted cautiously. "Look, do you have to do this shtick with the gun?"

Ibraham lowered the weapon. "Probably not. After all, we're partners."

Greg fought for self-control, and lost. "No way!"

"It's the only way," Ibraham said. "You know how to find the house. And my mother told me what's hidden there. We go together. Tonight."

Greg shook his head. "Didn't Bernie tell you what happened to me—what I saw?"

"I know." Ibraham seemed to have no problem with self-control, Greg noted—but then, he had the gun. "My mother warned me. I know what to do."

Greg took a deep breath, "Maybe so. But do it tomorrow, when we can go up there in daylight."

"No. We can't afford delay."

"Do you think Bernie might start talking—"

"Only through an ouija board." Ibraham glanced down at his gun.

Fear iced Greg's spine. "Why?" he murmured.

"The old man was the only one who'd know where we were going. No sense taking chances."

"How can you say that, knowing what we might run into up there?"

"What we're going after is worth the risk. I'm sure you're aware of that or else you'd never have gotten into this in the first place. That house holds a fortune, and we're going to get it."

Greg glanced at the gun. "And when we get it, you'll get me," he said.

"I give you my word." Ibraham rose. "Either go with me or stay behind. Like Bernie."

Greg swallowed hard. "Look, man, I've had a rough night, you know? Let me get my medication—"

"What are you on?"

Greg told him, and Ibraham gestured quickly. "You're not going up there stoned," he said. "Could be bad for your health."

A muzzle moved to press against Greg's spine; that was bad for his health too.

"Move," said Ibraham.

And they did, in Greg's car, with him behind the wheel, Ibraham at his side, and the gun riding against his rib cage. The midnight air was humid; both men were perspiring moments after the car swung out into the deserted street.

"Roll down your window," Greg said.

"Don't you have any air conditioner?"

"Can't afford it."

"You can, after tonight."

Ibraham was smiling, but Greg frowned. "This thing I saw up there—what is it?"

"Penangallan. A kind of vampire, but not exactly."

"Meaning what?"

"A penangallan doesn't need to rest in grave-earth or a coffin. Like your western vampires it seeks human blood for nourishment, but it can hibernate for years if necessary. Maybe the difference is in their metabolism. Vampires require a greater supply of energy to walk abroad each night. But the penangallan survives indefinitely in some sort of suspended animation. And when it does move, it flies."

Greg nodded. "You mean it turns itself into some kind of a bat."

Ibraham shook his head. "That's just superstition. The penangallan still retains human form—or part of its human form."

"I don't get it."

"These creatures can detach their heads from their bodies. And the head has the power of flight. When the head is removed, the stomach and intestines are pulled out and stay attached to it, receiving the blood it drinks."

The words triggered Greg's memory—just a flash, but enough. The golden girl, sitting up and lifting her head from the open stump of the neck. He'd seen it. It was true.

He felt a jarring movement and beside him Ibraham stirred in his seat. "Watch what you're doing," he said.

What Greg was doing was turning onto the concealed side road. Had they really come this far this quickly? Of course there was no traffic up here, no lights. Strange how easy it was to locate the hidden opening this second time around, even in the dark. But then again, it was associated with something he wasn't likely to forget.

The car entered and moved upward in a tunnel formed by the overhanging trees lining the roadway. Greg switched headlights, but even the brights were of little help here. Then the trees thinned, but the underbrush thickened and the car began to lurch around the sharp curves.

"Watch it!" Ibraham warned.

But Greg had already warned himself with the memory of what lay ahead. A head—

"I can't cut it," he said. "We've got to wait. Tomorrow. We'll do it tomorrow."

"Now." The gun jabbed against his ribs; Ibraham's voice jabbed his ear. "You're going now. Either behind the wheel or dumped in the trunk."

"You're bluffing—"

“That’s what the old man thought.”

Greg’s hands were wet on the wheel, but they stayed there as the car inched forward over the rutted roadway and climbed around a curve. Now he glanced at the Malayan. “Suppose we’re wrong. Suppose we don’t find anything there?”

“I told you what my mother said. It’s there and we’ll find it.”

“One thing I don’t understand,” Greg said. “If the stuff they had on their customers was so valuable, why wasn’t it used?”

“My mother wondered about that too, but she didn’t learn the plan until later, from the Marquess’ lover.”

“Plan?”

“Bit by bit the pieces fit together. The Marquess had bought the place with more than just profit in mind. Back in Kelanton she had a reputation as a pawang—a sorceress, you’d call it—and she gathered together and brought the penangallans, which she controlled for her own purposes. Which were to use blackmail money to take over other vice operations and gradually gain political power in the area. The penangallans would deal with those who stood in her way. She was ready to carry out her plan when the end came. You know the rest.”

Greg frowned. “Your mother could have gone to the police—”

“She was a fifteen-year-old girl, an illegal immigrant with forged papers, who spoke almost no English. Even if she’d found a way to contact the authorities—do you think anyone would go along with what she said about hookers who remove their heads, and all the rest of it?”

Greg had no answer for that, only another question as they angled up the tortuous trail. “The thing I saw,” he said. “Why would it still be there after all these years? Why didn’t it leave the place when the Marquess was killed?”

“The penangallan flies low,” Ibraham said. “It can’t soar like a bat, and it must protect its dangling stomach sac and intestines from harm. In Malaysia, homes are often guarded by garlands of Jenyu leaves hung on doors and windows. The penangallan fears the Jenyu plant’s sharp thorns.”

He glanced at the looming pines and the clumps of underbrush clustered beneath them. “Here your hillsides are covered with cacti and all kinds of spiky vegetation. It would rip the creatures’ guts if they tried to escape.”

“But they wouldn’t have to fly,” Greg said. “They could go down staying in their bodies just as they did up there.”

Ibraham shrugged. “A penangallan preserves its body by drinking fresh blood. Without it the body will decay just like any other corpse. So if they did try to come down in human form before decay set in, there’d be problems. I don’t think they’d last very long if word got out that human heads were flying around Beverly Hills and sucking blood in Bel Air. Besides, they’d have to have a place to hide. And to store the vinegar.”

“Vinegar?”

“If the penangallan flies, its entrails swell up when exposed to the open air. So afterward it must soak its lower parts in a jar or vat of vinegar to shrivel the stomach and bowels to normal size. Then it fits them back in the body when the head is replaced.”

No way, Greg told himself. Either this guy is crazy or I am. There are no such things, no such place, no house—

They rounded the turn and there it was.

If the place had looked ghostly by day, it looked ghastly in the grayish shroud of moonlight filtering through lowering clouds. Its dark silhouette seemed to slant toward them as the hatchback halted amidst spirals of steam from the hood. Greg stared numbly at the house. If it was real, then what about the rest—

“Out,” Ibraham said.

Greg hesitated, then took a deep breath. “Look, I’ve told you everything I know, everything that happened. There’s no reason for me to go in again with you now.”

“What about the material you were looking for?”

Greg took another deep breath. “I’ve changed my mind. I don’t want any part of it.”

“Afraid?”

"After what you told me? Damned right I am."

"You expect me to go in by myself?" Ibraham asked. "So you can drive off and leave me stranded?"

"I'll wait, I swear it. Hey, you can take my car keys—"

"I'm taking you."

The gun rose, and so did Greg. Ibraham tensed as Greg's hand went to the glove compartment, then relaxed as the younger man brought out his flashlight.

Together they left the car and moved to the entrance in silence. Even the sound of the wind had died; everything had died here.

Greg halted before the door, and his companion eyed the broken lock. "You're making a mistake," Greg said. "If what you told me is true, a gun won't protect us from that thing I saw."

"There are other ways," Ibraham said, raising the weapon as he spoke. "Inside."

Inside was pitch blackness pierced by the pinpoint flashlight beam. Greg adjusted it so that they stood in a wider circle of radiance, but the light was dim against the darkness beyond. The silence itself seemed more intense than outside; there was nothing to disturb it here, nothing until they came.

"Leave the front door open," Greg whispered. "We might want to get out of here in a hurry."

Ibraham shrugged. "As you wish." Moving forward, he peered toward the right archway. "What's in there?"

Greg described the parlor, and his captor nodded.

Now he glanced to his left. "And here?"

"The bar."

The two men halted just past the archway as the flashlight beam roamed the room.

"All that damage," Ibraham said. "This must be where the fighting took place." He peered at the stairs on the far side.

Greg spoke quickly. “You don’t have to go up there. I told you there’s nothing in those bedrooms.”

“Except the last one,” Ibraham countered. “That’s reason enough. We’ve got to go up.”

“You know what’s there. You admitted your gun won’t help.”

Ignoring him, Ibraham scanned the tile shambles of the littered floor. His eyes swept over the toppled tables, overturned chairs and broken glass. His eyes halted. “This will do,” he said.

Greg followed his gaze to a chair turned upside down, two of its legs wrenched half-free from the base of the seat. “What do you mean?”

Ibraham told him what he meant. He told him what to do, then watched, gun in hand, while Greg did it. Getting the chair leg loose wasn’t difficult and locating a sharp knife in a drawer behind the bar wasn’t a problem for him either. The hard part was whittling away at the wooden chair leg until the end was trimmed into a tapering shaft with a narrow point. It was Ibraham, rummaging through shelving beneath the bar counter, who came up with the bung-starter.

“Good,” he said. “We’re ready.”

Greg didn’t feel ready. He felt he needed out of here. Ibraham had already goaded him to the base of the stairs, and it was there that he turned.

“Hey, man,” he said. “I thought we came here to look for that stuff.”

“We will.”

“You’re wasting your time. It’s not upstairs.”

“But something else is. And we won’t be safe looking around here until we dispose of it.”

The gun muzzle guided Greg up the staircase. In the upper hallway the floorboards creaked, and so did the doors as Ibraham opened them in turn. But it was the sound of his own heartbeat that Greg heard as they reached the end of the hall and stood before the last door on the left.

It was Greg who opened the door, but Ibraham was the one who gasped as the flashlight beam encircled the burnished golden beauty of the naked girl on the bed.

Her eyes were closed, and this time she did not stir. Ibraham gestured impatiently, but Greg stood immobile at the bedside, staring down at the golden girl.

This was what he'd needed. Proof that he hadn't freaked out from dropping acid, that what he'd seen here before was real.

And if it was real, then so was the rest of what he'd seen, what had sent him screaming down the hillside. That's why he was standing here now, holding the sharpened stake. He knew what he must do, and this was the worst reality of all.

He took a step backward. He couldn't go through with this, no way, now was the time to get out of here—

The muzzle of the gun bit against his spine. Greg heard the faint click signaling the release of the safety catch.

The girl on the bed heard it too, for she stirred for a moment, stirred but didn't awaken.

Once she did, once she opened her eyes, it would be too late. Greg remembered the rows of pointed teeth, remembered the hands that tugged the head away from the neck swiftly, so very swiftly. Which meant he had to be swift too.

He belted the flashlight.

He lifted the stake with both hands.

Gasping with effort, he plunged it down into the cleft between the golden breasts.

Then her eyes did open, wide. Her lips retracted and he saw the teeth, saw the talons rise to slash at his face, claw at his wrists as he held the stake fast.

Snakelike she squirmed, and like a snake she hissed, but Ibraham was standing on the other side of the bed and he brought the broad head of the bung-starter down, driving the stake deep.

The golden hands tore frantically at the shaft imbedded between the golden breasts, but Greg's grip remained unbroken. He held the stake firmly as Ibraham hammered it home. There was a single shattering shriek as a gout of crimson geysered upward, then sudden silence.

Talons loosened their hold; the golden face fell back on the pillow, slant-eyed stare veiled by the billowing black hair. No sound issued from the open mouth, and the blood around the base of the stake ceased further flow. Mercifully, there was no movement or hint of movement to come. The golden girl was dead.

Greg turned away, panting after his exertion, filling his laboring lungs with the acrid odor of blood. His stomach cramped and for a moment he thought he might pass out. Then he became aware that Ibraham was speaking.

"—not finished yet. But it should be safe to go now."

Greg unhooked his flashlight. "Go where?"

"To get what we came for." Ibraham motioned him to the door, and Greg noticed that he was again holding the gun.

So nothing had changed, really. Except that they'd come here this crazy midnight to pound a stake into the heart of a dead girl or an undead girl; it didn't matter which, because she was dead now. We killed her and the stake went in and the blood spurted out just like in those horror movies only this wasn't a movie just a horror, God I need a fix—

But there was no fix, not in the hall or on the stairs or down at the bar.

Ibraham's gun urged him along to the hall before the mottled mirror on the back wall. "Should be just about here," Ibraham said. He reached out and ran his free hand across the inner edge of the bar, muttering, "If my mother was right." A panel under the bar slid back silently, revealing a black rectangular opening.

"She was," Ibraham said.

Greg's flashlight dipped toward the darkness. "Lower," his captor said. "Must be some stairs."

There were. Greg descended first, beam fanning forward until he reached the bare stone surface below the fourteenth step. Ibraham followed, but this time his gun wasn’t aimed at Greg. Like the flashlight, it swerved and circled, as if seeking possible targets in the cavernous cellar before them.

The two men moved slowly, silently. Nothing to hear but the thud of their own footsteps, nothing to see but the beam tracing a path along the stone floor beneath their feet.

Here the air was cooler, but the odor it carried, a mingling of dust and decay, was almost stifling. There was another smell, faint but pungent, which Greg couldn’t identify.

Now Ibraham identified it for him. “Vinegar,” he said. “Remember, I told you the penangallan shrinks its entrails in vinegar in order to squeeze them back down into the body? I was wondering where they kept their supply.”

“But we didn’t find any others—”

“My mother thought there could be a dozen among the Marquess’ girls.”

Greg started to speak, but Ibraham waved him to silence. “The scent is almost undetectable here. Probably evaporated.”

“I’m not worried about the goddamn smell,” Greg said. “But if there are more of those things down here—”

Suddenly his foot struck something, something that clattered as he stumbled back. The flashlight beam dipped down toward the stone surface, sweeping over the sprawled length of arm and leg bones, the ridged rib cage and nacreous neck of the skeleton.

It had no skull.

The rush came so quickly that Greg almost dropped the flashlight. Its beam wavered because his hand was shaking. No skull. No head. It was one of them.

Ibraham moved forward; his harsh whisper echoed through the darkness: “Here’s another.”

Greg raised the flashlight, semicircling its dim beam, then wished he hadn’t.

The floor ahead was littered with bones. Some, heaped against the walls, were partially joined: a leg attached to a pelvis, a collarbone to a humerus, radius and ulna to the metacarpals. Two other skeletons were fully articulated but, like the first, they lacked skulls. Greg's stare swept across the scatter, but Ibraham's attention was elsewhere. He skirted the bonepile, threading his way between heaps and jumbles, then approached the makeshiftwooden shed rising along the right side of the cellar. More skeletal fragments lay there, piled almost at random, amidst shreds of rotted cloth.

There was a door at the far end of the shed's wall, and Ibraham pulled it open slowly, revealing the wooden shelving ranged along the far side within.

"Get some light over here," he said. Greg started toward him, raising the flashlight. Its beam sought the shelves—long, low shelves bearing wide mouthed, deep-bodied clay bowls. There were perhaps a dozen pots of them resting side by side like the pots in a florist's shop, but what bloomed in each were not flowers.

Greg stared at the rows of human skulls. And they grinned at him in greeting, grinned as though sharing some grisly secret that only the dead can know.

Ibraham moved beside him. "You see what's happened here? Those bowls must have been filled with vinegar."

"To shrink the intestines." Greg nodded. "But why didn't it work?"

"You can't store liquids in leaky containers," Ibraham explained. "And every one of these bowls is cracked."

Now, peering more closely, Greg could see what he meant. Most of the cracks were visible just above the base of each bowl to form a pattern, almost as though they'd been gouged out by some sharp tool or instrument.

Greg frowned. "Didn't they realize it was wrong to use these?"

"They had no other choice," Ibraham said. "She must have broken them after the raid. Probably that's how they escaped the madam's fate—they hid down here while the raid was going on. Maybe the raiding party killed the bartender too. Stands to reason they took the bodies away and got rid of them." He glanced down at the scattered bones. "But the penangallans were safe here. They must have stayed in hiding a long time, and when they came out they were hungry. And you know what happens when there's no food in the house."

Greg nodded. "You go out to eat."

"Exactly. They flew off to try their luck at hunting. But there's not much around, just birds and perhaps some small game. Since they couldn't fly down from here, that's all they could find. The only way they could survive was to hibernate." Ibraham gestured. "The one upstairs was smarter. She must have known how little success they'd have out there, because she didn't go. And when they returned and came down here she had a surprise for them."

"Like you said, she'd broken the bowls."

"That's what I figure. While their bodies rested out in the cellar, they settled their heads and entrails in the bowls here, but most of the vinegar leaked out quickly; before it could be effective it was gone. The girl we saw upstairs was gone too, after locking them in. She probably had her own bowl and vinegar supply tucked away somewhere upstairs, because she'd already planned what she was going to do."

"But what could she do?" Greg said.

"You still don't get it." Ibraham glanced down. "Don't these bones and skeletons tell their own story? The heads rested helplessly in those dried-out jars while the stomachs burst and rotted away. And trapped out here, the headless bodies, blind and squirming in the dark."

Greg grimaced. "And the thing upstairs—?"

"She ate them," Ibraham said. "That's what kept her alive all these years." He nodded at the skeletons and the piles of bones. "She didn't need to fly in search of food. Not with a dozen bodies down here, bodies that still moved, bodies filled with blood. She stripped the flesh from these bones bit by bit, sucked arteries and veins dry. It must have been done over a long period, and most of the while she slept, just as we found her."

Greg's stomach knotted convulsively. "I'm outta here," he panted, turning to seek the stairs.

“First we get what we came for.” Ibraham’s weapon pressed against Greg from behind as he climbed. And back upstairs the gun prodded Greg to the rear of the room.

“Take a look behind the staircase,” Ibraham ordered. “The madam could have had her office under there.”

Greg swore silently. Of course the office would be in someplace like that, close to the action but not easy for outsiders to spot. If he’d only looked around more carefully before going upstairs on the first visit, chances are he might not have had to go upstairs at all. The office would be where the madam kept the stuff. If he’d used his head and thought things through, he wouldn’t be here now in the middle of the night, middle of nowhere, this crazy house with that crazy thing upstairs and a crazy gook downstairs pushing a gun into him for half of what they’d find.

“Let’s go,” the crazy gook was saying. “I tell you it’s got to be here.”

And that’s where they found it, under the stairs. The door was metal, closed but unlocked, and behind it was the office. Or had been, until the intruders burst in, tore the drawers out of desks and filing cabinets, smashed them with crowbars and an ax that still lay atop shelving wrenched from a battered bookcase on the right wall.

Across from it, on the left wall, was an open safe.

Open, and empty.

Greg blinked at the bare steel shelf. “Gone; those bastards took the stuff with them—”

“Take another look,” Ibraham said softly.

Greg followed his gaze, traveled with it across the bare concrete floor to the center of the room. His eyes followed a paper trail—or a trail of what had once been paper. Now it was just a brownish-gray muddle of charred shreds speckled with tiny glints from flecks of burned photos. From the trail rose an odor, faint as the scent of vinegar: the reek of long-dead ashes in which all hope lay buried.

“Outta here,” Greg whispered.

Ibraham shook his head. “You think I don’t know how you feel? I want to forget it ever happened. But before we put it behind us, there’s one more job. The penangallan—”

“It’s dead,” Greg said. “We killed it. You know that.”

“Not so. Remember, the penangallan isn’t like other bloodsuckers. As long as the head remains attached to the digestive tract it can still fly and feed. A stake is not enough.”

“It’s enough for me,” Greg told him. “I’m not going to tangle with that thing.”

“The stake probably paralyzes it, at least for a time,” Ibraham said. “But we can’t take chances. We must cut off the head.”

“Forget it. I’m finished.”

Ibraham ignored him, but his weapon did not.

Would he shoot? Greg thought of Bernie Tanner for a moment and he didn’t need an answer. Instead he asked another question. “What do you want me to do?”

Ibraham nodded toward the toppled shelving at his right. “Over there,” he said. “Get the ax.”

Greg turned, imagining the impact of a bullet in his back. And perhaps it wouldn’t have been imagination if they’d found that blackmail material intact. No reason for Ibraham not to shoot him then, kill him and take all the loot; nobody’d ever know. But that could still be true now. If they got rid of the penangallan, Ibraham would get rid of him too—because Greg was the only one who could tie him to Bernie Tanner’s murder.

So there really wasn’t much choice but for Greg to do exactly what he was told: reach out and pick up the ax. But it was his own idea to turn swiftly, raise the ax and bring it down right between Ibraham’s eyes.

The gurgle was still dying in his victim’s throat as Greg ran, reeling through the office doorway, the barroom, the hall, the open front door.

He squeezed into the car, fumbling for his keys, cursing the broken air conditioner but grateful for the breeze from the windows. The air was still warm and moist, but it was clean, free of must and dust, the scent of vinegar, the mingled odors of stale ashes and fresh blood.

Blood. He'd killed a man; he was a murderer. But nobody knew, nobody would ever know if he played it cool. Even if somebody wandered up to the house there was nothing to connect him with what they'd find. Get himself a set of tires tomorrow and the old tread marks wouldn't match the new. They might get prints off the doorknobs and ax handle, but they'd have nothing to match them with; he'd never been fingerprinted. And they wouldn't be looking for him in the first place, with nothing to go by.

So he was home free, would be now that the car had started, now that he was wheeling down the hillside, with every twist and turn taking him farther away from that damned house and that damned thing; taking him closer to the lights and the streets, streets where you could find a fast fix, find it and forget what had happened. It would just be like a bad trip, he didn't really kill anyone, and there wasn't really anything like that thing with the golden face and the almond eyes and the gleaming, pointed teeth in the crimson mouth he was seeing now in the rearview mirror, rising up from the back seat.

Greg screamed, and so did the brakes of the car as he spun the wheel, spun and lost because there was no way to win, no way to turn from that narrow, tangled trail.

And then the thing was hovering behind him, rising up and swooping forward, its viscera lashing and looping.

The slimy coils twirled and tightened around Greg's neck, and from the stalklike stem above it the golden face dipped, lips fastening on Greg's flesh as the fangs found his throat. Ibraham had been right, after all.

Now Greg knew why a stake through the heart was not enough.

Scenes from a Screenplay: Earthman's Burden

Note: Wingate is an Earthman who has been stranded among the Hokas for many years. Alex and Tanni are two fellow humans who have recently stumbled on him. The remaining cast are all Hokas playing twisted versions of their favorite Earth characters.

EXT.—COURTYARD BEHIND PALACE—NIGHT

Led by Moriarity and flanked by the two pike-bearing Hoka Guards who stood outside the chamber, the three captives MOVE OUT from a side doorway into a walled courtyard—then HALT as Moriarity gestures toward

WINGATE'S SPACESHIP

A crumpled, battered metal craft resting on a rocky slab in the silvery moonlight. A stone pedestal stands before it, draped with a tapestry emblazoned with a huge staring eye.

ALEX
Gazes at the craft in startled recognition.
(to Moriarity)
He made a crash landing here
—at the palace?

WIDER ANGLE—FEATURING MORIARITY

Moving to the stone pedestal before the ship.

MORIARITY

There was no palace when he landed. The fools who found him built Shaggy-La after they nursed him back to health.

ALEX

I remember a place like this in an old, old movie called Lost Horizon. But how would the Hokas know about it?

MORIARITY

The same way they learned English.

(yanks tapestry off)

With this.

Revealed atop the pedestal is a portable television set.

ALEX

Television—

MORIARITY

We have another name for it.

ALEX

The Monitor!

INT.—WINGATE'S CELL—NIGHT

Motley removes one of the keys on the metal loop from the lock of the now-open cell door as Tanni and Wingate converse inside, in guarded tones.

Wingate

—I installed it on my ship to pass time. After the crash I discovered that by some fluke its batteries still functioned.

Tanni

You picked up signals from Earth?

Wingate

Only a single frequency that took fifty years to reach here. A cable channel, broadcasting nothing but old movies.

Tanni

(nods)

So the Hokas learned about Earth from watching films. Amazing!

Wingate

The Hokas are an amazing species, with even more amazing talents. Not only did they believe everything they saw on the screen—they could also imitate and duplicate it.

Tanni

Like western towns—English taverns—knights in armor?

Wingate

Anything they wished. They came here from all over the planet to monitor what was shown. I didn't realize the danger.

Tanni

What danger?

Wingate

Not all Hokas modeled themselves after the heroes in old films. Some chose to become villains.

Tanni
So you had to be careful what you showed them.

Wingate
One day I caught a particularly intelligent Hoka watching an old science fiction serial. I cut off reception immediately—but it was too late. He and his followers caught me.

EXT.—COURTYARD BEHIND PALACE—NIGHT

As Rowdy and Holmes listen, Moriarity addresses Alex.

Moriarity
I'm told you are a repairman.

Moriarity
(his ego is showing)
You're looking at the best in the business.

Moriarity
(gestures toward TV set)
Then repair this.

Moriarity
So that's why you wanted me here!

Moriarity

The Monitor has taught me a great deal. But I need to learn more to carry out my plans.

HOLMES

(to Alex)

I told you he was a super-criminal! He won’t stop until he takes over the whole planet!

MORIARITY

(nods)

My people have already taken over Shaggy-La. Others are preparing the way elsewhere.

ROWDY

Like the ones who burned down my ranch an’ stole my cattle?

MORIARITY

I need those cattle for my own purposes. Those stupid cowboys aren’t allowed to use them for food.

WIDE ANGLE—FEATURING WINGATE’S SHIP

As the reunited group turns to descend slab, Holmes lights his pipe, puffing contentedly as he nods at Wingate.

HOLMES

Jolly good show that ray didn’t harm your ship!

(smiling)
Never touched us.

A SUDDEN CRACKING SOUND. Wingate looks up quickly: he and his companions stare at

ANOTHER ANGLE—FEATURING WINGATE'S SHIP

As a FISSURE WIDENS along its tail—and, with a SCREECH OF METAL, the entire rear of the craft SPLITS OFF and crashes to the pavement, amidst a CLOUD OF DEBRIS—while Hokas scamper off, SHOUTING

AT BASE OF SLAB

Alex steadies Tanni as the debris settles: Motley, Rowdy, and Wingate look up dazedly. Holmes has been knocked on his butt—and now Rowdy moves to help him rise. He grips Holmes' arm.

ROWDY
You hurt?

HOLMES
I'm afraid I broke my calabash.
He reaches down and produces the two halves of his pipe from underneath, then rises.

ALEX
(unhappily)
Well, there goes our last chance. I was hoping perhaps we could repair this ship for a return to Earth.

TANNI

It doesn’t matter now. By this time the vortex has closed.

ALEX
You mean we’re stuck here forever?

WINGATE
There are worse fates.

TANNI
Wouldn’t you like to see Earth again?

WINGATE
I’m too old. Here in Toka’s pure atmosphere I’ve aged very slowly. If I returned to Earth I’d become a ninety-year-old man.
(to Tanni)
You can keep your youth here.

TANNI
Our misson comes first. If we can prove it’s possible to travel faster than light, the space program would open the way to the stars.

ALEX
Sorry, Tanni. You tried.
(to Wingate)
If you’d shown the Hokas some science fiction movies, they could have built a new space ship for you.

WINGATE
You saw what science fiction did to Moriarity. I couldn’t risk having a bunch of Hokas playing Star Wars for real.

ALEX

I'd be willing to take that chance.

(glances down)

What is it, Motley?

ANOTHER ANGLE

We see Motley tugging at Alex's leg with one paw.
His other paw grasps a plastic box.

MOTLEY

I dunno. I found it in some stuff that fell out of the ship.

Alex takes the box—opens it. Startled, he holds the open box out for Wingate's inspection.

ALEX

Is this what I think it is?

Wingate

(stunned)

Good God—I forgot I had them!

TANNI

(peers in box)

What are they?

ALEX

Spare batteries—for the TV set.

INT.—HIGH LAMA'S CHAMBER—NIGHT

REAR ANGLE ON TOP OF DAIS shows Alex beside portable TV on stand. He fiddles with controls. Suddenly the room is filled with the theme from Star Trek. Now CAMERA PULLS OUT and we see the room crowded with shadowy HOKAS staring up into the tube. The darkness is pierced by MYRIAD PAIRS of wide, GLOWING YELLOW EYES.

EXT.—COURTYARD—DAY

FEATURING A NEW SPACECRAFT, glittering in the bright sunlight. It bears a vague resemblance to the Enterprise. Shaven-headed "good" Hokas carry various cartons into a side hatch opening near tail. CAMERA TO Alex, Tanni, Wingate, and Holmes, moving OUT from side entrance to palace. Wingate stares up at the ship, dazzled.

WINGATE

Incredible!

ALEX

A brand new model—bigger, roomier, faster—

WINGATE

(frowns)

I still don't understand about the power source.

TANNI

(glancing o.s.)

There it is—right under your nose.

CAMERA PANS TO a GROUP OF HOKAS lugging huge buckets balanced on their shoulders, Chinese fashion, up an inclined ramp to the open hatchway.

WINGATE

Sniffs, then holds his nose.

WINGATE

Phew! Where's you get that stuff?

Wider, inc. Tanni

TANNI

From them.

She gestures and CAMERA PULLS OUT so that we see Rowdy and Motley herding a half-dozen of the blue, three homed cattle up the ramp and INTO hatchway.

TANNI

I can't explain it, but my analysis of the fuel system the Hokas installed shows a thrust-factor exceeding the speed of light.

ANGLE ON GROUP

WINGATE

(shakes head)

With all due respect, that sounds like a lot of crap to me.

HOLMES

(nods)

Exactly! When Rowdy told me how Moriarity took over the cattle, I deduced they must be an energy source.

ALEX

This is the most powerful propulsion volatility I've ever seen! With cattle aboard to keep us supplied, we'll be home in no time flat.

TANNI

We should have guessed. Without electricity here, this is the source of power
for all of Toka's industries.

WINGATE
(aghast)
You mean this whole planet is run on bullshit?

ALEX
Yeah. Just like on Earth.

The Clown at Midnight

Horror is my business.

The insurance agent peddles protection and security—I sell terror and dread. The doctor guards your heart; I devote my professional skill to inducing failure in same. Some people live by their wits; I live by scaring you out of yours.

For the past twenty-five years I've been a professional writer of horror fiction for magazines, books, radio and TV shows. And when I'm not creating nightmares of my own, I spend my spare time investigating the nightmares of other people—namely the so-called "horror" movies being foisted off on the public via TV and theater screens.

It used to be, back in the bad old days when apples were sold on street corners and cars had rumble seats, that the horror film was practically an art-form as well as being almost as hot at the box-office as Bank Night. The terror tale was filmed with more Tender Loving Care than Eisenhower gets at Walter Reed, and imaginative producers never forgot for a moment that the viewer had an imagination of his own.

Unfortunately, for better or for worse, the folklore of the land is changing. Just as Halloween, with its ghosts and goblins, has been transformed into a subteen Thanksgiving with Tricks-or-Treats replacing the turkey, so has the horror movie suffered a sea-change into something strictly for laughs, with genuine grue and imagination being replaced by a vat of ketchup and a false face that wouldn't frighten a timid two-year-old.

The shudder salesmen have sold out and the average horror flick nowadays evokes more gaiety than goose-pimples.

But it boots no good to shed melancholy tears over the fright films of our youth that populated our dark and lonely bedrooms with images of Frankenstein's Monster and the Mummy gibbering just beyond the counterpane. It's more instructive, perhaps, to look into the reasons why the morbid has been changed into the unintentionally mirthful.

Much as we dislike to consider it, one answer keeps cropping up: Hollywood no longer knows what horror is.

We could get philosophical at this point and wonder if it's really that simple or if it's just that people can't be horrified anymore. A casual glance at any paper will prove that the monsters currently roaming a city's streets after dark are far more horrible, in one sense, than anything Hollywood has yet dreamed up. And it was not too long ago that human beings were eliminated by the carload lots in the gas chambers of Belsen and Dachau—certainly the pinnacle of horror as far as human history goes. In addition, everybody reading this is probably painfully aware (though none of us like to think about it) that all somebody has to do is push the wrong button and half of humanity will go up in smoke and radioactive ashes.

But all of this—while certainly horrible to contemplate—is not true horror as such. Horror is something peculiar to the individual.

It's a small child's (and quite frequently an adult's!) fear of the dark—and most particularly the phantoms of the imagination that populate the dark.

It's the fear of a human being who doesn't act, think, or look like a human being—the fear of deformity, the fear of insanity, and even (far more pathetically) the fear of a cerebral palsy victim. (There, but for the grace of God . . .)

It's the fear of spiders and snakes and the pale horrors you find under rocks in the woods.

It's the fear of the unknown, the unexpected, the not-quite-seen.

When I was an eight-year-old I saw Lon Chaney in The Phantom of the Opera—and gazed upon the face of naked fear. Within the past year I attended a revival of the same film. And despite the flickering flaws of this dated melodrama, the scene where Chaney is unmasked exerted the same monstrous magic upon a modem audience.

Since the 1925 version of The Phantom, Hollywood has arrayed itself in noseputty and fright-wig hundreds of times. And yet only a score of genuinely shivery efforts have actually emerged from the studios (and practically none since World War II).

During the ’30s, the movie moguls outdid themselves and gave us a Dracula, a Frankenstein, a Mummy, and a Wolf Man, and even a few fairly respectable sequels. And then some pillow-head decided that since it was such a thin line between horror and hilarity, why not erase the line altogether? The integrity of the horror film was quickly corrupted and the honest seeker after shudders was lured into a back alley inhabited by Abbott and Costello and the Bowery Boys. Just about the time Frankenstein was due to meet Pa and Ma Kettle, some giddy genius discovered liquid latex and the “monster film” was born. (Frankenstein’s Monster, we’ll admit, may have been the first of these, but the horror depended on far more than just a fright face with high forehead, dank hair, scars, and two collar studs projecting from the neck.)

Things began emerging from Outer Space—or the equally empty regions between a producer’s ears. The screens of the nation were invaded by a horde of Giant Cockroaches, Giant Bedbugs, and Giant Spirochetes (all of which warmed the hearts of the pest-exterminators at the same time they cooled the ardor of the true horror fan).

That these not-so-Grand Guignol efforts make money is undeniable. Vast audiences still watch the tired old travesties on television and turn out for each new double feature. But if producers believe these films show a profit because this is what the public really wants, then they must also believe that most bums drink canned heat because they prefer it to bonded whiskey or vintage champagne. Let’s face it—audiences lap up their pictures only because nothing better is available.

While today's films prove that Hollywood has progressed in the use of camera tricks, animation, miniature photography and make-up, they also prove a total ignorance of what inspires the release of fear. One of the best examples is a produced-in-Japan flick (an American outfit later picked it up and dubbed in some English dialogue and narrator in the person of Raymond Burr, currently popular as TV's Perry Mason) called Godzilla. The piece de resistance of the film is a ten-story monster that cheerfully tears apart the city of Tokyo, evoking all kinds of admiration for the experts who built the miniature sets but no true feeling of horror on the part of the audience. (As von Clausewitz is reputed to have said, "One death is a tragedy; a million are statistics.")

On the other hand, an excellent example of true horror in a film is the sight of one dwarfed, armless and legless torso crawling through the mud in an old movie called Freaks. This scene was enough to raise the hackles of the most sophisticated audience.

Of course, film producers are not entirely to blame—they have been influenced by the censors, who have curiously limited the size of the canvas upon which the horror film producers can paint. The censors who were not happy with the "morbidity" of Freaks were singularly undisturbed when walls of fire toppled upon helpless thousand in War of the Worlds. One lone ripper-murderer tempts the censorial blue-pencil far more than a Beast From 20,000 Fathoms whose poisonous presence perils an entire city. A ripper, you see, may suddenly drop his knife and produce another type of weapon. A Beast is entirely moral in his relationships with women and is content—if you'll pardon the allusion—to merely eat them or trample them to death.

Let's look at a few of the better examples of horror films and see what the censors have done—or undone.

After thirty years of repetition and burlesque, it is hardly probable that an audience can view the original Frankenstein and recapture its initial impact. It's even less likely if they catch bits and pieces of it sandwiched in between the bra and deodorant commercials on a 21-inch tube. But in its day, Frankenstein qualified as a true tale of terror. Its theme, “The Monster is loose!” is still the basis of most so-called “science-fiction” movies today. The first few scenes of the shambling monstrosity walking backwards or stumbling around the castle convey a genuine sense of the unearthly.

There are, or were originally, two versions of Frankenstein. In the one generally shown and currently revived on TV, the Monster befriends a little girl on a river bank and watches her toss flowers into the water, petal by petal. There is an abrupt cutaway from the scene, and when next we see the girl she is dead, being carried into town by her stunned father.

In the banned version, the flower-tossing episode is continued and the Monster, not out of cruelty but merely through confusion, picks up the child and tosses her into the water. He is too ignorant to understand; if the pretty petals looked even prettier when they floated, why not a pretty girl?

The censors thought otherwise, apparently. They would rather cut the scene and leave the unmistakable—and to me, far more ghastly—inference that the Monster had probably ravished the child and then disposed of her body. The true horror is thus discarded in favor of a sordid situation immediately identifiable by the newspaper-reading public.

In King Kong, another genuine all-out horror fantasy, there is a scene where the giant ape, loose in New York, holds the squirming body of a man between his huge teeth. The censors left this alone, but they removed a scene where the same ape picks away at the heroine’s garments out of mere curiosity.

They also eliminated the scene where Kong, searching for the heroine, plucks a girl from her hotel room and then, realizing he has made a mistake, drops her to the street below. Gruesome? Yes, but it is, after all, a horror movie. (In this case, of course, the horror lies in the utter casualness with which Kong drops her.) And I can’t quite comprehend why a censor would scissor this out and retain the graphic close-up of a man screaming between the clenched teeth of a 60-foot gorilla.

The same film contained a sequence where members of the exploring party are eaten by a sea-monster and dashed to death in a chasm. The chasm scene conclusion, where some of them are devoured by giant spiders, was excised. (It would seem that the capricious censors are also dieticians; sea-monsters can eat men, but spiders cannot.)

If censors have a distorted idea of what constitutes real horror, audiences seem to retain more than their share of misconceptions. In film after film, the great Lon Chaney played a succession of cripples and deformed men; he earned a deserved reputation as “The Man of a Thousand Faces.” But aside from his role as the Phantom in Phantom of the Opera, Chaney seldom played outright “monster” roles. Usually he sacrificed his life for the heroine. Yet to the public, Chaney was a maker of “horror movies.”

The same is true of Karloff. After his Frankenstein series and The Mummy, he appeared in dozens of films and a great many of them featured him for what he is—a mild-mannered man with a lisp. The theme song for these allegedly bloodcurdling shockers might well have been “That Silver-Haired Daddy of Mine.” Time after time Karloff was a kindly, elderly physician or scientist with the inevitable nubile daughter. Upon completing a discovery or invention which he idealistically hopes will aid humanity, he inadvertently causes the death of some innocent bystander or bit-player, whereupon he is persecuted by the police or by the real villain who wants to misuse the apparatus. Karloff thereupon goes off his rocker faster than Whistler’s Mother if she’d landed on a pin-cushion and tries to get rid of his tormentors. In the end, to save his daughter, he sacrifices his own life. Despite the laboratory scenes and the inevitable threats and grimaces of the “mad scientist” role, these films will hardly horrify anyone except lovers of good drama.

Karloff played the Monster in two sequels to his Frankenstein but each subsequent version managed to dilute the blood-letting (though we do have fond memories of the Monster shrieking in agony as the old mill goes up in flames, and another in which he drowns in what looks like a vat of bubbling oatmeal). At times Karloff has appeared as a loutish criminal or the innocent victim of some other "mad scientist" and his experiments. Quite understandably, he seeks revenge until exterminated by bumping into a rheostat. Again, the shock of these sequences is purely electrical.

Lon Chaney, Jr., has consistently been cast, or rather miscast—for he is considered, with some cause, an excellent actor—in routine villain roles. He has moved in and out of various series chronicling the resurrections of various monsters, mummies, vampires, and victims of Five O'clock Shadow. Most conspicuous among the latter is The Wolf Man. Chaney, an innocent young man brought up in the U.S., returns to his ancestral home in England and falls prey to a werewolf. He is quite unhappy in his role as a hairy heir, but this doesn't save him. In the end, his father beats him to death with a silver-headed cane. (Apparently the censors saw no symbolism in the plight of a son who becomes obsessed with bestial instincts and pursues females by night.)

Neither, incidentally, have the censors read the true meaning of the Lust Legend into the various versions of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Dr. Jekyll, who becomes transformed into a sexual sadist at the sight of an "easy" girl after drinking a potion which acts suspiciously like an aphrodisiac, has been played with properly terrifying effect by John Barrymore, Frederic March, and Spencer Tracy. The "metamorphosis" scenes are worthy of inclusion in any listing of cinematic horrors. But aside from these brief moments, the films are pure—or impure—sexdramas. The censors eliminated some of the "morbid" close-ups of bestial Mr. Hyde beating the beejeezus out of his girl friend—in Tracy's case a truly beautiful Ingrid Bergman—but never bothered to eliminate his other bestial activities.

True horror was also lacking, oddly enough, in the antics of such esteemed "monsters" as Bela Lugosi and Peter Lorre. Both achieved success in thinly disguised sex-operas. Dracula ostensibly portrayed a vampire in full denture but actually celebrated the career of the nocturnal prowler. Lugosi symbolized the Continental Seducer, sleek-haired and irresistible; he was merely another version of the Filthy Foreigner originally portrayed by Erich von Stroheim. Von Stroheim kissed hands and Lugosi bit necks but both were primarily sex-menaces, not true monsters. Lugosi, like other specialists in the genre, later drifted into routine villain roles, along with Claude Rains, Lionel Atwill, and John Carradine.

Peter Lorre first won fame in the German film M but his monster was quite frankly a sex-fiend. In most of his American movies, Lorre has played droll crooks or nasty informers, unpleasant enough at times but hardly frightening. Brief moments in the British version of The Man Who Knew Too Much and the American Stranger on the Third Floor are almost the only exceptions. In The Face Behind the Mask he seeks revenge because of a face scarred by fire (shades of Mystery of the Wax Museum and House of Wax!) but his motivation is understandable enough.

Just once did Lorre escape being mired in commonplace menace roles. This was in his first American film, Mad Love. This was a true shocker—and a flat failure. Karl Freund, who served as cameraman on The Last Laugh, directed the picture and created some chilling sequences. The scene where the madman poses as a guillotine victim whose head has been sewed back onto his body is far more terrifying than a dozen glimpses of rubber-suited “Things” emerging from Black Lagoons or descending from Outer Space. Given similar roles, Lorre might still triumph in real horror films. But the last time I saw him, he was playing an overweight clown.

So far we’ve considered what a horror film is not. It is not a picture where a character, supernatural or human, pursues a woman to bed her in the brush; even a Wolf Man is merely a “wolf at heart. Nor is it a movie in which a wronged man turns on society in revenge, be it ever so gruesome. It is not a movie that stresses torture or sadism. Even though the Christians are served up to the lions in Quo Vadis, this hardly makes it a “horror” epic.

The mere use of supernatural devices is no guarantee in itself: The Invisible Man was in some sequences as funny as Topper. The modern “science-fiction” movies which pack the passion pits today are palpable spectacles in which miniature sets and the make-up department have the starring roles. "Mysteries" seldom shock us any longer; hands may clutch and bodies fall from closets in the time-honored tradition of Paul Leni's The Cat and the Canary, but the Cat was only a man, after all, and so was the Bat and the Gorilla and the various cinematic incarnations of Jerry Lewis, for that matter.

Stripped of sexual symbolism and sadistic sequences and supernatural or super-scientific skullduggery, most of the supposed "horror movies"—particularly the monster monstrosities being produced lately—just don't fill the double bill. The censors have hacked the heart out of fright flicks and the producers themselves have sold their collective imaginations for a mess of papier-mâché.

The few films left, which set out to terrify by any manner or method available, succeed because writer, producer, director, and actors stick steadfastly to their sinister purpose. They know what fear and horror are and they play upon the human emotions with all the skill of a professional musician caressing the strings of a harp.

Scenes in horror movies made by these dedicated souls are usually brilliantly brought off. I do not speak now of the liberal splattering of tomato ketchup in a technicolor Blood of Dracula. I have in mind the faint trickle of blood under the door in a scene in The Cat People (directed by Vai Lewton and starring Simone Simone) where the little girl is locked out of her house by her mother, who thinks that the big cat pursuing her daughter is only a child's fantasy You don't see the cat, you don't see the girl. You're in the kitchen, listening to the terrified child pleading to be let in. Then the scream . . . and the horrible silence . . . and the blood.

There is horror in madness, and when Michael Redgrave, as the crazed ventriloquist, speaks in the dummy's voice in Dead of Night, the audience knows the sheer shock of schizophrenia. The world of the pinheaded idiots, midgets, and the armless-legless torso in Freaks was enough to inspire nightmares for a solid year of Sundays.

The “It was all a diabolical plot” movie is almost as much of a cheat as the “It was all a dream” picture, but we can forgive it, amidst our shudders, when we see the supposed corpse rising from the tub in Diabolique . . . and we feel relief in our screams as it thumbs out its eyeballs.

Fantasy alone is no guarantee of grisliness, unless played as straight and as superbly as the first sequence of the British film Three Cases of Murder. The episode titled In the Picture is indeed the stuff bad dreams are made of. In it, a visitor to an art gallery is carefully inspecting a landscape painting of an old deserted house when suddenly a light goes on in one of the windows of the house.

Monsters and ghosts are not necessarily frightful in themselves; one laughs at the staring extras of the various “zombie” movies, but one shudders at the totally unseen horror of The Uninvited. Even a movie like The Thing had its moments of true horror as the blanket left on the cake of ice in which the monster is frozen helps to defrost it. We see only the slow drip-drip-drip of water from under the blanket and then hear the sudden-stifled scream from the soldier left to guard it. And who can forget the scene where the monstrous half-vegetable arm erupts from the greenhouse?

I hold no brief for the monster movies and the science-fiction (so called) films made today in which a skeleton dances over the ceiling of the theater or the seats are wired for shocks—surely the final convincing proof, if any were needed, of the paucity of imagination of today’s movie makers. Such films may entertain the kiddies and presumably they serve a purpose for dating couples who need a reason to cuddle in the dark—but they’re not true horror pictures. For that matter, the horrors of dope addiction in a Man with the Golden Arm serve far better to induce throat-clogging terror.

The sophisticates will probably continue to sneer at all horror films, the censors will snip out the perils and, in an unusual switch, save the pruriency, and we who cherish the creeps will continue to haunt the local cinema for shocks and shudders and the wholesome release of fears as old as all mankind.

Where our search will lead, I don't know. It may be that we'll discover the ultimate cinematic horror in a clown. Years ago, Lon Chaney said:

"A clown is funny in the circus ring, but what would be the normal reaction to opening a door at midnight and finding the same clown standing there in the moonlight?"

That, to me, is the essence of true horror—the clown, at midnight.
